Said the Rev. Thomas Armitage, D.D., of New York, in the First Baptist church, Boston, Sunday the 13th, "Christ did not want one coward among the twelve." Well, then, what did he hav one among them for (Peter)? If he was God, surely he must hav known what he was when he chose him, and Judas also. The doctor must try again at guessing, or else giv up the omniscience and almightiness of his savior. He does try again; hear him: "Men do not overmuch like being alone with God." Perhaps men do not—the doctor may know, and be speaking for himself—but I know of one woman who would like to be alone with God or in public with him, if so be she could catch a glimpse of him, having had that desire ever since she was told that God made her and made this great world out of nothing, never having been blessed with a view of her creator and the creator of all things, notwithstanding many years of earnest pleading for a sight of the godhead, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and the evil one included. One good photograph of the four would insure the fame and fortune of any artist on earth's mundane plane. None of your spurious ones, but genuin ones direct from their originals.

It may not be known to some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that we hava New England Chautauqua at Framingham, Mass., where several evangelical denominations meet yearly to "melt in Christian union." July 21st, the Methodist president called for $1,000 to secure an edifice for their headquarters, the subscriptions on the spot reaching $700, while at the Congregational gathering Rev. Robert Nourse, of Washington, D. C., started the ball with $1,500 with which to build a substantial and appropriate structure for their use, and upward of $600 was pledged at once. The Baptists could congratulate themselvs on already having a Social Room built and furnished for the modest sum of $700. The Presbyterians, though now in the minority, are sanguin that ere long they, too, will hav denominational headquarters in this great family of sects at the camp-ground, while the officers of the W. C. T. U. are bargaining for the most conspicuous location in the lot. Thus, you see, "the good work is going on in our midst." On Dedication Day, the 22d, Rev. E. E. Hale delivered the address, so even a Unitarian was not spurned by the evangelicals, so anxious are they for "Christian unity." Even "Blighted Women" came in for their share by the Rev. R. Nourse in the evening, in the "Hall of Philosophy."

At the original Chautauqua, Chautauqua, N. Y., Sunday the 19th was a great day. Dr. Vincent gave a sevenfold answer to the question, "What can a man do with his past evil life and the sins he has committed when the memory of his folly and sin haunts him constantly?" Were the reverend gentleman's answers based on his own experience in getting over the sins of his own evil life, or was he teaching what he supposed others might do with a past evil life? Mercy on them! What a terrible haunting some of the clergy must hav, if all their sins and follies are thus haunting them constantly! No wonder they pray so much; but why should they afflict others with their guilt—us poor women who hav not committed these sins and follies? Why not go into their closets, as commanded, and hav it out alone with their God, and not disturb us innocent ones with their haunting terrors over their evil lives? I expect they fancy themselvs not under consideration when preaching of a man's sins haunting him constantly. Don't you? Are they so hardened as not to realize their own vileness? It looks so, doesn't it?

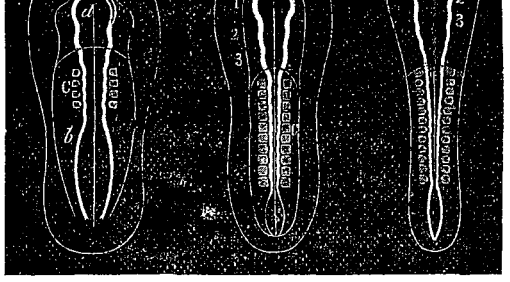
SEXUAL PHYSIOLOGY AND HYGIENE;

OR, THE MYSTERIES OF MAN.

By R. T. TRALL, M. D.,

Carefully Revised and Enlarged Edition. Fully Illustrated.



This work was first published in 1866. Its success has been very great, and it has had a sale in every part of the world where the English language is read. It has become an authority on the subjects of which it treats. In England, in Australia, in New Zealand, in this country, it has been in constant demand since it was first published.

The advance in knowledge has made it desirable to revise the work and incorporate in it new discoveries made during the last 20 years. To this end it has been carefully revised, most of it re-written, several new chapters and a large number of fresh illustrations added, so that it is to-day practically a new book, and far the best of its kind which has yet appeared. It may be relied upon to give most complete knowledge of Sexual Physiology in all it departments.

Among the new chapters may be specially mentioned the one entitled, The Contests between the Males of Animals and Man for the Female. In no work is this subject so fully and interestingly treated. The subject matter has been drawn from a great variety of sources. This chapter alone will fully repay for the entire work.

There may be those who think the subject of Sexual Physiology one which should not be studied. There was a time when the subject of anatomy was considered improper, and it was considered unsafe for a man to devote his life to it. That day is past, and the benefits to the world from a knowledge of anatomy have been immense; and the benefits to the race from a perfect knowledge of Sexual Physiology will be far greater; and while we may respect the feelings of those who would never read on this subject, yet we must insist that it is one of the noblest studies, and brings one nearer than any other to the Creative Power, and one which, thoughtfully investigated, tends to make man wiser and better.

The illustrations in this work are 111 in number, and will greatly aid the reader by making everything plain and clear. No work of its kind has ever been so profusely illustrated; see samples in this adverisement.

The following are some the titles of the chapters: The Origin of Life; The Contests between the Males of Animals and Man for the Female; Pregnancy; Embryology; Parturition; Lactat on; The Law of Sex; Regulation of the Number of Offspring; Hereditary Transmission; Sexual Hygiene, etc., etc.

The price of the work is $2.00 by mail, post paid.

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

WHY send thousands upon thousands of pounds and dollars to convert the so-called heathen of foreign lands when at home there is ten times as much degradation, ten times as much suffering?—D. M. Bennett.

JEHOVAH, "from the clouds and darkness of Sinai," said to the Jews: "Thou shalt hav no other gods before me . . . Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them nor serve them; for I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous God, visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me." Contrast this with the words put by the Hindoo in the mouth of Brahma: "I am the same to all mankind. They who honestly serve other gods, involuntarily worship me. I am he who partaketh of all worship, and I am the reward of all worshipers." Compare these passages. The first, a dungeon where crawl the things begot of jealous slime; the other, great as the domed firmament inlaid with suns.—R. G. Ingersoll in the Christian Religion.

THE method, object, and drift of all Locke's theological writings is the same. Regardless of ecclesiastical tradition, but assuming the infallibility of the scriptures, he attempts to arrive at the true and essential import of God's revelation to man. His theoretical conclusion is that the articles of saving faith are few and simple, and the practical application of that conclusion is that, not only within the ample fold of Christianity, but even without it, all men, whose conduct is consistent with the maintenance of civil society, should be the object of our good will and charity.—Fowler's Locke.

IT is only when digested in a clear and natural order that truths make their proper impression on the mind and that erroneous opinions can be combated with success.—Dugald Stewart.

TO him who is compelled to pass to and fro within the high walls and in the narrow courtyard of a prison, all objects may appear clear and distinct. It is the traveler, journeying onward, full of health and hope, with an ever-varying horizon, on the boundless plain, who is liable to mistake clouds for mountains and the mirage of drouth for an expanse of refreshing waters.—Coleridge.

WHAT Tennyson says of our own country [England]—that it is the land "where a man may speak the thing he will"—is also eminently true of our time. Anyone may say what he likes now, so long as he is not libelous, without fear of legal or even social penalty. What had to be obscurely hinted five-and-twenty years ago, is now proclaimed as from the house-top. The law has given up the theory which it once sanctioned, that a man is to be held responsible for the expression of opinions, and he knows little of law who thinks that the only opinions thus set free for expression will be those which fear of legal penalties would previously hav repressed. A barrier removed in one direction is to some extent—sometimes to a very considerable extent—a barrier removed in all.—London Spectator (Nov. 20, 1880).

UNLESS this nation is prepared to assume that all religious truth has been attained, it must allow free criticism of popular opinions, even though the majority say the opinions destroy millions of souls. Unless the nation assumes that it has reached the supreme social and moral perfection, it must allow free criticism of social and moral customs; and if such freedom be accepted as right, all its results must be accepted as right. If the honest Malthusian can be thrown into prison for corrupting morals, the honest heretic may be thrown there for corrupting souls. In every branch of inquiry errors will arise; that is incidental to the search for truth. —M. D. Conway.

THOUGH all the winds of doctrin were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously, by licensing and prohibiting, to misdoubt her strength. Let Truth and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter? Her confuting is the best and surest suppressing.—Milton's Areopagitica.

IT is an error to regard any truth as negativ and barren, for all truth is positiv and fruitful. The contradiction of error, when error is supreme, is necessary to make possible the affirmation of truth; the destruction of falsehood is not negativ work, but is the necessary preliminary to the assertion of the truth which the falsehood has negated; just as, in a darkened room, the shutters must be taken down before the sunlight can stream in and men can see to read therein, so in the darkened intelligence must be taken down the shutters of superstition, fastened by the priesthood over the windows of the human mind, before the sunlight of knowledge can stream in and the lessons of experience can be learned.—Mrs. Annie Besant.

AN honest man's the noblest work of God.—Pope.

AN honest god's the noblest work of man.—Ingersoll.

"WHEREFORE, thought I, the point being thus, I am for going on and venturing my eternal state with Christ, whether I hav comfort here or no. If God does not come in, thought I, I will leap off the ladder even blindfolded into eternity, sink or swim, come heaven, come hell. Now was my heart full of comfort. The ladder was an imaginary ladder, but the resolution was a genuin, manly one, such as lies at the bottom of all brave and honorable action. Others who hav thought very differently from Bunyan about such matters hav felt the same as he felt. Be true to yourself, whatever comes, even if damnation come. Better hell with an honest heart than heaven with cowardice and insincerity.—Froude's Bunyan.

THIS above all—to thine ownself be true
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.
—Shakspere.

IT is not necessary to the peace and progress of the world in matters of religion that all men should think alike or feel alike or attend the same church. What we need is the ability to keep the peace, so that each honest man may be religious in his own way without being molested.—Christian Register.

Odds and Ends.

SOMEONE remonstrated with John S. Clarke, the actor, about his profanity, and quoted the words, "Swear not at all." "I don't," said Clarke, "I only swear at those who offend me."

WHEN Eve beside young Adam sat,
His arm about her gliding,
There was no younger brother then
Beneath the sofa hiding.

"OH, dear," yawned a little boy after he had returned from church. "I don't wonder the world is so full of wickedness." "Why so?" asked the astonished mother. "'Cause God picked out such a tedious day for Sunday."

THERE was a young lady in Lynn,
Who said she thought kissing a synn,
But when her new beau
Tried to see if 'twas seau,
She said, "Oh, please do it agynn."

"I DO not—aw—see," said he, as he withdrew the head of his cane from his mouth, "why there should be so much objection to—aw—roller-skating; it is a harmless amusement." "Some physicians say it is injurious to the health," she observed as she plied her crochet needle. "Perhaps so," he rejoined, "but—aw—they all seem to agree in the opinion that"—here he blushed slightly—"that—aw it strengthens the calves." "Ah! indeed," she said with an arch smile, "do you feel any stronger since you began to skate?" He is still wondering what she meant by putting her question in that form.

A FEW days ago the following advertisment appeared in a New York paper:

HOW TO DOUBLE YOUR MONEY.

A legitimate method, requiring wit, but no risk beyond the cost of a letter and ten cents in silver. If you are not afraid of twelve cents, address,

MCILVAINE SAMPLE CO.,
Box 98, Bible House, New York City.

A druggist named Smith, residing at Irving, saw the notice and was not afraid of twelve cents. He forwarded the ten cents in a two-cent stamped envelope, and received the following reply:

DEAR SIR: In reply to your esteemed favor of recent date, asking us to teach you

HOW TO DOUBLE YOUR MONEY,

We will tell you a plan for gaining wealth,
Better than banking, trading, or leases;
Take a new greenback and fold it up,
And then you will find your wealth in-creases.
This wonderful plan, without danger or loss,
Keeps your cash in your hands, and with nothing to trouble it;
And every time that you fold it across,
'Tis plain as the light of the day that you double it.

IT was night, midnight. The stars were shining overhead. Stars always shine overhead. The clock had struck twelve times. It was twelve o'clock. All Paris was hushed. Paris was quiet. It was midnight. The gend'arme watched. The cafes were closed. The stars still shone. A man and woman stood in the shadow of a court. They spoke low. Very low. It was midnight. The man spoke. "You do not love me." The woman spoke now. "I do." The stars still shone. Overhead. All Paris was quiet. The man spoke. This is the second time he spoke. "If you loved me you would kiss me." They were in the shadow. Good chance. The woman again spoke. Her second innings. "I cannot kiss you." Her voice was soft, oh, so soft. The man turned on his heel. He looked down the boulevard! The boulevard stood the glance. It did not tremble. The man came back. He spoke. "Tell me why." His eyes met hers. It was midnight. "I will trust you," she said. "Thank you." He spoke eagerly. "No occasion," she answered him calmly, simply, "I hav fever blisters. They are the curse of the De La Miphreys. I can never kiss you." "What, never?" "Well, hardly ev—"

LIVING AND DYING.

John Smith was eke a goodly man
As ever lived on earth—
The world admired and loudly praised
His truly pious worth;
His life was full of charity,
And free from sinful pride—
But scarce had lived to thirty-four,
When one calm eventide
A mule kicked at him playfully,
And Smith soon after died.

John Brown, a knave of deepest hue,
Dwelt in the self-same town—
A grosser, meaner, viler scamp
There never lived than Brown,
He cursed, he swore, he smoked, he chewed
He even keno played,
And down in Texas years ago
They say a man he slayed—
Yet he lived on contentedly,
And lots of money made,
Till finally, a grayhaired man,
John Brown lay down to die—
His wife and children gathered round—
A preacher lingering nigh—
The only token of his death
A quiet, gentle sigh.

We'd like to liv as did old Smith,
Revered by all the town,
But when it comes to dying, we'd
Prefer to die like Brown.

Notes and Clippings.

A SON of Spurgeon, the famous London preacher, has a church in Auckland, New Zealand, where he delivers sermons almost as sensational as those of his father.

MGR. PATRICK ALLEN, a Catholic priest in New Orleans, is accused of selling the sextonship of the St. Patrick Cemetery and pocketing the money. It is worth several thousand a year to him.

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher at Lamar, Mo., took his class of little girls, of from eight to twelve years of age, to a grove to instruct them, thence to the creek, where he had them strip off their clothing and take a bath, while he sat on the bank and watched the little innocents.

THE archbishop of Dublin, Ireland (Lord Plunket) in opening a church bazar lately, spoke in favor of bazars, and declared himself in favor of raffles, which were not, he said, incentivs to gambling, for the reason that not more than one invester in five hundred ever got anything for his money.

FRANK JAMES, murderer and train-robber, is attending the revival services conducted by Sam Jones at Plattsburg, Mo. Whatever else may be said against Colonel James, he has always been a pious man. During his whole career he never shot a man or stopped a train on Sunday, and no man has denounced Colonel Ingersoll in stronger terms than this same Colonel James.

A CORRESPONDENT of a Unitarian paper objects to the baptism of infants because it implies previous impurity. He says that infancy is "an occasion that ought to be improved by some religious service, but wants a better formula than the Trinitarian one." He suggests that the minister, as the mouthpiece of the parent, might say: "We gratefully dedicate this child to a life of liberty, light, and love."

A GEORGIA paper reports a local "prayergage" as follows: "Not long since, at an experience meeting at Gainesville of the sanctificationists, one good sister arose and said: 'I am safe on the rock. The good Lord is with me; I trust everything to him. The other day Mr. S. sent me word that he would bring some friends to dinner at twelve o'clock. It was then eleven o'clock. You know it takes beans two hours to bile, but I just got down on my knees by that old stove and prayed that them beans would get done in an hour. When the clock struck twelve I got up, lifted the top, and them beans were done.'"

"I do not regret our separation, dear brethren," said a Virginia clergyman in his farewell sermon, "for three good and valid reasons. The first is that you don't love me; the second, that you don't love one another; and the third, that God does not love you. You don't love me—my salary is several months in arrears; you don't love one another—or there would be no such dearth of marriages among you; and God doesn't seem to love you as you ought to be loved, because there hav been so few funerals among you lately." He was not pressed to remain.

THE other evening, writes William Washburn in John Swinton's Paper, I was standing by my two little girls in an open field talking to a clergyman. I was listening humbly to his instructions about some minute points connected with our future life, on which his knowledge was much more accurate than my own. The moon was about an hour high. My back was turned to the children. I had just nodded my assent to one of the clergyman's statements, when I heard the baby scream. I turned round and saw that her elder sister, who is three years old, was lifting her up, an operation which the baby abhors. "Put the baby down," I said, angrily. "What are you teasing her for?" "I am not teasing her," said Susy; "I'm lifting her up, so she can be nearer to the moon, and see it better." I turned to the clergyman. "My dear doctor," I said, "Susy was doing to the baby what you hav been doing to me; but the baby is too young to be grateful."

JAMES GREY and James Gallagher, of Washington, D. C., attended church together last Sunday, and, on their return, entered into a theological discussion. While the argument was at its hight, Gallagher, angered at a remark made by Grey, attacked him with a razor, slashing him several times across the back and arms. Grey managed to pick up an axe and dealt his assailant a blow on the head which felled him to the ground with a fractured skull. The police interfered, and both men, bleeding profusely, were taken to the station-house, and from there to the hospital. Gallagher will probably die.

IN Cuba, two hours before a paper is distributed on the street, a copy must be sent, with the editor's name, to the government, and one to the censor. When the paper is returned with the censor's indorsement the paper may go out to the public. One of the newspapers of Havana disregards the law, publishes what it pleases, and when it gets ready. Every few weeks the government fines the editor and suppresses the paper. The next day the paper appears under a new name. Its frequent brushes with the government advertise it, and people buy it to see what new indiscretion it has committed. The subscription price is $24 a year.

THE adherents of the Mormons, says the London Standard, commenced a new crusade in Berlin on Saturday, July 11th. There was a large number of people—men, women, and children—present. The meetings are to be continued every Sunday. Germany, more especially the cities, is in no case a very favorable ground for new doctrins, except such as will advance Materialism, Socialism, moneymaking, or pleasure, and it will be the material prosperity of the Latter Day Saints about Salt Lake City, and not the Book of Mormon, which will win the sect converts, if they obtain any at all, in a poor, expensiv, and unbelieving city like Berlin.

MISS CLEVELAND has been accused by a critic of "mixing metaphors" in her new book. The copy sent the Sun, with Elizabeth's compliments, has evidently been lost in the mail, so we cannot decide; but it is quite likely. Most writers do it more or less, and many mix something worse than metaphors. Her brother, who has a good paying situation at Washington (Grover is meant) lately told somebody that he would "be boiled in hell" before he would remove an officer without cause. Here was a case of mixed metaphor. The place referred to (now obsolete) has always been supposed to be dryer than a contribution box or a last year's sermon—not a drop of water within miles of it. How, then, it may be asked, could he be boiled therein? He should hav said roasted, fried, or broiled. It is due to his constituents that he set himself right before the country on this point at once.—Peck's Sun.

THE Rev. John Faville, writing on "Our Over-Churched Communities," says: "The Presbyterians of Wisconsin report 130 churches and 104 ministers; the Episcopalians, 170 parishes, 130 clergy; the Baptists, 149 churches, 96 ministers; the Congregationalists, 193 churches, 147 ministers; the M. E. church, 257 churches, 240 pastors—a total of 899 churches and 690 ministers. Of members, the Presbyterians hav 8,139; the Episcopalians, 7,190; the Baptists, 10,252; the Congregationalists, 13,091; the Methodists, 22,432—a total of 61,104, or an average of 67 members to each church. Divided into three classes as to members, the Presbyterians hav 63 churches with a membership less than fifty, 105 churches with a membership less than 100, and but 25 churches with a membership exceeding 100. The Episcopalians hav 128 parishes with less than 50 communicants, 136 with less than 100, 34 with more than 100. The Baptists report 68 churches having less than 50 members, 114 with less than 100, 35 with more than 100. The Congregationalists hav 101 churches with a membership less than 50, 135 with less than 100, 58 with more than 100. The Methodists hav 69 churches with less than 50 names, 169 with less than 100, 88 with more than 100—a total of 419 churches with less than 50 members and 659 with less than 100." The Rev. Mr. Faville thinks that some of these churches should bury their sectarianism and pool their issues, so that they can afford to hire somebody to preach for them who is worth listening to.

A PROMINENT citizen of Jones county, Miss., who stood high in the church, made a visit to Meridian recently, and upon his return told his neighbors he had seen ice manufactured in that town with the thermometer standing at 98°. It soon became a settled fact in the minds of the members of the church that Brother Blank had degenerated into an able liar. Charges were preferred against him, and a committee of church-members were appointed to visit Meridian and convict the erring brother of lying. They went, saw the ice manufactured, and, returning home, so reported to a meeting of all the church-members. A look of astonishment on the faces of the assembled brethren soon gave way to one of indignation, and Brother Blank and the entire committee were incontinently expelled from the church.

ULYSSES S. GRANT.

"Dead!" Thus we call it in a helpless phrase.
Not so! He livs and joins the joyous throng.
Life leads him down her fair, familiar ways
Proudly, and with exultant voice and strong
Recounts his deeds and sings the victor's song.
He dieth not whose knightly presence sways
The centuries; whose sword and speech belong
To all the endless future's luminous days.
He livs for aye, whose purpose, grand and tall.
Beneath the love of millions finds a root,
And lifts a living bloom for all to see.
He walks with heroes in earth's glorious hall;
The tomb is but a dais for his foot;
The shroud a garment for his jubilee.

—W. A. Croffut.

A NOT at all strange story is told by the Philadelphia Press, which claims to be informed on good authority, that the recent raid resulting in the "revelations" of the Pall Mall Gazette proceed from the ranks of the English Salvation Army. This organization claims to hav a corps of so-called converts recruited from the infamous resorts which furnished the revelations, and to which the alleged converts temporarily returned, resuming their old business for the sake of securing the desiderated revelations. In this connection, remarks the World, it may be noted that General Booth, the leader of this army, is accused of abducting and concealing a thirteen-year-old girl who was decoyed from her home—the Salvationists say—"for the purpose of making her a spectacle as a minor saved from a life of wickedness."

THE Rev. J. Hyatt Smith relates this: "When I was living with my brother in Buffalo Mark Twain occupied a cottage across the street. We didn't see very much of him, but one morning as we were enjoying our cigars on the veranda after breakfast we saw Mark come to his door in his dressing-gown and slippers and look over at us. He stood at his door and smoked for a minute, as if making up his mind about something, and at last opened his gate and came lounging across the street. There was an unoccupied rocking-chair on the veranda, and when my brother offered it to him he dropped into it with a sigh of relief. He smoked for a few moments and said, 'Nice morning.' 'Yes, very pleasant.' 'Shouldn't wonder if we had rain by and by.' 'Well, we could stand a little.' 'This is a nice house you hav here.' 'Yes, we rather like it.' 'How's your family?' 'Quite well—and yours?' 'Oh, we're all comfortable.' There was another impressiv silence, and finally Mark Twain crossed his legs, blew a puff of smoke into the air, and in his lazy drawl remarked: 'I suppose you're a little surprised to see me over here so early. Fact is, I havn't been so neighborly, perhaps, as I ought to be. We must mend that state of things. But this morning I came over because I thought you might be interested in knowing that your roof is on fire. It struck me that it would be a good idea if——' But at the mention of fire the whole family dusted upstairs, trailing language all the way up. When we had put the fire out and had returned to the veranda Mark wasn't there."

A COLORED woman died in Georgia last week who was said to be 115 years old.

TORONTO, Can., lost between $500,000 and $750,000 at the fire reported last week.

THE New York World has completed its fund of $100,000 for the pedestal to the statue of Liberty.

A GREAT hotel at Las Vegas, N. M., was burnt Sunday. Eight persons are said to hav perished. Loss, $300,000.

THERE is talk of a secession among the northern states of Mexico, on account of the financial policy of that country.

THE Prohibitionists of this city hav declared themselvs in favor of the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage as candidate for governor of the state.

A PARTY of Canadian editors, fifty strong, is in the city. They will view the elephant, take in Coney Island, and then go to Albany and Niagara.

CHOLERA in Spain is claiming from 1,500 to 2,000 victims per day, and the epidemic spreads. The report that it has reached Paris is denied.

A LONDON mother is trying to induce the Salvation Army to return her daughter, aged thirteen, who has been decoyed into that body and cannot escape.

THE Boston sloop yacht Puritan came up to Newport one day last week and sailed a 45-mile race with the Priscilla, owned in New York. The Yankee boat won.

A POLICEMAN in Jersey City pretended to hav been cured of some disease by prayer, and the event was regarded as a clincher on those who doubted the efficacy of faith. It now transpires that he was not cured at all, and is as badly off as ever.

AT Murfreesboro, Ark., on the 9th, a mob attacked two murderers in jail, shooting one and burning the other by soaking with kerosene and setting on fire a pile of blankets under which he had crawled. A colored ravisher was lynched at Cuthbert, Ga.

ABOUT 200 masked men gathered around the pastoral residence of the Rev. N. G. Countee, of Memphis, one day last week and fired several volleys at the house. The pastor fired his pistol at the mob and managed to escape. He had divulged the workings of a secret society, the penalty for which is scalping. The participants were all colored.

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD, of London, has filed a petition for divorce from his wife, citing Sir Charles Dilke as co-respondent. The noble lord had seduced the wife of Mr. Crawford, and had paid the husband $125,000 to settle it, but that money has been returned. Dilke was a member of Gladstone's cabinet. It is asserted that he has been intimate with other members of the family of Mrs. Crawford, and efforts are being made to keep the case within the limits of the single issue between Mr. Crawford and his wife. Mrs. Crawford is under twenty years of age, while her husband is nearly fifty.

SOMETHING like half a million people came into the city from the surrounding country to attend the Grant obsequies. While the body lay in state in the city hall, 250,000 persons passed by the coffin and viewed the remains. The fraternity of thieves made a harvest of the crowd, and over one hundred pickpockets and crooks were locked up. Forty or fifty thousand persons visited the grave at Riverside, Sunday. Blaine delivered a eulogy at Augusta, Me., on Saturday to a great throng. The only funeral sermon preached was that at Mt. McGregor by Dr. Newman, previous to bringing the body to New York. A movement is on foot, and a subscription is already started, to erect a Grant monument in New York.

Selected.

The Animal Soul.

From the North American Review.

The author of "Eothen" remarks that the history of Spain, from the landing of the Carthaginians to the expulsion of the Moors and Jews, is the chronicle of a protracted duello between Aryans and Semites. If the contests of the moral world should be summed up in the same way, we might say that their history for the past three thousand years has been the record of a continuous struggle between naturalists and anti-naturalists. The philosophers of Greece and Rome, Kepler, Newton, Rousseau, Goethe, Humboldt, and Darwin fought on the one side; the Buddhists, St. Augustine, St. Francis, Loyola, Calvin, and Wesley on the other. The naturalist appeals to reason and experience; the anti-naturalist appeals to authority. The one enforces his doctrin with arguments, the other with threats or entreaties. The one invites free inquiry, the other deprecates it. The one seeks to explain the phenomena of life by studying the laws of nature, the other by assuming the interference of supernatural agencies. The one insists on the essential analogies, the other on the essential contrasts, between the constitution of man and that of his fellow-creatures. The metaphysicians of all nature-loving nations inclined to the former side. Poets wove their romances about the creed of Greece, but there is no doubt that her gods were originally nothing but the deified powers of nature, the deified passions and emotions of the human soul. The worshiper of nature sought paradise on this side of the grave. He held that to enjoy is to obey, and that the wonders of creation were not made to be despised. He did not make his life a discord in the harmony of nature; he found friends and playmates among the lowliest of his fellow-creatures. The gods themselvs shared the joys of earth. Life was emphatically thought worth living, and nature-worship remained the almost universal religion of mankind, till Buddha, the Nepaulese, proclaimed the sheer antithesis of that system. The worthlessness of earthly life and the necessity of salvation by the renunciation of earthly sympathies were the keystone dogmas of the new creed. The westward spread of its doctrins inaugurated the era of a long war against nature. It is well known that the progress of civilization was interrupted for twelve hundred years. It cannot be denied that natural science was almost wholly superseded by supernaturalism. The constant activity of preternatural agencies was deemed as unquestionable as the influence of atmospheric currents. Speculativ thinkers postulated a spook for every unknown phenomenon. Yet a still more significant, though less often admitted, characteristic of that period was its anti-naturalism. "Whatever is natural is wrong," was the shibboleth of the medieval Buddhists. The enforced worship of sorrow darkened the life-light of countless millions. All cheerful instincts of the human soul were denounced as sinful. Earth was supposed to be, not only possessed of, but possessed by, malevolent demons. The pagan deities were changed into devils. Woden, the hunter-god, became a Wild Huntsman, Hulda a night-hag, Venus a lamia; the first May-night, when Hertha awakens the slumbering wood-spirits, became a Walpurgis-nacht with its hellish revivals. Even objects of scenic interest, the trysting-places of the nature-worshiping Druids, became "devil's pulpits," "devil's bridges," and "devil's caves." Nay, an elaborate treatis was written to prove that the actions of animals are inspired by the devil. The cosmogony of the medieval schoolmen was, in fact, a systematic demonology. In their writings Nature and Sin (like the world and the devil) were frequently used as synonymous terms. "Natur ist Sunde, Geist ist Teufel," says the Prelate in "Faust." Hence their intense mistrust of naturalism and natural philosophy, the suppression of the Olympic games, the savage laws against "sophists and mathematicians." Hence, also, the equally bitter, but perfectly consistent, opposition to the introduction of the Copernican heresy, which they instinctivly recognized as the entering wedge of a naturalistic reaction. Hence at last the forlorn-hope assault upon the doctrin of evolution, which has completed the triumph of that reaction.

For Superstition clings to the last tenable shred of her tenets. Lecky observes that multitudes "who recognize the fact that the celestial phenomena are subject to inflexible law imagin that the dispensation of rain is in some sense the result of arbitrary interpositions, determined by the conduct of mankind . . . It is still customary to speak of 'plagues of rain and water, sent on account of our sins,' and corresponding language is employed about the forms of disease which science has but imperfectly explained." Worsted dogmas seek shelter in mysteries, like vanquished armies in a mist, as favorable to a discreet change of front. When it became mathematically certain that our earth is not the center of the universe, but only a subordinate member of the solar system, subject to laws that could not for a moment hav been suspended without subverting the established order of that system, the discomfited dogmatists fell back upon biology, and confronted their assailants with the announcement that our air-ship, though not itself a play-ball of supernatural agencies, is occupied by a certain number of supernatural passengers, distinct from all their fellow-travelers in origin and consequently in constitution and destiny; and since Darwin exploded the premises of that syllogism its exponents seek a new basis for its intricate superstructure. In other words, the opponents of naturalism try to reconcile the doctrin of evolution not only with the harmless belief in the eternal duration of life, but with their test-dogma that man is an alter ens, a being governed by laws distinct from, or even opposed to, those of nature in general—an earth-child, descended perhaps from that species of quadrumana known as catarrhine monkeys, but characterized by certain preternatural qualities not shared in the least degree by any of his fellow-catarrhines.

Nor is the obstinate defense of that position disproportioned to the importance of its dogmatical significance. There is a story of a moss-trooper who assured a country laird of his personal good-will, and lamented the business necessity for blowing up his house; and an almost similar piece of irony seems to lurk in the demure comments of the Shrewsbury philosopher and his deprecatory allusions to a system that he proceeds to attack with the explosivs of his "fatally plausible theory." He traces the river of life to a chasm, which for a little space seems to hide it with its overhanging rocks. He points out the gap where the river emerges from the cliffs. He proves that its current has retained its general direction. He proves that the gravel of the delta is the detritus of the rocks at the source of the river. He demonstrates that the rains of the upper valley affect the level of the lower stream. He analyzes the water below and above the gap, and proves that they contain the same solutions in the same proportions of admixture. "Notwithstanding," he says, "I shall continue to entertain the most extreme respect for the hypothesis of the Pundits, who hold that the effluent of the river is essentially different from the upper part of its course; that its lower current does not move in obedience to the law of gravitation, but under the impulse of supernatural agencies, and but for the virtue of certain propitiatory rites might cease to flow; and that only the lower river will ever reach the ocean or ascend in the form of clouds to its proper home, the sky."

Yet the outworks of that hypothesis hav already been carried, and its defenders begin to concentrate their forces upon the debatable ground of gradual evolution. For natura non facit saltum is a reversible weapon, and if that saltus, a sudden leap from lower to higher planes of development, could be anywhere demonstrated, it might form a presumptiv argument for the interposition of preternatural agencies. But the basis of that hope is becoming rather circumscribed. "Catastrophism" is losing ground. From year to year the progress of science leads to clearer proofs of the unity of the cosmic laws, and convinces the despisers of nature that the lowly roots of life hav evolved many a marvelous flower, and that the goat-feet of Pan can climb the very summit of Olympus. The study of comparativ biology has revealed the most surprising analogies between the operation of animal instinct and the functions of conscious reason on the one hand, and the action of the organic forces on the other; analogies that make it impossible to mistake the agency of the same formativ law in the growth of a coral reef and the development of a system of political organization, analogies that dissolve all differences of kind into differences of degree.

"Adaptation of means to an unconscious purpose," is a definition that fails to distinguish the primitiv manifestations of that law from the functions of the lower animals. The young bee observes the metrical rules of her craft with scrupulous exactness, yet, like the constructiv agencies of a vegetable organism, evidently without a conscious plan. Like reason and instinct, those agencies are able to adapt themselvs to special and wholly abnormal circumstances. Convolvulus major, confined in a paper box with a small air-hole, will direct its tendrils toward that aperture, and, if necessary, attenuate their budding points in order to force its way to the outer air. The thornliana sprouts along the ground in a direct line toward the next convenient tree, and changes its direction if that tree is removed. In the animal body the responsibilities of a damaged organ are assumed by other organs. The eyesight of a deaf mute, the hearing and feeling of a blind person, become abnormally acute; the skin, the lungs, undertake to eliminate substances that overtask the functional energy of the digestiv organs; nay, during the progress of certain diseases the digestiv apparatus often suspends its functions in order to enable the organism to concentrate all its energies on the work of expurgation, just as ants interrupt their foraging expeditions in order to repel the attack of an enemy. The preservation of life is the highest law of nature; yet, in order to avoid hopeless suffering, she hastens the event of an incurable disease, as wasps, at the approach of winter, kill the last brood of their larvæ, rather than see them starve. The faculty that enables animals to distinguish food from poison is not more marvelous than that by which our digestiv organs select their proper nutriment from an infinit variety of organic and unorganic substances. For both are clearly the result of natural adaptation. In frugivorous animals, for instance, the cumulativ experience of countless generations has at last become a hereditary instinct, but an instinct that fails to warn them against poisons that escaped the cognizance of their ancestors. The fruit eaters whose intuitions enable them to distinguish the vaccinium vacillans from a strikingly similar poison berry, will unhesitatingly swallow a mixture of sugar and arsenic. The imported ruminants, whose ancestors acquired their experience on the mountain pastures of the far East, were at first deceived by the poison herbs of the New World, but gradually learned to avoid mistakes of that sort, for the highland counties of western North Carolina hav now a breed of sheep that will rather starve than touch the tempting leaves of the evergreen calmia. On the other hand, they hav learned to appreciate various nutritiv herbs which they at first refused, probably because they reminded their "instinct" of poison plants indigenous to the highlands of central Asia. And exactly in the same way the digestiv organs of the domestic dog hav learned to appreciate, i.e., to distinguish and utilize, the nutritiv elements of bread and other substances which the stomach of his lupin ancestor would hav rejected as so much worthless stuff. The teguments of the stomach are connected with those of the palate, and the selectiv instinct that guides the sense of taste is but a modified manifestation of the law that governs the process of digestion, and the action of chemical affinities.

And as surely as the problems of the present world are amply sufficient to account for the purpose of the highest faculties of the human mind, the origin of those faculties will yet be traced to the lowly wellsprings of earthly life. No tenable theory of the relation of human reason to animal instinct has ever succeeded in demonstrating a difference of kind. Buffon's definition, for instance, that instinct acts on impulse from within, reason on motivs from without, would fail to establish that distinction. For both modes of incentiv influence both kinds of action; the proportion of their respectiv influence only varies by imperceptible degrees. "Disposition," "character," "passion," are so many different words for the inner impulse that modifies or intensifies the external motiv; and "instinct" is not moved exclusivly from within. Its manifestations are prompted by external incentivs, by exigent circumstances, by favorable opportunities; as first October frosts prompt the departure of the migratory bird, as the approaching summer of the tropics awakens his home-sickness after the temperate zone. The discovery of a convenient nook stimulates the weaver-instinct of the spider; even the imperious sexual instinct is prompted by casual opportunities.

Reason has been likened to a musical instrument that requires practice, which, once acquired, can be used or abused in an infinit variety of ways; instinct to a musical automaton, which plays its tunes with uniform correctness, but has a rather limited repertoire The instincts of the lower animals would, indeed, justify that comparison. A bee can defy any mathematician to excel the symmetry of her fabric, but her talent is limited to wax-work. The nest-building bird succeeds at the first attempt, but does not improve with practice; the spider can only weave; the dauber-wasp only plaster. Such instincts are one-sided business qualifications, sufficient for, but confined to, a single purpose. But as we ascend the scale of evolution we must either modify that definition of instinct, or admit that the actions of the higher animals are guided by reason. If the mental faculties of the quadrumana are so many instincts, that term could claim some curious synonyms, for those faculties can be applied and misapplied to an extravagant variety of purposes. Does instinct, "the exhorting voice of nature," teach a young Rhesus baboon to purloin the jacket of his fellow-Rhesus and try it on like a pair of breeches? "Does reason?" it might be asked in return. But has reason, "the faculty of adapting means to conscious purposes," never been misapplied? Does the Salvation Army play less fantastic tricks before high heaven than the most eccentric baboon? Nor could it be asserted that the talents of our next relativs are unavailable for business purposes. They plan their foraging expeditions with a skill that would make the fortune of a Mexican patriot. No politician, angling for a collectorship, can surpass the Macacus radiatus in the art of making himself agreeable to his patron; and the holy apes of Benares enjoy the emoluments of their sinecures with all the self-asserting dignity of a Grand Metropolitan.

[TO BE CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

How can a merciful god sit up in heaven on his golden throne and look down and see all the pounding, beating, and starving that poor, speechless animals hav to endure, and be perfectly unmoved at it, and never raise even a little finger to prevent it?—D. M. Bennett.

Is Theology Progressiv?

We are in the midst of a gigantic revolution. An intellectual transition is sweeping over the civilized world. It is a conflict between the authority of the church and independent thought, divine authority and human reason, science and myths, a war between men of brains and the ignorant masses still crouching in abject servitude at the shrine of a hoary superstition.

The conflict is as universal as modern education and enlightenment. It is not confined to the layman and scholar, but the clergy of every denomination, including priest and friar, freely participate in this struggle, and boldly enter the arena of polemics to throw their lance against ancient formulas and myths, protesting against many creeds and dogmas heretofore universally revered as infallible and holy.

The principle causes of this intellectual struggle may be found in the startling and marvelous revelations of modern science and, alas! in the entire absence, during the last eighteen hundred years, of a modern revelation or additional communication from a (supposed) God. While science is daily making rapid progress in enlightening the world concerning the grand realities of nature and life, its laws and order, its method and system, and tracing all phenomena to purely natural causes and to physical potencies inherent in matter, it is evident that not a solitary fact has been discovered concerning a God or corroborating the ancient Bible theology.

For over fifteen centuries many millions of earnest Christians hav clasped the old Bible to their hearts and venerated it as an infallible revelation from their only true God. As originally claimed to hav been revealed and compiled it has ever stood as the sole foundation of the entire Christian church. As God's word it has ever been looked upon as supreme and sacred, unlike other books which, written by man, might be subject to criticism, censure, and doubt. Conceded to be infallible from generation to generation, revealing God's will and methods, no one presumed to doubt or question its authenticity and truth. No one dared to substitute his frail and finite mind for what was universally acknowledged to be "divine omniscience." In its very supernaturalism was considered its strength, in its miracles its fascination, and in its incomprehensibility its power and authority. Its assumed and conceded divine origin satisfied all human objections, and replaced and silenced all doubts and reason.

Upon this Bible, accepted by the masses in abject faith and blind simplicity, the church has been built and prospered. Since those early days when God was supposed to hav walked the earth and personally to hav revealed himself, no new revelation has been received, not one word of authenticated inspiration has been added to that book. As a consistent divine of the old school has said, "Theology is not a progressiv science; the revelation is made once for all and the book is shut, the hasp is upon it and sealed."

But in spite of these many warnings and admonitions uttered by many of the oldest and truest disciples of the Christian church, desperate efforts are now made by Beecher, Swing, Thomas, Newton, and others to evolve a "new theology," and to establish a progressiv religion. Can it be done?

Theology, correctly defined, is the science of the Bible. Not, as Webster says, "the science of God or of a supreme being," but simply an exposition of the Bible, and an elucidation of its texts and doctrins. Only when presented as good, consistent, Bible doctrins and lessons is it theology, because, outside of the Bible, there is no theology. Without the Bible all is naturalism or Materialism. Without the Bible all is science, knowledge; and these ever point to nature—grand and supreme—never to a God. All that science reveals to us is not theology, but facts concerning objects of knowledge, and the laws and order creating and controling them. And all science has established and formulated comprises the sum total of our knowledge, which is the great all of nature and the universe, but, alas! never God. The grand integration, as far as known to us, all, and every particle of it, is not God; all that which is left, all outside of all—which is nothing—this alone is God. All that the scientist by latest methods can demonstrate, make clear to our understanding, analyze, resolve into original elements and trace to preceding causes, is always strictly within the domain of nature, and never indicates, much less necessitates, the presence of a God.

Science, within a very few years, has revealed to us an infinit and eternal universe of self-evolved and self-unfolding worlds and systems, evolved during beginningless time from infinit, eternal matter and its wonderful potencies; has developed and formulated to a high degree of perfection astronomy, geology, chemistry; and now, as its last grand achievement, enlightens an ignorant world concerning the evolution of this world from nebulæ, and of man from the inorganic to the primary life-germ, and from thence—during millions of years and by degrees—to nature's crowning work—a noble, thinking, moral man.

These sciences to-day comprise all we know of astronomy, geology, chemistry, biology, physics, psychology, etc., and in no instance, directly or indirectly, do they, singly or conjointly, point to, infer, discover, or predicate a God. The problem, therefore, resolves itself into this plain proposition: Is the Bible an infallible revelation from the particular, identical God it claims to reveal to us? Is this God a reality and fact? Not, Is it a revelation from some other (imaginary) God not revealed in the Bible, but originating probably in the mystic brain of a Beecher, Newton, Thomas, or Swing? Because, in such a case, the Bible would cease to be a proof and we would hav no proof, and having no Bible proof, and science sadly failing to supply the same, and God not nowadays condescending to reveal himself, and thus stop all cavil and doubt, we, of course, would hav no God at all.

The issue, therefore, it is plain, is either a blind, implicit faith in the Bible or Naturalism. There is no compromise, no middle ground. "We cannot by reason discover God," and the battle must be fought in defense of a blind faith in an assumed supernatural revelation, and on the other side by science and reason. Theology must be and ever remain to the world what it has been in the days of Calvin, Wesley, and Edwards, or it must fall. Each letter, word, and sentence of that Bible must mean what it did a thousand years ago, and must convey the same ideas to the common understanding of man, or, in the absence of a new revelation, or a divine plenipotentiary fully qualified to render an accurate interpretation, it becomes an illusion and a farce.

If, by methods of reasoning, Beecher, Thomas, and Co. hav a right to repudiate "hell," they must, by like logic, repudiate all the associate doctrins of heaven, immortality, redemption, rewards, etc., also. Says the Rev. Dr. Johnson: "But the great body of humble Christian believers and the great body of profound Christian scholars hear what these men hav to say in advocacy of 'universal salvation,' or 'conditional immortality,' and they go back to their Bibles, and still they read, even as before, the doctrin of eternal punishment. The vast majority of Christian scholars, age after age, search these scriptures with the possibility before them of some other conclusion, and still they find it (hell). Why? There is only one answer. They find it because it is there. They believe it because they must." And every honest Christian must indorse the sentiment.

Heaven and hell, God and devil, are doctrins having identical origin, history, basis, and proof, and all alike must stand or fall, liv or die, together. If no hell, what did Christ die for? What becomes of the entire plan of God as recorded in the Bible? Of the doctrine of the fall, atonement, etc.? If no hell for the sinner, Christ was slaughtered in vain, and the whole divine economy becomes a burlesque and a farce. Or, if the heathen is saved without Christ, or knowledge of him, what a pity and calamity that Christ was sent at all, or that we were not all heathens, and thus all saved!

If Professor Swing has a right to repudiate the personal God of the Bible, "walking in the garden at the cool of day," searching for Adam, and "preach" a God entirely unlike the Bible God, whom he supposes to be infinit, unlimited, and "here and there and everywhere;" in the sunlight and in the morning star; in the laughter of a child and in the music of the song-bird, then, I say, I hav a right to repudiate all else in the Bible, and Smith and Jones, no doubt, by some prerogativ could make another God, and Black and Brown another, and by and by we would hav as many gods and gospels as there are individuals arrogant and bold enough to proclaim and promulgate them.

Having, by his analytical brain, been forced to relinquish the Bible God, and the six-day creation, Mr. Beecher should now be consistent, but more especially honest enough to apply the same analytical process to his new God he has previously made use of to discover the fallacy of the original God, and behold! this reasoning method no sooner under way, aided by the vast accumulations of scientific knowledge of the present day, and his new God evaporates into nothingness as mist before the morning sun.

When subjected to a fearless investigation, the conclusion is forced upon us that all gods are creatures of man's fancy and fear. All are like the creatures who hav imagined them, and the highest man, be it poet or artist, has never been able to picture, paint, describe, or conceive of a god higher than a man; and then, in every case, dry-goods and clothing even hav ever been an essential element to make their god respectable, thus resembling puny man in every respect.

All gods are an intellectual mockery, a rational impossibility, an absolute absurdity, and last, but not least, like the fifth wheel to a vehicle, a positiv superfluity. If there were one God or a million gods there would positivly not now, or ever in the future, be a single thing for any God to do, as all effects, so far as known, are traced by science to causes purely physical and natural, and in no case to a God.

And a personal God as described in the Bible, a "spiritual God," or a grand and transcendent God, as imagined by the man's highest flights of fancy, are all alike equally impossible. The universe being "here and there and everywhere," this fact naturally excludes any God from being in the same place.

God, to be everywhere, wipes out from existence all else; this not being the case, but matter filling all space, this wipes out God. And a God filling only a portion of space, though a vast giant, cannot be a God and all it implies, because the limited portion of space he fills in proportion to the immensity of space which would be "Godless" would not be as a tiny drop when compared to the grand Pacific.

And the personal pronouns bestowed upon God by our theologians in such profusion, as, "his," "him," "our heavenly father," etc., all imply, yes, necessitate, physical organism, limit, outline, and organs like man. But these they indignantly repudiate in their God. But without incarnation how can "he" be "our father," "good," "wise," "omniscient," etc? Are not all these terms expressiv of qualities known to exist only in living, organic beings, and never present in the air, water, earth, or sky? Can we think of abstract wisdom, goodness, love, etc., existing independent of physical organism, or are they not rather attributes or functions of the same? Can we imagin a "father in heaven" that can hear our prayers and act intelligently, if not a physical being somewhat, at least, resembling man?

Science postulates that without eyes the effect of light cannot be produced; without ears no sound; without the nervous system no feeling, and without a brain no thought, no intelligence. This necessitates all these organs for any possible God. But while a God with such a body of flesh and blood and bones would simply be a gigantic monstrosity, and impotent, no matter how grandly conceived, to guide the motion of even the smallest planet within its gigantic orbit, a God without such a body and without such organs could neither be a God, because the mental attributes, such as wisdom, love, etc., dependent upon such organs, would not be forthcoming.

Thus we see that pure reason, unchecked by fear, forces us into absolute Atheism. I therefore desire to plead for consistency and honesty in the modern pulpit. The battle must be fought to the bitter end between old theology, as represented to-day by Romanism and our old-school divines, as Moody, Mercer, Williamson, Johnson, Spurgeon, Talmage, and others, and science. There is no half-way house; no truce or compromise possible. Better by far a blind, submissiv faith in ancient myths and dogmas than the ridiculous acrobatic performances and mental somersaults of our modern divines.

Think of a "new theology" without a new revelation, and the foundation of all theology anchored deep out of reach of man for over fifteen hundred years!

Think of a "progressiv religion," and for eighteen centuries not a new fact, word, or revelation from any God, and the Bible in eternal statu quo (except when revised by man)! Think of a progressiv mechanical science, and for a thousand years not a new idea, principle, or invention!

Think of a "revised edition" of God's book and God not present to assist in or superintend the job! Think of a revised edition of Shakspere by a lot of schoolboys!

"It won't do!" The church, by its own hands, has sealed its doom. Beecher, Swing, Thomas, and their school, by their theological gymnastics, are doing more to undermine the church than Ingersoll and all his followers. Everywhere the signs of the times are portentous with its impending fate, and no amount of cunning self-laudations or the most artful diplomacy can disguise the fact or prevent its speedy downfall! When the church reasons and the world thinks, theology must fall.

An Unsavory Pastor.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of this date you giv space to remarks upon the Rev. A. C. Morehouse. The game is not worth your powder. I hav known him over thirty-five years, and his name mentioned among any of his old acquaintances will cause them to hold their noses. The Rev. Morehouse preached in Bloomville, Delaware county, twenty-six or twenty-eight years ago, and his wife died. They had adopted a little girl when they were first married, and brought her up as their own child. She was eighteen or twenty years of age when his wife died, and engaged to be married to a young man living near Bloomville. Shortly after the wife's death Morehouse had the engagement broken off, and in less than a year he married the girl himself. Please take a pair of tongs when you wish to handle him.

Keep it Before the People.

Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, in writing to THE TRUTH SEEKER about her experiences in the antislavery warfare of the old times, says: "Our worst foes were the ministers, and they scrupled at no word or act to destroy the influence of an antislavery speaker. I was myself mobbed several times, and each time the mob was led by a clergyman."—John Swinton's Paper.

John the Baptist on Deck Again.

The most luminous orb at present on the religious horizon of New York is, beyond doubt, Dr. C. R. Teed. Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will hardly recognize under this modest name the Cyrus Romulus R. Teed who discussed things with Mr. Bennett seven or eight years ago, but he is the same. His name is shorter than it used to be. He has dropped the Romulus and kept only the R., or has dropped the R. and abbreviated the Romulus, as the case may be.

In September and October, 1877, Mr. Cyrus Romulus R. Teed issued in printed form, and sent through posters over the country, a challenge for Infidels, unbelievers, and Spiritualists to meet him in a seven days' debate on religious questions at Moravia, N. Y. One of these challenges came to the TRUTH SEEKER office. Mr. Bennett had been waiting for somebody to show him his error, though not being a debater he could not enter into a seven days' debate with Mr. Teed, but he offered the columns of his paper for a discussion "not only for seven days but for seven months, if mutually agreeable." The discussion began on the rather absurd proposition that "Jesus Christ is not only divine, but is the Lord God, creator of heaven and earth." Mr. Teed explained that he was not a clergyman, and Mr. Bennett replied that it was the same with him—he had never studied for the pulpit, though he had read up somewhat in the Bible and took a general interest in theological subjects.

The discussion was not extended. It was brought to a close by Mr. Bennett, who said that while Mr. Teed was unquestionably a man of gigantic intellect, his style of thought and argument was too metaphysical, ethereal, or vapory to meet with the appreciation of most of the readers of the paper. Complaints came in from all quarters, asking that the discussion be discontinued. Mr. Teed acquiesced and wrote no more, but he hinted that the minds of Mr. Bennett and his readers were "not sufficiently amplified to embrace the concept." The discussion was printed in a pamphlet, making about 150 pages, and is quite unique reading.

It is Mr. Teed's peculiar delusion that he is divinely illuminated and is the fulfilment of a prophecy contained in Isaiah xi:

> And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his root; and the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, etc.

It happens that the father of Mr. Teed was named Jesse. Further along in Isaiah he finds himself mentioned by name:

> Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I hav holden, to subdue nations before him; and I will loose the loins of kings to open before him the two-leaved gates, and the gates shall not be shut.

Mr. Teed professes to know what this all means. Further, he was foretold by Daniel to a day, and is therefore the forerunner of the millennium, which tarries just below the horizon, ready to burst upon the world when its prophet shall be recognized by mankind.

Dr. Teed considers the Bible the most scientific of books. History corresponds to the structure of the human body, Noah, for instance, being the diaphragm, while the twelve apostles are nothing less than the duodenum. In astronomy he has made discoveries which, as Mr. Bennett observed, are wonderful if true, but if not true are not quite so wonderful. He holds that, instead of being on the outside of a globe, we are upon the inside of a hollow sphere, the sun being an electric light in the center; the moon a reflection or mirage of the earth's concave surface, and the stars little focuses of light. The sun, therefore, is but four thousand miles away, and the moon only ninety-five miles. The childish illusions of modern astronomy as to the immense size and distance of the heavenly bodies are thus dispelled. It makes life more cheerful to feel assured that the sun is only a few blocks away, as it were, and that the moon is just around the corner.

His religious scheme is very elaborate. The elect must be celibates in act and thought until, for want of exercise, the distinction of sex becomes extinct. All gender except the neuter is to disappear, and the true Christian will be a self-fertilizing orchid. These are the tidings of great joy Dr. Teed has come to break to the world, and he regards himself as the John the Baptist of the new dispensation. Some of his immediate connections are understood to believe in his mission, so the prophet is not without honor among his own, although the honor is without any profit to speak of. There is no salary attached to the office of John the Baptist, and Dr. Teed practices medicin for a living. As a delusion was never yet preached so dense that somebody did not swallow it, so he has his followers and converts who accept both his religion and his astronomy. The world still enjoys the experience of being humbugged.

This remarkable person is not exactly what the Sun would call a true hebetudinous crank, and he is not by any means an ignoramus. He has enough knowledge of scientific facts to make him an uncomfortable opponent. We understand that he contemplates putting forth a book containing his discoveries. Should he do so, we shall giv it due attention in these columns.

Mr. Teed is this week at Lake Pleasant talking to the Spiritualists in camp-meeting assembled.

A Word About Anarchy.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your last number you say "the trouble with the Anarchists is that they are impracticable dreamers. They will not take into account the stubborn fact that without restraint there are some people who would invade and violate others' rights. These people must be provided against." To this Anarchist it appears that you fail to draw some distinctions which are commonly ignored, but which, when pointed out, ought to be pretty plain. That there are people who without restraint will invade and violate others' right, is true. But that governments arise by a "social contract" for the purpose of restraining such people, as you seem to consider, is an exploded fiction. They arise out of the successful invasion and violation of others' rights by just such people. A wandering savage, like Yengis Khan, unites other savages into a band of robbers, which becomes an army, and makes its leader a great king. A general, chosen to assist his countrymen in resisting such savages, like the first emperors of China, usurps despotic power. A demagog, like Pisistratus, obtains a guard "for his own protection," and assumes the role of a dictator.

A people rise against their former oppressors, as in France in 1788 or America in 1876, and, having spent their zeal in the struggle, sink down under whatever new forms of oppression politicians choose to provide for them. Force and fraud, the two methods of crime, are also the two methods of government. It is true that governments, to be endurable, must make some show of protecting timid individuals against private thieves and criminals. But radicals should be able to see through such pretensions on the part of an organization which is itself the greatest of criminals. The thefts, rapes, murders, arsons, etc., committed by private persons under the weakest governments sink into nothing compared to those which are done by order of every government as often as it goes to war; and all governments do go to war for the purpose of diverting popular resentment from themselvs to harmless foreigners, and so prolonging their own power. The only point of view from which it can be contended that government is beneficial is that of the patriot who argues that we must hav a government for our protection, not against domestic criminals—they are nothing like as great a nuisance as a government—but against foreign governments which otherwise might actually enslave us. But in these days of dynamite there is no force even in this plea. Governments hav too much difficulty in defending themselvs against a mere handful of Anarchists to go into foreign conquest except where the victims are helpless barbarians. When they hav been utterly abolished, it will, I am persuaded, appear that every useful function they now discharge, including that of "restraining" persons evidently unfit to be at large, can be effected—as that of restraining lunatics, the persons least fit of all others to be at large, is generally, at present—by small local combinations of friends and neighbors, which will not (though you say they will) be governments, but will differ from governments in the important particulars of being temporary, absolutely voluntary, and confined in their operation each to a single definit purpose, while every government assumes to be a terrestrial deity, bearing at once the power, the right, and the duty to regulate everything which may appear to itself necessary.

Eau Claire, Wis., Aug. 4, 1885. C. L. JAMES.

General Grant and the Sabbath.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The New York World of October 24, 1876, contained the following:

> Rev. Dr. Tiffany, of Chicago, defended the president, and said that he knew him personally, and knew him to be a strict observer of the Sabbath. To his knowledge the president would not allow his horses to be hitched up on Sunday, nor would he allow his servants to work on that day. Under these circumstances he thought it strange that the president should hav gone to the Exposition on Sunday, but if he had, he felt sure that it was only upon the urgent solicitation of a friend.

Four days later the World printed an answer by me. I said that in June, 1876, at the close of a Sunday morning service in Washington, members of my family saw at the Metropolitan Methodist church, of which Dr. Tiffany was the recent pastor, General Grant's carriage in waiting; and that the general and family rode home in it.

In a recent sermon Dr. Tiffany has repeated the assertion about General Grant's refraining from riding out on Sunday. On the contrary, I affirm that it was customary for the general and his family to ride to church. And I hav met him more than once riding out of town on Sunday. But what of that? The late Rutherford B. Hayes used to do it, and so do I.

W. H. BURR.

Washington, D. C., July 31, 1885.

The Tent.

Owosso, MICH.—We commenced a course of lectures here on Wednesday, July 29th, and attendance has steadily increased. Many are afraid to be seen in the Tent, and we hav had from 150 to 250 outside each night. Quite a number of buggies and wagons stay in the road, near the Tent, during the entire lecture. The Tent is pitched on a beautiful, smooth lot, corner of two principal streets. We hope it is exclusivly a Michigan peculiarity for really wealthy men to bring ladies and let them sit all the evening on a rough plank, rather than pay ten cents for a nice cane-seat chair. They will eagerly take copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and ask for pamphlets and leaflets, but as to paying toward the expenses—not they. They declare it is so truly Liberal, right, and proper to giv free lectures—they admire our system of no collections!

But one course of lectures fails to instil in them the first principle of Secularism—justice. They hav no sense of obligation to pay for what they receive. While in every place our success has been fully up to—yes, even beyond—our expectation in other respects, in the matter of finance none hav met the actual outlay, to say nothing of any remuneration for our labor.

We had arranged our route; were very hopeful, from the known liberality of the friends at Bradford, Pa., that we should there replenish our exhausted exchequer. Thus far we had opened up new, hard fields, and now felt like trying just one easy one. Friends at Bradford responded most enthusiastically in desiring the Tent to go there. We made arrangements to giv them time—including two Sundays—August 16th and 23d. We worked very hard painting bills—sent them the first instalment. Yesterday noon, to our disgust and consternation, we received letter declining to hav Tent come at time agreed on. Cause: one of the leading Liberals thought August was too warm, and persuaded others to his views. All our labor, painting bills day after day in the broiling sun (98° in the shade, 109° in the shade one day), was wasted, and we hav the trying difficulty of rearranging our route.

We hav decided to giv time arranged for Bradford, Penn., to Carbon, Ind., and hav no fears of friends there failing to meet our expectations, for from the first they hav proved real friends, contributing liberally to the Tent Fund.

SUNDAY, AUG. 2.—Dark clouds and rain this morning, yet w had good attendance and much interest. This afternoon the Grand Army of the Republic had services at the Opera House in honor of General Grant. We expected our lecture would be suspended, but we had good attendance, sold a number of pamphlets, secured five subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and made glad a good many by distributing leaflets—the generous donation of Mr. D. A. Blodgett, of Grand Rapids, who, via TRUTH SEEKER office, sent us $20 worth of leaflets and small tracts for gratuitous distribution.

We are under great obligations to Mr. George Bedford, the earnest, live, practical Liberal of this place. He has done all in his power, used every effort to make our stay agreeable and our work a success.

6 P.M.—It has set in for steady pouring of rain. This will spoil, if it does not prevent, our lecture this evening. Had the weather been favorable, we should hav had a very large gathering. We hav been fortunate in regard to weather, hitherto, and shall not complain, although financially we shall again fall in arrears.

We are patient, persistent, undismayed. The Tent will continue in the field until the Congress at Cleveland, Oct. 9th, 10th, and 11th, unless we are buried on the route.

The cause is onward! The people, once aroused, are eager to hear, and it is only a question of time when those now benefited by Tent effort will gladly giv liberally of their means to sustain the Tent in other places. We shall hav no financial trouble next summer.

There is no such word as fail! Despite care, anxiety, wearing, weary work—and, hardest of all to bear, the needless trial, trouble, and grievous disappointments occasioned by the thoughtlessness of friends—we will hold on to the end. And our good, faithful co-worker, the genial prince of melody, Mr. Arthur Tilney, says, "Pay, or no pay—money, or no money—we will keep on in this grand, good work, for friends will not let us suffer when they realize the good work being accomplished." And in full confidence we respond with a heartfelt Amen! so mote it be.

We go from here to Henderson, Mich., to remain there until Aug. 13th; thence to Carbon, Ind., from 16th to 23d.

CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

AN INTERESTING LETTER FROM MR. TILNEY.

The weather is so hot that one cannot labor—it is quite "fan and lemonady." The Tent is neat and large, fifty feet in diameter, and is very lofty. Everything is new, and owing to its being so clean is very inviting. We carry one hundred and twenty cane-seat folding chairs for the accommodation of aged and infirm people and ladies, and when the chairs are opened up they just take up one-half the Tent, and in the other half we arrange our free seats made from nice, new, clean planks. Of course the weight of chairs adds considerably to our freight bill every time we move the Tent, so we hav to make the nominal charge of ten cents for the use of them. The money thus obtained scarcely pays for them. Sometimes a chair will be induced to collapse when it has to support two hundred pounds of orthodoxy, which has happened both to our sorrow and the grief of the party who sat in it.

The rostrum we arrange out of planks, and when it is covered with nice white paper, and our books are displayed for sale, it also is a good attraction. We hav two lamps for the desk, and six lamps for the rest of the Tent, which hav large burners, and impart a brilliant appearance when lighted for evening lectures. Behind the rostrum, hung on the wall of the Tent, in three beautiful frames, is our trinity—Paine, Ingersoll, and Bennett. At each side of these are our beautifully painted mottos: "Truth has no respect for prejudice," and, "The object of all investigation is the attainment of truth." These are the handiwork of Mr. Reynolds, who, by the by, is quite an artist. He paints all our bills announcing the lectures, and sends them on in advance. We hav also a smaller tent adjoining the larger one which serves as a retiring-room and a bed-room for your humble servant, and I am more than glad when night comes and I can seek the recumbent in the cool night breeze. The small tent is twelve by eighteen feet. Approaching the lot where the Tents are pitched and illuminated, they look grand. People seem to be so stingy that they will sit with ladies on a rough plank rather than pay ten cents for an easy chair. Queer kind of Liberal that; must be Liberal Christians.

Last night there were about one hundred in the tent and one hundred and fifty outside, lying about on the grass. Five buggies stood there all the evening. As we raise the wall, on account of ventilation, those outside can hear just as well as though they were inside. The truths of Secularism are thus given to people who otherwise would not get them, owing to Mrs. Grundy and prejudice. We hav an organ, and I amuse the people by singing before and after the lecture, and that proves quite an attraction.

No doubt, our friends think we are luxuriating on a beautiful picnic, but if they had to put up and pull down the "cotton cathedral," sometimes when Old Sol has run the mercury above the nineties, or if they could see our blistered hands and broken suspenders, caused by driving thirty-two large stakes with a big, heavy sledge-hammer, they would, no doubt, wish themselves at home. Still, in spite of these drawbacks, the Tent is doing good work; it makes people think who hav never thought before. We distribute a great amount of Liberal literature free, which people take home and read, and they nearly always come again next night and bring their friends.

At our last lecture we shake hands with many that we hav helped to start out on the pathway of Truth and Reason, and who are sorry we are leaving them, and we can only get away by promising to visit them again in the winter.

Owosso, Mich. ARTHUR TILNEY.

Plans for Work.

Mr. Reynold's has received the following letter from Wanship, Utah:

"Mr. Thos. Burk, of Montana's, plan to appoint a colleague in every village, and hav them collect contributions to defray the expenses of a lecturer and organizer, cannot be excelled, especially in his territory, for they hav never been under the control of churches, and therefore must contain a great many Liberals. Poor Utah was born with a church on its back, and until the last few years it has been impossible for any but those willing to be ridden by the church to liv here, for as fast as anyone evoluted far enough to fail to pay tribute (tithes) to the church, or dared to speak their honest thoughts, they were so ostracized and persecuted they were compelled to leave the territory; and even now the word apostate is usually prefixed by the word d——d, and conveys all the opprobrium that a Catholic priest could get in a full page of anathemas. But in spite of such strict church rule nearly every village contains some partially developed Infidels, but we hav but a very few 'old timers.' So I think the best we can do is to send someone to visit these young Freethinkers, and to encourage them to keep up their investigations; and the best way to do this is to hav them become subscribers to some of our secular papers; and should we be successful in procuring a good list of subscribers, then in the near future we could hope to hav enough fully developed Liberals to make an organization possible; there will hav to be considerable primary work done before we will be as near free from superstition as other states and territories are. There are a great many people here who sincerely believe that a broken leg could be 'prayed' together, and the person be whole, and for any and every ailment the Bible instruction to 'send for the elders' is strictly carried out, and the elders' repeated failure to effect cures does not in the least discourage them, but is ascribed to their lack of faith. It looks barbaric to see them refuse medical attendance, call special prayer circles, and when the patient is dead (prayed to death), still giv praise to the supposed author of the tragedy. We hav partly engaged a man to make a trip through the territory to brighten up the cause; to visit, cheer, lecture; take subscriptions for our papers; stir up the lukewarm, and scatter some Liberal seed—some of which will doubtless 'fall on stony ground;' but such a visit from an authorized agent of the League would encourage many to more activ work, and perhaps our neighbor territories may want him to visit them, or join their 'missionary,' and make a full team, and giv Freethought a much needed boom.

"The mail closes, and so must I. Will write you again; and hope our 'John the Baptist' may prepare the way for your tent. Fraternally yours, WM. REYNOLDS."

J. E. REMSBURG's appointments for August and September are as follows: Pickering, Mo., Tues., Aug. 18th; Hopkins, Mo., Wed., Thurs., Fri., Aug. 19th, 20th, 21st; Corning, Ia., Sat., Sun. (two lectures), Aug. 22d, 23d; Murray, Ia., Mon., Aug. 24th; Kirksville, Mo., Tues., Aug. 25th; Cleopatra, Mo., Wed., Thurs., Fri., Aug. 26th, 27th, 28th; Rochelle, Ill., Sat., Sun. Belleville, Ont., Mon., Tues., Wed., Sep. 28th, 29th, 30th; Liberals residing outside the places named, but within reach of them, are urged to attend the lectures. Go by rail, go in wagons, go on horseback, and by your presence help to swell the attendance and increase the moral influence of the meetings. It may be necessary to cancel Geneva, and change dates for Randolph and Yorkshire. Engagements in Canada (excepting Bellville), Ohio, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, and engagements in Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri, not named in above list, will be filled in October and November. Mr. Remsburg will be in Albany and New York from Sep. 11th to Sep. 17th. He can accept no more calls for fall lectures. Those desiring his services for winter lectures should write early. His permanent address is Atchison, Kan.

News and Notes.

James Parton writes of the Albany Convention:

"DEAR MR. PUTNAM: I look forward to the Convention with eagerness. Nothing shall prevent my attendance except something quite beyond my control. I hope to hear the first and the last. Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON."

In answer to many inquiries, I giv Mr. McCabe's live letter, which shows how full of work our Albany friends are, in order that those who come to the Convention may enjoy the best of accommodations at the most reasonable rates:

"ALBANY, August 2, 1885.

"DEAR MR. PUTNAM: In answer to your letter, I will say that we will find ample accommodations for all who wish to attend the Convention, so far as boarding and lodging are concerned. The Dunlop House is a large and finely-located hotel, and I am sure that their rates are very reasonable for the accommodations they giv their guests. The proprietor has agreed to board and lodge all those who attend the Convention, and wish to make his house their stopping-place, for $1.50 per day single, and where two persons occupy the same bed the charge will be only $1.25 per day. The usual charge is $2 per day. Although there are a good many hotels in this city that charge $2 per day, yet there is not one of them so finely located as this one, and, with the exception of the Globe Hotel, there is no $2 house that has as nice rooms or givs as good board. A great many of the large private boarding-houses charge more for transient boarders than the terms offered by the proprietor of the Dunlop. I will appoint a large committee this evening to call on a number of private boarding-house keepers, and find out how many will agree to furnish board and lodging for $1 per day. I am confident that we can find good, clean houses where board will be furnished our friends that will be satisfactory both as to quantity and quality. I will guarantee that all who do not feel like paying more than a dollar a day will be amply and satisfactorily accommodated.

"Now let me say a word to those who can afford to spend a few dollars without feeling it. The proprietor of the Delavan House offers to giv the best rooms and board that can be obtained in any hotel in this city—and I may say in almost any city in the United States—for $2.50 per day double, and $3 single. As it has been agreed to make this hotel the headquarters of the managers and lecturers. I hope that all who can afford it will stop at this house. Notwithstanding that the state fair is to commence on the 10th of September, and that the city will receive a large influx of traveling business men all through the month of September, and that the Delavan does a very large business always in that month, yet the proprietor has agreed, in view of the fact that his hotel is to be made the headquarters, to giv preference to our friends.

"I don't see why Mr. Reynolds cannot come right down through the state of New York with his tent. I should think that some of our friends would invite him to Buffalo, and Rochester, Lockport, Syracuse, and Utica. I see that Mr. Green states in the last number of the Freethinkers' Magazine that there is a very large number of Freethinkers in western New York. Now as Mr. Reynolds is evidently taking a great deal of interest in the coming Convention, I think he could induce many who probably hav not made up their minds to do so at once, and help to make the Albany Convention the greatest convention of Freethinkers that has ever been held in this country.

"The memorial which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER will of course be adopted by the Convention. I don't think it can be improved. There are some Liberal Christians—so Liberal that they never go to church—who possibly may refuse to sign it, but there are a great many good, honest people who are not Christians who, if this memorial is presented to them, will be glad to hav an opportunity to sign such a paper. I refer to our Jewish brethren.

"That this memorial should be brought before the Convention is altogether proper. Albany is not only the seat of government of the state of New York, but it is also the point from whence all local matters are brought to the consideration of the government at Washington. And as the Convention of the National Liberal League is to be held about a month later in the city of Cleveland, the Albany Convention ought, I think, be made to serve the purpose of a preliminary council to that National Convention. Taking this view of the matter, it would certainly facilitate business matters at Cleveland to hav as large a gathering of the great thinkers and workers of Liberalism in September as can possibly attend. The question arises, Are our people as public spirited as they ought to be? Let me compare our people with those who make politics a hobby. I don't mean those who hold offices, but those who never get any pecuniary benefit from any political party. Now, I hav known any number of men—I will qualify this statement by saying hundreds—who hav spent money, and performed a great deal of political labor of various kinds, merely to receive the honor of being sent to a county or city convention as a delegate. I hav known many young men to spend fifty or sixty dollars—the expense of attending a state convention, who would sometimes hav to borrow a part of the money—and they were not even delegates, but went merely to witness the excitement and hear the speeches. Now, every Freethinker that attends our Convention is a delegate in good standing, as it is going to be a mass Convention. And if we are going to let those who make politics, base ball, horse racing, camp-meeting, or any other species of amusement a hobby, out-do us in public spiritedness, we will never be able to change the world to our way of thinking. It is said that times are hard and money is very scarce with the great mass of working-people. It is true that business, in almost every city in the country, is somewhat dull Well, we can't afford to order a war for the purpose of putting money into the pockets of those who hav always got some of the 'fifthy lucre' on hand. If some sort of a war should be worked up with some of our neighbors on this continent, or some of our far-away neighbors on another continent, why, the poor devils that havn't got a dollar would hav to do all the fighting. So it is about as well, after all, not to get discouraged on account of the dulness of the times in cities and some manufacturing towns. The farmers can sell all the produce they can raise, and every man who has got anything to sell, can sell it if he don't hold it too high for the times. And when every man is willing to come down to what he can get for his article, then times will be better and business will take a new start. In the mean time, let every Freethinker who can spare a few dollars come to the Convention.

"Yours truly, J. J. MCCABE."

Out-door Meeting at Uniondale.

The clerk of the weather did his level best for us on Sunday, August 9th, and a more beautiful day never dawned upon the green plains of Long Island. The sky was intensely blue, the clouds rolled in white and splendid masses before the gentle winds. The recent rains had laid the dust and given a new polish to the trees and grass, and the atmosphere was touched with brilliant gold. A pleasant company greeted us in the afternoon at Carman's Grove, and some for the first time listened to the utterances of a Freethought platform. Mr. Carman labored quite diligently to illuminate the grove, and in the evening it presented a most attractiv apppearance, like a sparkling temple of nature, as it was; and amid the glowing lanterns, while the lofty trees gave sweet orchestral music, and the sky was our dome and the stars our signal lamps, we discoursed of nature and science as opposed to theology and the supernatural heaven and hell of old-time barbarism. The audience was about double the size of that in the afternoon. Both men and women were present, and the majority were of the coming generation, who seemed to be eager to know what the real thought and spirit of the age might be.

These out-door meetings hav done great good. They hav stimulated friends of the cause, and hav created a lively interest in the minds of those who, perhaps, hav never realized the strength and beauty of scientific progress.

I hav had the great pleasure of seeing our president, Colonel Ingersoll, this week. He is thoroughly interested in the work now laid out, and will be at Albany with his family through all the sessions of the Convention, and thus add brilliant social pleasure to the noble oratory of the meeting. This will indeed be a remarkable gathering, never to be forgotten by those who attend. It will be one of the great steps in the progress of national Liberal achievement.

S. P. PUTNAM.

Charles Watts.

[We hav received the following intimation from friend Watts, who will return from his visit to Europe in time to be present at the Albany Convention]:

"DEAR MR. MACDONALD: Perhaps you will allow me to state through the medium of THE TRUTH SEEKER that I sail from Liverpool for New York on September 1st, in order to be present at the Albany Convention. In response to an invitation to speak on that occasion, I hav decided to say 'a few words' on the necessity of the American Secular Union and the justice of its Demands. During my brief visit to England it has afforded me much pleasure to note in your columns the activ and earnest manner in which the secretary, Mr. S. P. Putnam, has endeavored to make the arrangements for the coming Congress. Equally pleasing is it to find that his efforts hav been so heartily supported by the Albany and Troy friends. That the gathering will be a success is beyond all doubt; but in order to increase its usefulness to the uttermost extent possible, the members of the Association throughout the States and Canada should make an effort either to be present or to send a delegation. It will be a grand prelude to the great meeting at Cleveland. At both of these Conventions most of the best speakers in the movement are to be present, including Colonel Ingersoll. This will afford an excellent opportunity not only to expound Secular principles, but also to consolidate the Freethough elements discovered and gathered together since the Cassadaga meeting. It is encouraging to see the progress that the indomitable worker, Charles B. Reynolds, has met with in his tent propaganda. No one but those engaged in it can thoroughly understand the toil and anxiety attending such an enterprise. And probably there is no man in America so able as Mr. Reynolds to successfully carry out such a unique scheme of Secular propagandism. His knowledge in that particular mode of advocacy is extensiv; his powers of endurance are great; his earnestness is beyond a doubt, and his ability for destructiv work in the battle with theological pretensions is unquestionable. The service he has done during the hot weather is the more valuable because at such a time lecturing in halls is not to be thought of. Indoor meetings will commence in September, and it is to be hoped that the coming lecture season will be unprecedented in its propagandist activity and in its organized results. I shall be pleased to meet with and to cooperate with all friends who are willing to assist in making it so at the Albany Convention. CHARLES WATTS."

Mr. Moore Should Be Elected.

As the public schools of Iowa are not maintained, and were not established, to teach religion, but to impart instruction in science, the charge that Mr. Moore, the Greenback nominee for state superintendent, once applied for an injunction to restrain the teachers from reading the Bible in the public schools of Bloomfield, Davis County, will not injure that gentleman's candidacy in the least. Public school-teachers hav no authority from any ecclesiastical or other source to interpret the scriptures, and it is not wise to allow children to read and interpret the sacred writings for themselvs. Therefore the denunciations which a portion of the Republican press are heaping upon Mr. Moore, because of his act, are unjustified and demagogic.—Dubuque Telegraph.

Comte.

One of the fundamental principles of Comte's system is that the development of philosophy, like the development of organic life, has been through the slow additions of thousands upon thousands of years, for humanity is a growth, as our globe is.

Also that to obtain better empirical laws we must not rest satisfied with noting the progressiv changes which manifest themselvs in the separate elements of society, and in which nothing is indicated but the relation of fragments of the effect to corresponding fragments of the cause.

It is necessary to combine the statical view of social phenomena with the dynamical; considering not only the progressiv changes of the different elements, but the contemporaneous condition of each, and thus obtain empirically the law of correspondence, not only between the simultaneous states, but between the simultaneous changes of those elements.

This law of correspondence it is which, after being duly verified, will become the real scientific derivativ law of the development of humanity and human affairs.

John Stuart Mill says: "In the difficult process of observation and comparison, which is here required, it would evidently be a very great assistance if it should happen to be the fact that some one element in the complex existence of social man is pre-eminent over all others, as the prime agent of the social movement; for we could then take the progress of that one element as the central chain to each successiv link, to which the corresponding links of all the other progressions being appended, the succession of the facts would, by this alone, be presented in a kind of spontaneous order, far more nearly approaching to the real order of their filiation than could be obtained by any other merely empirical process. Now, the evidence of history and the evidence of human nature combine, by a most striking instance of consilience, to show that there really is one social element which is thus predominant and almost paramount among the agents of the social progression."

This is the state of the speculativ beliefs which by any means men hav arrived at concerning themselvs and the world by which they are surrounded.

It would be a great error, and one very little likely to be committed, to assert that speculation, intellectual activity, the pursuit of truth, is among the more powerful propensities of human nature, or fills a large place in the lives of any save decidedly exceptional individuals.

But, notwithstanding the relativ weakness of this principle among other sociological agents, its influence is the main determining cause of the social progress, all the other dispositions of our nature which contribute to that progress being dependent upon it for the means of accomplishing their share of the work.

Thus, to take the most obvious case first, the impelling force to most of the improvements effected in the arts of life is the desire of increased material comfort, but, as we can only act upon external objects in proportion to our knowledge of them, the state of knowledge at any time is the impassable limit of the industrial improvements possible at that time. And the progress of industry must follow and depend on the progress of knowledge.

The same thing may be shown to be the truth, although it is not quite so obvious, of the progress of the fine arts. Further, as the strongest propensities of human nature (being the purely selfish ones, and those of sympathetic character which partake most of the nature of selfishness) evidently tend in themselvs to disunite mankind, not to unite them, to make them rivals, not confederates, social existence is only possible by a disciplining of those more powerful propensities, which consists in subordinating them to a common system of opinions. The degree of subordination is the measure of the completeness of social union, and the nature of the common opinions determins its kind.

But in order that mankind should conform their actions to any set of opinions, those opinions must exist, must be believed by them.

And thus the state of the speculativ faculties, the character of the propositions assented to by the intellect, essentially determins the moral and political state of the community, as we hav already seen that it determins the physical.

These conclusions deduced from the laws of human nature are in entire accordance with the general facts of history. Every considerable change historically known to us in the condition of any portion of mankind has been preceded by a change of proportional extent in their knowledge, or in their prevalent beliefs.

As between any given state of speculation and the correlativ state of everything else, it was almost always the former which first showed itself, though the effects, no doubt, reacted potently upon the cause. Every considerable advance in material civilization has been preceded by an advance in knowledge, and when any great social change has come to pass a great change in the opinions and modes of thinking of society had taken place shortly before.

Polytheism, Judaism, Christianity, Protestantism, the negativ philosophy of modern Europe, and its positiv science, each of these has been a primary agent in making society what it was at each successiv period, while society was but secondarily instrumental in making them; each of them (so far as causes can be assigned for its existence) being mainly an emanation, not from the political state of the period, but from the state of belief and thought during some time previous.

The weakness of the speculativ propensity has not therefore prevented the progress of speculation from governing that of society at large.

Toronto, July 24, 1885. R. B. BUTLAND.

Mrs. Slenker's Response to Judge Brewer.

Mr. Brewer (THE TRUTH SEEKER, July 18th) has, I think, taken me rather too severely to task as regards my sealed letter to Mansfield. He forgets that "one's foresight is never so good as his hindsight." I had heretofore had no experience in sealing up letters so they could not be opened without defacing them. I knew mucilage could be steamed, and sealing divided by a thin, hot knife, and machine sewing picked and replaced; so I tried pasting on tissue paper, and did not know, till the letter came back, that paste stiffened the tissue paper, so it could be taken apart at the folds and re-pasted without injury.

Where fame, honor, and money enough are at stake, it pays well to spend days in carefully opening a letter and getting at the contents undetected. Therefore, I can conceive of no way by which I could so fasten one as to be sure, upon its return, that it had not been tampered with.

I said Mansfield must hav read the letter, because he answered so many questions in it. Refusing to believe in miracles and spirits, and doubting clairvoyance, I take it for granted that he simply opened and read it, just as you or I would. The whole reply is to me a proof that the letter was opened. If it had given one good test, I would hav thought there was something wonderful in the case. If it had contained the full name of my cousin and mother; a cure for cancer; told me the post-office address of my cousin's brother (whom we lost track of a great many years ago), and if he had a family; told me when Planchette would write for me; these things would hav, each and all, proved powers beyond those of mere mortals.

Instead of "only one test question," as Mr. Brewer asserts, I wrote half a dozen, at least, that would be very testful to me. As to "bungling, and wasting my friend's money," she has repeatedly assured me she was well satisfied with the way I used it.

One correspondent told me she knew her letter was returned to her unopened, because the flap of the envelope was pasted all around with strips from the margin of P. O. stamps. Thinking the paste or gum on these might be peculiar, I thus pasted a letter and took it to the tea-kettle and steamed it open.

I was assured by Mr. Walser, of Liberal, that through Dr. Bonton of that place real, genuin, independent slate writing was obtained.

He asked me to write a letter to D. M. Bennett, seal carefully and address it, and then inclose it in another unaddressed envelope, and he would giv me a test. So I wrote as follows:

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Has thee ever visited Elmina in her Snowville home? If so, please tell me what I call thy likeness? Who was thy patron saint while on earth? Is THE TRUTH SEEKER conducted as thee would desire it should be? Giv me some test that I will accept as from thyself.

ELMINA.

This I carefully wrapped up and sewed it all around on the machine, then put it in an envelope and sealed and addressed it to D. M. Bennett, and sewed it once across (knotting the ends of the thread), and, finally, placing it in an unaddressed envelope and mailing it to Walser. In due time I received from him the following letter:

LIBERAL, Mo., July 11, 1885.

AUNT ELMINA, My Friend: I send you, by this mail, a slate with a communication on it, purporting to come from D. M. Bennett, in answer to your letter, which was placed on the slate last evening, and placed in the closet at Dr. Bonton's in the presence of several persons; and when I tell you that the letter was not opened you will believe me, especially when you inspect the same returned as sent. I cannot say whether it is an answer to a question or not, as I do not know what your letter contained, but it will all be plain to you. I infer that you exacted some condition, or test, out of the pale of reason, when we take it in the light of Spiritual teachings as they giv them to us. However, of this we will be able to judge when you giv us the questions you sent. What I hav to say is this: Writing, independent of man, is done, and was in this instance, but whether to the satisfaction of others I cannot say. Before I witnessed the phenomena I did not believe it possible; now I concede the fact. I am now anxious to hear from you on the subject.

Yours for truth, G. H. WALSER.

The communication on the slate read thus wise:

Friend Elmina, we do not claim to be infallible beings, therefore, why exact of us something unreasonable? Yea, inconsistent, and entirely impossible to convince you of this one thing, which you hav so earnestly sought. Long and earnestly hav we labored side by side, hand in hand, in this great work of ours.

Elmina, lend a hand, do not forsake me now in this trying hour. I speak the truth and lie not.

I still liv to write. D. M. BENNETT.

Now you will see that in the slate-letter no reference at all is really made to mine, simply because there was no chance to open and read it. That Walser acted in good faith his letter fully proves, for you will see that he supposed, judging from the slate-writing, that I had asked something "out of the pale of reason," whereas, you see, my questions could not hav been more simple and commonplace.

Mr. Bennett had always been anxious to see me, as we were warm and true friends; so I knew, if he still lived, he would hav been here. I hav his oval likeness in a small velvet frame on the mantel in our sitting-room, and when anyone asks who that fine, noble looking man is, I say, "He is my God—Bennett." Mansfield makes Bennett say Kneeland was his patron saint while on earth, and hence that question. Why call it a "trying hour?"

One mystery bewildered me—how did the slate-writer know it was Elmina writing to Bennett? I asked Walser if he had divulged it to anyone. He said he had inadvertently said, as he handed in my letter, "Elmina wants to hear from Bennett." Now, only one puzzle remains. Who wrote the slate-writing, and where was it done? It was never done in a dark closet, for it was as neatly written as copper-plate. It was not Bennett's hand, for I compared it with a pile of his letters.

The style was not such as he would use to me. Here are the facts, as fully and plainly as I can giv them.

Even Walser says the test was not satisfying. Who will declare that it is? If any of you will send me three cents, I'll send you the New York Sunday News of July 5th, containing Mrs. E. A. Bennett's account of her sittings with the renowned medium, Dr. Slade. I saw Mrs. Bennett when I was in Syracuse. She has written me about her experiences with Slade. It was a great disappointment to her. She is a firm Spiritualist. She went to Slade in full faith that she would get her slates full of independent spirit-writing, which she intended to flourish before Truesdell in triumph as a proof of spirits and spirit power. She detected the great Slade doing the tricks himself.

She saw him making spirit-touches with his feet; throw a cane and a chair while attempting to direct her attention to some pretended vision in another direction. She saw him write on her slate as it rested upon his leg under the table. She had Slade's writing and also the pretended spirit-writing electrotyped, and you will all pronounce them the same handwriting. The account fills nearly a whole page of the paper, and is very interesting.

We must keep on investigating, and if there are any grains of truth in all the phenomena, we should conserve them and relegate them to their proper domain in science. I believe there are some sparks of real truth underlying all this superstition and delusion; but that it is from the dead I do not believe. The subject is interesting if merely considered as a phase of the human mind and its powers and capacities.

The Difference.

We, as Infidels, are sometimes asked to define the difference between religion and morality, and although Webster is very explicit on that subject, yet he does not fully cover the ground.

He (Webster) says: "Religion, in a comprehensiv sense, includes a belief in the being and perfection of God; in the revelation of his will to man; in man's obligation to obey his commands; in a state of reward and punishment; in man's accountableness to God; . . . for the practice of moral duties without a belief in a divine lawgiver is not religion." (Can anything be plainer?)

Morality is defined as "the quality of an action which renders it good, the conformity of an act to the divine law, or to the principles of rectitude. This conformity implies that the act must be performed by a free agent, and from a motiv of obedience to the divine will."

A better definition of morality would be this: Morality is the expression of the innate goodness of humanity, born of our intuitiv understanding of right and wrong, without any reference to conformity to the divine will or law; the performance of such duties toward others and to ourselvs as nature and reason dictate to be right, even though the Bible commands the reverse.

Morality is the natural expression of man's better nature seeking to rectify the follies of religion, and modify the mistakes of Moses and the perpetuators of his superstition. Religion is the expression of our animal nature; morality is the expression of our humanity. Morality is the child of Love and Justice; religion is born of superstition and blind faith. Morality is reasonable and true; religion is often unreasonable and false. Morality is humane and sympathetic, and seeks to save every child of man; religion would damn a world to save itself. Morality is progressiv, and seeks to make humanity better and happier in this world, without any reference to any other; religion seeks to make us unhappy here, with the promise of something better hereafter. Morality seeks to abolish slavery and serfdom; religion seeks to make all men slaves. Morality would beat the sword into a plowshare, and till the gronnd to raise bread for the starving millions; religion would beat the plowshare into a sword, and with it kill every man and woman who does not believe in its "God of war." Morality has developed humanity from a naked savage up to our present condition; religion has blocked the wheels of the car of progress from Moses to H. W. Beecher. Morality has built schoolhouses and asylums for the poor; religion has built churches and prisons—and the "doctrins" taught in the one hav fitted their pupils for the other. Morality has fought for the rights of humanity; religion has fought for God and the Bible. Morality has developed the brain and muscle of the world, and encouraged thought, science, and invention; religion has expended its powers and mental force devising ways and means to keep men from thinking, and inventing instruments of torture by which to wring another groan from the lips of its despairing victims. Morality teaches us to pay for what we get in good and lawful currency, and work for what we want; religion teaches us to pray for what we get, and trust to God for what we want. Morality is progressiv, and improves on its teachings, adapting itself to the age and progress of the world; religion teaches the same doctrin to-day that it taught in the time of Moses, and its God is the same God of war and hate that he was then. Morality teaches us to be temperate and law-abiding citizens; religion teaches that a dishonest and bad citizen in the church is more acceptable to God than a moral and honest one out of it.

This is the difference between religion and morality, and when the committee revised the Bible, they should hav revised some of Webster's definitions at the same time, so as to hav them conform with our understanding of the words as they are used at the present time. H. O. SOMMERS.

The Bruno Statue at Rome.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: You will see from the inclosed card that the members of the Honorary Committee for the United States hav united as a committee in soliciting subscriptions for the Bruno statue. Colonel Ingersoll takes a decided interest in the matter, and at once generously proposed to giv a lecture upon Giordano Bruno in New York, in the early autumn, for the benefit of the fund. He says that America must send at least $1,000, and that the work of raising it should go right on by $1 subscriptions and upwards. The second instalment of $200 has been opened grandly by Mr. Blodgett, of Michigan, as the list below shows. But the first instalment, intended to be $200, reached only $185.73, leaving $14 27 deficit. I very much wish that those who contributed to the first instalment would send forward enough to make up their round $200. Let them see that it is done at once. The contribution already sent has been handsomely acknowledged in the newspapers sent to me from Rome. Let us raise two instalments of $200 each ($400) before Colonel Ingersoll's lecture comes to complete the $1,000. This can only be done by each as a committee of one calling the urgent attention of friends to the matter. I send also a translation of the description of the monument furnished by the committee at Rome in their "First Number," which shows what the money will do. Yours truly, T. B. WAKEMAN.

CARD.

We hav been appointed, for the United States of America, upon the International Committee, for the purpose of securing the erection of the statue to the memory of Giordano Bruno at Rome. We approve of the object of the committee and request that all subscriptions therefor should be sent to T. B. Wakeman, 93 Nassau street, N. Y., who has been duly authorized by the committee at Rome to receive and forward the same.

Dated July, 1885 (285).

DESCRIPTION OF THE BRUNO STATUE.

The sketch of the monument presented in this "First Number" is the work of Prof. Ettore Ferraro. This artist, who honors with his noble genius and soul both art and the Liberal cause, has undertaken the task of designing this monument without compensation, as far as his work as a sculptor is concerned. The Committee of the University, therefore, confident of interpreting the sentiments of all the friends of liberty, art, and science, expresses to him their warmest thanks and eternal recognition for all his kindness and generosity.

The whole monument will be eight meters in hight (about twenty-six feet). The figure of Giordano Bruno will be of bronze, three meters in hight (about ten feet), standing on a pedestal of granit. On the front of the pedestal there will be the sculptured inscription; on the three other sides there will be three bas-relief figures representing the condemnation of Bruno, the martyrdom of Huss, and Arnoldo da Brescia addressing the people. Above the inscription, and over these bas-reliefs, there will run a frieze of eight medallions representing some of the martyrs of Freethought, such as Huss, Servetus, Vanini, Aonio Palearis, Arnoldo da Brescia, etc. Lying upon the pedestal, in front of the statue, will be seen a palm, the symbol of martyrdom, and a crown, the emblem and reward of those who hav died for liberty of thought and conscience. The bas-reliefs, the medallions, and the emblems are to be of bronze.

Thus Giordano Bruno stands forth as we imagin he would reveal himself by his own words, "The highest God has destined me to be an apostle not last nor least of the better age to come." These are the words written in the book he holds in his hands, and shows to the people.

In the figure itself, as well as in the general effect of the monument, the artist has sought by every line to convey the effect of simplicity and grandeur; this has been done with all the severity in keeping with the subject. Yet in this sketch he represents his first idea only, and reserves the right to change it as he may think best.

The Socialist Catastrophe of England.

The dangers to which monopoly of the soil exposes all property receive lively illustration from a lecture before the Liberal Social Union of London by G. Bernard Shaw, which our contemporary, Liberty, of Boston, republishes.

The remarkable feature of this lecture is not its wisdom, nor its wit, but the fact that under present circumstances it is feasible for a gentleman, a scholar, and proprietor of consideration, to address an audience of the same class—the higher stratum of the middle—with a sprinkling of the aristocracy, in language which begins by considering all other classes, rich or poor, learned or simple, as the slaves of the landlords, which denounces as "cannibalism" the present system of business relations, which repudiates "private property," and advocates the "nationalization of rent." Liberty, in copying these vagaries, enters its protest. But is Mr. Shaw serious? His playful style is not that of a philanthropist crazed by indignation at other people's wrongs, and his real aim is declared toward the close. There he warns his fellow-proprietors in privilege to be in a hurry about saving their bacon by joining the Socialist camp. The usual palaver about averting bloodshed is added, but the gist of the argument is, clearly, self-interest. The educated middle class of property holders are to declare themselvs Socialists for the purpose of disarming Socialism of its dangers; they are to act as the lightning rods of property. For this reason they are to talk Socialist slang, and it is to be consistent with this policy which he urges that Mr. Shaw himself utters such shibboleth as that "the abolition of private property, the equitable distribution of labor and the products of labor among the community, and the nationalization of rent will hav to be accomplished by an enlightened minority."

What is meant by "equitable distribution," and more especially, who are to be the distributors, does not clearly appear. Such vague propositions neither command assent nor challenge denial. This slice of problematical sense is sandwiched between two of patent nonsense, the ça ira of Communist state Socialism.

Talk like this is not a theme for serious argument; it is only a social symptom. Look behind it for the abuses from which it is reactiv, and which alone can make it seem feasible for a moment. Previous forms of expression suggest that Mr. Shaw's analytic faculty is competent to distinguish such private property as is essential to the life uses of the proprietor from such as he controls so as to prevent other people from living. Property in land beyond one's occupation and culture, and property in machinery, which, after having ruined handicrafts, exploits the proletary at starvation wages; property in mines and other natural resources, water privileges, etc., beyond one's personal needs and means of using, are sorts of private property which clamor for privation, and whose abuses may be amputated like excrescenses without touching property in its proper sense, as the organ and sphere of radiation for true personal forces, the extension of the me over the not me of nature. This distinction is the crow to be picked between legality and ethics.

Let us duly place to the credit of the United States government that if landlordry has not reached in this country the proportions which engender Communistic reactions such as those voiced by Mr. Shaw, it is only the fault of our area and the little time, only within a century, that it has been busy in sequestrating the use of the soil from the actual settler. But the difficulties which vastness creates to the exclusiv dominion of a few landed proprietors are happily diminished by the fact that the poorer qualities of soil which remain open to settlers require proportionately more capital for their fertilization and practical availability. Now, a freehold tenure that begins by saddling itself with debt to the capitalist is equivalent to mere tenantry. Only the rich can afford to wait several years for returns of their investments. Only the rich can irrigate or drain. Only the rich can exploit mineral veins. Only the rich can fence out other settlers and maintain a police of their own under government patronage. The manifest destiny, then, of our plains is to follow in the wake of our alluvious, and financial feudalism triumphs all along the line. EDGEWORTH.

Competition.

This term is defined "a seeking together," and by Dr. Johnson as "the act of endeavoring to gain what another endeavors to gain at the same time." Economically, it is said "money-making is the aim of all." Admitting this, although its application has an extremely limited scope, since at the most money is only desired as a means to an end—the greatest happiness—it is still an aim which can be followed from the most widely different motivs. For one can seek to make money himself without seeking to deprive others of the opportunity, and honestly accord to others the proportion due to their effort, without seeking to prevent those less strong or fortunate than himself from sharing in the results of a mutual endeavor.

Competition is free, or forced. The first would result, as claimed, "in enlarging the wealth of the community, and in increasing the luxuries of life." But this cannot be said of the forced competition, which consists simply of the contention where the competitors must gain all or lose all in the struggle, and whose aims become thus, by the misconception that one's own good is incompatible with the well-being of his neighbor, turned, from a simple and justifiable desire to benefit self, into a purport to destroy and ruin others. I accept the usual qualification accompanying the proposition: "It should be the object of the law of the land, as well as of religion, to prevent money-making by immoral means." For certainly the social interests require that competition should be wholly free, so that "money-making" by dishonest, as well as by other "immoral means," should be rendered difficult, if not impossible, and both competitors in the struggle be benefited, and not one to the destruction of the other.

Society can hav no interest in such competition. The use of the term when unqualified may hav the sense of "a seeking together" for mutual benefit, wherein one may strive to outdo or excel the other, but not to overreach or deprive of opportunity or just compensation.

If society cannot legislate to prevent the dishonest and destructiv struggle, it can at least cease to sanction and enforce it. Were several persons to go upon a hunting or fishing excursion, or in search of wild berries or nuts, each one might properly seek to exceed the others in obtaining the better quality or greater quantity, but only the most rude and childish barbarism could countenance the taking of the whole product by the one who chanced to be the strongest, or most successful, or of the usurpation thereafter by him of all opportunity of subsequent pursuit.

Yet such is virtually capitalistic, forced competition. It is the mere measuring of the powers of doing and enduring of competing workers, for the certain gain of neither, but to add wealth to those who keep as far as possible from the arena, as the gladiators of old destroyed each other for the gratification of the wealthy patricians. If current economists or doctrinaire Socialists ignore the above distinctions, and insist that "competition is competition," we cannot be expected to be understood by either, while agreeing and disagreeing with both. It shall not be my fault, however, for want of definition, if I be misunderstood as favoring the operation of a forced subjection, while advocating the broadest freedom, or of justifying dishonest schemes of distribution, while contending for the principles of reciprocation and equity in division and exchange. Free competition is beneficial to all. Forced competition is destructiv to the many. J. K. INGALLS.

CHRISTIANITY WITHOUT A CHRIST.—The suggestion of the play of "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out has caused many a smile; but how about the drama of Christianity with Christ left out? For nearly two thousand years the dismal tragedy has been enacted, unrelieved by a bit of comedy. It has not been a play, but a fearful reality a thousand times more tragic than any stage performance has ever attempted to represent. Myriads of trembling spectators hav been the unwilling witnesses of the hideous spectacle, and multitudes of victims hav been compelled to bear a terrible part in the ghastly drama; but by and by, when it shall hav become known as an incontrovertible fact that there never was any real Christ, and that Christianity existed long before the alleged birth of Jesus, then will come the time to laugh, then the tragedy will be changed to comedy, and the Christian will join the Antichristian and the Infidel in hearty merriment.—Antichrist.

The Burial of Grant.

Last Saturday all of Grant that we call mortal was laid in its final resting-place at Riverside Park upon the banks of the Hudson. That which is destined to survive the grave took a new lease of life and a new hold upon the hearts and minds of the people by reason of the impressiv ceremonies and demonstrations which marked the funeral rites. Thirty-five thousand men marched with the remains from the city hall to the grave at Riverside. The imposing funeral car, drawn by twenty-four black horses, was accompanied by the most distinguished men of our country. The president and his cabinet were there, with Generals Sherman and Sheridan; Chester A. Arthur, John A. Logan, W. S. Hancock, and representativs from nearly every state in the Union. But the great feature of the day was the people who lined the funeral route. The crowd was almost numberless. Nothing like it was ever seen before in this country. It is safe to say that more than one-fiftieth of the entire population of the United States saw the body of Grant go by. Some estimates place the number at 2,500,000.

The whole demonstration was orderly, and the pageant moved on time. At 9:50 A.M., the coffin containing the embalmed body was removed from the city hall, where it had lain in state for two days, and placed upon the catafalque. At that moment a message was sent by telegraph in every direction: "The procession starts." The bells of Trinity began to ring and were echoed from Maine to Mexico by bells which only awaited the signal. Men-of-war lying in the river fired minute guns. Then the great procession moved up Broadway and in all its nine miles' march there were no casualties or accidents of more than trivial nature. The day was not excessivly hot and occasionally clouds obscured the sun and a refreshing breeze would cool the air.

Along the route above the crowded part of the city the scene resembled a country fair. People in holiday attire sat in wagons and beneath trees and ate their lunches, or drank lemonade at the many booths beside the road. There were few traces of mourning except in the drapery of the buildings, but when the great hearse bearing the coffin passed by, the men removed their hats and everyone was silent.

At the temporary tomb was witnessed a scene of unique impressivness, when General Johnston and General Buckner, late of the army of the Southern confederacy, united with the Union generals as pall-bearers around the bier of the man who had conquered them. If the feeling displayed was sincere, the funeral of Grant must furnish a new tie of brotherhood between North and South, and afford fresh evidences that much of the animosity which outlived the war lies buried in the tomb of the victorious soldier.

A Sample.

Just what the people may expect when the "pope's Irish" are in a majority in any town is shown by their action in Port Washington, Wis. The Kansas Blade reports that in this town the Catholics control a majority of votes. At the last annual meeting it was voted to raise in addition to the necessary funds for operating the common school, several hundred dollars for the Catholic parochial school. The extra tax was collected. Three hundred and seventy-five dollars, one-half the sum raised, was paid to teachers employed by the district clerk to the teachers of the Catholic school. Non-residents of the district hav secured an injunction to restrain further payments and suit is brought to recover back what has been paid.

Giv Catholics the majority, and this steal would occur in every school district in the country. The only security for the people is to so amend the constitutions of the states as to make it impossible.

The Place of Music in Nature.

The benevolent Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson has sent us, by a personal messenger, the following observations on music, with the request that they be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We comply with pleasure:

"If a nation may be made to drift into war by the influence of martial music, why may not the spirit of peace be generated and infused by influence of sacred music and song? The poet Lowell says, 'One of his sweetest charities is music.' In our poorhouses there are old men and women, sad, hopeless, weary—long strangers to any gentle ministrations. In our prisons there are dull intellects, and hearts hardened against open religious efforts; in our hospitals there are suffering ones, so worn with pain, so weak, so near the world for which, alas! they hav received no preparation—to all these might be borne on the wings of song the words of life from him who came 'to preach the gospel to the poor, to heal the broken-hearted, to set at liberty them that are bruised.'

"A Christian song has this advantage over a sermon—the truth in it touches the heart of the hearer unawares, when he is not on the defensiv against the gospel. Specially successful may the hymn be if some helpful thought is repeated over and over as in the refrains of the choruses. This will fasten on many a hearer, and sing itself in his mind hours and days after it was heard.

"Educate the hearts of the people by sacred music, and the heart will readily educate the head.

"ELIZABETH THOMPSON."

Whatever is recommended by Mrs. Thompson we may rest assured springs from a philanthropic motiv. A lady of large means, she devotes her money—sometimes perhaps mistakenly—to the interests of progress and the welfare of humanity. Still, we are not prepared to accept without examination the conclusion which she has apparently reached as to the influence of so-called sacred music. The facts do not support her theory.

An essay on the subject is not here contemplated, but, before going further, it may be interesting to consider the question, What is music? Herbert Spencer has a theory about it advanced by him in his article, "The Origin and Function of Music." His explanation of the first manifestation of "music in the soul" is somewhat novel, whether true or not. He says:

"When Carlo, standing chained to his kennel, sees his master in the distance, a slight motion of his tail indicates his but faint hope that he is about to be let out. A much more decided wagging of the tail, passing by and by into lateral undulations of the body, follows his master's nearer approach. When hands are laid on his collar, and he knows that he is really to hav an outing, his jumping and wriggling are such that it is by no means easy to loose his fastenings. And when he finds himself actually free, his joy expresses itself in bounds, in pirouets, and in scourings hither and thither at the top of his speed."

These demonstrations which Mr. Spencer remarks in the dog are the result of pleasurable sensations. Under emotions of an opposit kind, he observes, animals equally display muscular excitement. The enraged lion lashes his sides with his tail; the dog retracts his upper lip; the horse throws back his ears. These are the first exhibitions of the emotions in which music finds its origin. The next manifestation is vocal, and we hav the bark of the dog, the whinny of the horse; and every child knows that its cat is "singing" when it purrs. Both pleasure and pain being emotions, Mr. Spencer concludes, after reviewing the subject at a great deal more length than we are able to do, that all music is "an idealization of the language of passion." No one interested in the science of harmony should fail to read this treatis on the "Origin and Function of Music."

Other theories, that of Professor Rice, for instance, differ from Mr. Spencer's, but mainly agree that, though natural and useful, it has to do principally with the emotions. Universologically speaking, it is art transferred from space to time, and a song is to the ear what a picture is to the eye. So much for a brief definition of music.

The benefit to be derived from music will depend largely on the uses to which it is put. If it hath charms to soothe the savage breast, it hath also power to make for the time a savage of a civilized man. Armies, for example, march out to kill each other, "keeping time to the grand, wild music of war." If martial music subserves no purpose except to make military heroes of men, what will be its function when there shall be no more war? In the Catholic and Episcopal churches sacred music is the outward and audible sign of superstition. What will be its functions when there is no more superstition? The first song, uttered by a barbarian, was a monotonous chant. The priest is the nineteenth-century survival of that barbarian.

The Catholic devotee hears little else besides sacred music, and he hears more of it than the attendant at any other church. Yet the Catholic, we are bound to confess, is not as good or as honest on the average as those who are not Catholics. To suppose that he would be less honest without his music would be to suppose a state of depravity of which we hav no example in civilized countries.

The negro is notably fond of music, and givs way to the emotions excited by it to an astonishing degree. Nearly all his songs are of the religious order, yet they cannot be said to hav made him specially moral, or to hav had any effect at all on his conduct. Sacred songs are often heard issuing from the cell of the condemned murderer. He must hav learned the songs before he came there.

Without mentioning more instances of the worthlessness of sacred music and song as a deterrent to crime, we would say that we see no reason whatever for indorsing Mrs. Thompson's proposed scheme. And this for the very reason that sacred songs fasten in the memory of the hearer the teachings of superstition. The tune may be pleasing and even beautiful, but the sentiment is pernicious. Music that does not outrage the reason at the same time it pleases the ear might result in good, because all pleasurable sensations that are innocent are conduciv to human happiness. That music has its mission, no one will doubt. That is already proved. It is the function of philosophy and science to find out what kind of music has the best influence upon the hearer. "Sacred" music has been tried for centuries, and those who hav listened to it hav been no better than those who hav not.

Colonel Ingersoll recognizes two kinds of music—one which produces states of feeling, that is, the music of time; and the other such as is produced by Wagner, the Shakspere of music, which produces not simply states of feeling, but trains of thought. Though all may not understand precisely how music, unaccompanied by words, can induce trains of thought, yet it will be readily recognized that that kind of music is the need of the hour. It is not the hearts of the people that require moving and educating so much as their minds. It is not the function of the heart to "educate the head."

All of which is respectfully submitted.

All About the Hebrews.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 18th we published an article by James Redpath in which the statement was made that the word Israelite is the title of the theocracy founded after the exodus. A correspondent now writes:

"About the Hebrews you state that the Israelites was the title of the theocracy after the exodus, and in the land of Canaan. Now, I think this is a mistake. The Jews were always a theocracy."

Our correspondent may be right or he may be wrong. It would require some special information upon the subject to decide. Israelite means a descendant of Jacob, who was also called Israel. The word could not hav been applied to the Jews before the time of Jacob, who died 1857 B.C. The exodus was three hundred and fifty years later. "Hebrew," "Israelite," and "Jew" are used interchangeably by lexicographers, and as definitions of one another. 2 Corinthians xi, 22, uses "Hebrews" and "Israelites" synonymously. Mr. Redpath's informant appears to be the first who has drawn a sharp distinction between them. Philippians ii, 5, indicates that the tribe of Benjamin was distinctivly Hebrew. We hear nothing of the Jews in the Bible until we come to the book of Kings. The conclusion is that "Hebrew" is a word older than either of the others, and that "Jew" is more modern than "Israelite." Let us say, then, the government of the Jews was a patriarchy, succeeded by the Israelitish theocracy, which was again replaced by the Jewish hierarchy that existed at the time assigned to Christ. Of course, the priests claimed to derive their authority from God, but that sort of government is practically a theocracy. It is one of the mysteries of the divine plan that while the Jews were governed by God they crucified his son.

Which is Authentic?

Job was probably the first man to come out flat-footed and say he knew that his redeemer lived, and his words hav been extensivly quoted. The declaration about the redeemer occurs in Job xix, and, with its context, it has been pretty seriously revised. In the old version it reads:

"Oh that my words were now written! Oh that they were printed in a book! That they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever! For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth, and though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God."

The English revisers hav put this in Whitmanese verse, and make it read thus:

"Oh that my words were now written!
Oh that they were inscribed in a book!
That with an iron pen and lead
They were graven in the rock forever!
But I know that my Redeemer liveth,
And that he shall stand up at the last upon the earth;
And after my skin hath been destroyed,
Yet from my flesh shall I see God,
Whom I shall see for myself
And mine eyes shall behold, and not another.",

The marginal notes show that even this is not right. Job should hav said:

"Oh that my words were now written!
Oh that they were inscribed in a book!
That with an iron pen and lead
They were graven on a rock forever!
For I know that my vindicator liveth,
And that he shall stand up at the last upon the dust;
And after my skin hath been destroyed
Without my flesh shall I see God:
Whom I shall see on my side,
And mine eyes shall behold, and not as a stranger."

The American committee, again, would giv us these changes:

"But as for me, I know that my redeemer liveth,
And at last he shall stand upon the earth,
Then without my flesh shall I see God."

And put, "And after my skin hath been destroyed," in the margin.

Yet another version is furnished by Signor Beniamino Consolo, a Hebraist of Florence. For perspicuity it is preferable to any of the others:

"Oh, that my words were written in a book, that they were engraved upon a rock! For I know that by and by, long after I am dead, perhaps, some one will rise up who will say successfully what I am now saying in vain. That man will be my vindicator, and posterity will reverse the sentence of my persecutors. I am sure of this, although for me nothing remains but death and corruption."

It is possible that if the good but afflicted Job had foreseen the different constructions destined to be put upon his remarks, he would not hav wished that they might be "printed in a book," but would hav insisted upon their being "graven in the rock forever."

Spelling Reform.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 19, 1878, the following paragraph was printed at the head of the editorial page. It was from the pen of D. M. Bennett:

"To take a needed step in the spelling reform, we hav acted upon the advice of the American Philological Association to the extent of dropping the useless final e in the words have, give, and live, except in such matter as is used in making books and pamphlets. It is hoped other periodicals will see the propriety of this step and act accordingly."

Since the date of the foregoing THE TRUTH SEEKER has kept the promis therein contained to the best of its ability; but the difficulties encountered hav been a good deal greater than anyone at first thought might suspect. In the first place, the compositor must learn anew how to spell, and not alone to spell, but to pronounce. He must learn whether genuin is pronounced genuin or genuwyne. The majority leaned toward the latter, and argument arose. Was the correct orthoëpy of mercantil as here spelled, or was it mercantyle, or mercanteel? Juvenil or juvenyle? The dictionary was overhauled by the printers until every page was spotted with black lead, and until finally the cover came off.

Neither the editor nor his correspondents ever learned to drop the final e in their manuscripts. Some correspondents, indeed, specially requested that the e's should be inserted. It is but just to these to say that most of them hav by long familiarity become accustomed to the reformed spelling, and it has ceased to be objectionable. Many anti-reform readers complained that the word hav looked "bobtailed" and offended the eye; spelling reformers of the radical type accused the editor of inconsistency in not carrying the reform to its legitimate end, and he thus found himself, so to speak, "between the devil and the deep sea."

Some of the articles appearing in the paper were stereotyped and reproduced in pamphlet form. In these it was designed to preserve the old style of spelling, and here appeared a new kind of disciplin for the compositor and proof-reader. In one the e's must be retained, and in another, as well as in books, they must be dropped. Between the force of habit and the attempt to reform, it must be admitted that for a considerable length of time both sorts of matter appeared in type displaying about the same degree of reformation. The e's were put in where they should hav been left out, and left out where they should hav been put in. Considerable expense was thus entailed in correcting stereotype plates, entire resetting being not infrequently necessitated. Possessed of less determination and equanimity of temper than Mr. Bennett, another might hav become discouraged and given it up. He said, "No, when I am satisfied that I am right I never go back." By a division of labor the matter is now adjusted in this office so that little difficulty presents itself.

But it is a cause for some surprise that the new system has not been more generally adopted. Perhaps this is explained by the fact that reform of any kind, from a Graham diet to the bifurcated garment for women, is a sort of heresy. Vegetarians are opposed because "Christ sat at meat," and dress reformers are reminded that "the woman shall not wear that which pertaineth to a man." Besides, mysterious and unaccountable spelling is a great promoter of faith. Prof. Max Müller noted that "a child accustomed to believe that though is tho, and through is throo, would afterward believe anything."

Prof. T. W. Hunt, in a recent number of the North American Review, published an article on "How to Reform English Spelling." He recommends that the movement be begun in the primary schools, with the text-books suitably prepared. Professor Hunt mentions several publications which hav adopted the rules of the "Spelling Reform Association," among them one at least which tried the experiment and afterwards gave it up, but he carefully avoids mention of THE TRUTH SEEKER, although it is to-day the only New York periodical in general circulation using any of the rules of his association. Finally, the Phonetic Educator comes to us with this note of alarm. It is printed in types which we are unable to duplicate:

"LIBERALISM AND THE SPELLING REFORM.

"EDITOR EDUCATOR: In a hasty survey of the list of spelling reform workers, and friends of the cause, I am struck with this peculiarity or fact, viz., that Liberalism and Spiritualism largely predominate, so far as I understand their religious belief, or, at least, if they are not openly avowed Liberalists, they are several removes from old-fashioned orthodoxy. In this connection it may be observed that the organs of these people were the first to adopt reformed spellings. Now what is the inference to be drawn if my observations are correct? Why, what is more natural than that the Freethinker should exercise his reason, that the Rationalist should persist in spelling rationally? But, brother-Christians, fellow-believers in the atoning blood of a crucified savior, shall we abandon reason and rationality in language representation? Shall we leave this grand theme to be pushed and monopolized by the enemies of our holy religion? While it may be said that every Atheist is a spelling reformer, let it not be true that all spelling reformers are Infidels. The lover of the beautiful, the good, the true; the soul expanded by the teachings of Jesus, imbued with the spirit and aspirations of the age in which we liv, should form no part or parcel of the jeering crowd, hooting at every attempt to amend our wretched orthography.

"A. J. PIERCE."

It is of course a mark of ingratitude that THE TRUTH SEEKER should be a spelling-reform prophet without honor among spelling reformers, but that was the way with the prophets before it. The reform was adopted because it is in consonance with rational ideas generally, and it cannot be expected that many Christians will take kindly to anything of that sort.

WE announce with the deepest regret the death at Boston, August 8th, of T. William Doane, author of the work, "Bible Myths," and an occasional contributor to these columns. He was "young, and suddenly beheld life's morn decline,' being but thirty-four years of age. The marvel is that in so short a time he learned so much.——Another writer, this time one "grown old in wars," has also passed away. We learn from the Ironclad Age that Dr. Milton Woolley, of Streator, Ill., died recently, at the age of upward of seventy years. He wrote the book, "Science of the Bible."

THE Banner of Light says: "The Rev. Dr. Bancroft, of Christ Protestant Episcopal church, South Brooklyn, is expected back from Europe at this time, bringing with him a beautiful stained-glass window for the chancel of Christ church, which cost $12,000. It will be one of the most elaborately decorated church windows in Brooklyn. This is a new method of serving the humble Nazarene. It would hav been more in keeping with the latter's teachings had the $12,000 been appropriated to 'feed the hungry and clothe the naked' in Brooklyn and New York. Now, we suppose, the hymn-books of that society will hav to be ornamented with clasps of pure gold. Christ church, forsooth!"

LOIS WAISBROOKER is editor, publisher, and printer of a fortnightly paper called Foundation Principles, out in Clinton, Iowa. It grapples with social, political, and religious reforms, and, very commendably, prints the Nine Demands of Liberalism all the year around. Mrs. Waisbrooker's ism is Spiritual.

MR. WILLIAM THORPE, of Ballston, N. Y., the gentleman who became a Freethinker by a special providence directing his steps to where a detached page of THE TRUTH SEEKER was lying in the street, has forwarded to this office a case of High Rock mineral water from Saratoga Springs, for which he will please accept the thanks of all here concerned.

THE flag of the Chicago Socialists is red and black, signifying destruction, and some of the devices carried in a recent procession were: "Every Government is a Conspiracy against the People," "The Greatest Crime To-Day is Poverty," "Down with the Throne, the Altar, and the Moneybag." The author of these sentiments will be readily detected. It was Gorsuch.

PERHAPS a mistake was made last week in giving the Rev. Joseph Cook the championship as an inventor of untruths. The editor of the Catholic Union and Times makes this astonishing statement: "There is no boon—of liberty, or of learning, or of art—which men enjoy to-day for which they are not indebted to the Church of Rome." Take out the word not in this quotation and it might bear the test of examination in the light of facts. As it stands, it is the reverse of truth.

ACCORDING to a writer in the New York Sun, Mrs. Victoria Claflin Woodhull now fills a high place in English society. Her husband, Mr. John Biddulph Martin, is a wealthy banker. Very soon one of the wealthiest men in England, and titled, will marry Miss Tennie C. Claflin. They will visit the United States from time to time, but their homes will always be in England. It is probable that these distinguished American ladies will find little difficulty in adapting themselvs to the exigencies of London society as recently described.

THE modesty of the Rev. John P. Newman, who preached Grant's funeral sermon at Mt. McGregor, on the 4th inst., has never been conspicuous. A brother-clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Hepworth, editor of the New York Herald, pays him this tribute: "Of an extremely retiring and diffident nature, as sensitiv to the rude blasts of criticism as the mimosa is to a cold northerly breeze, he must be terribly embarrassed by the prominence into which the nation's sorrow has thrust him. It would not be through any self-esteem on his part, but through a frightful blunder on the part of the printer, if that sermon should appear in print as 'The Sermon on the Mount, by J. P. Newman.'"

BROTHER BUCKLEY, editor of the Methodist Christian Advocate, had hard luck this year in his attempt to take a vacation. He "went to a quiet spot. He left much matter written in advance for the emergency, employed a very able editorial writer to assist, and gave instructions that correspondents were to be notified of his absence, and that no mail was to be sent him that could possibly be delayed till his return." "But what happened?" he asks. Dr. Prime and General Grant were so inconsiderate as to die, and had to be written about. The "able editorial writer" was unable to write much, and what he did write Dr. Buckley had afterward to apologize for. The doctor says he has a friend who owns a copper mine 1,275 feet deep, and he thinks of getting lodgings there. The editor of the Advocate has our sympathy. Still there are plenty of able men who would be willing to do his work without any vacation if they could be assured of receiving his salary!

THERE seems to be little room left for doubt that Leo Taxil, one of the founders of the Anticlerical League in Paris, has renounced his Atheistic views. At a meeting of the Paris Freethought societies, convoked to consider his recantation, the following motion was put to vote and unanimously carried:

"Considering that Gabriel Jogand, called Leo Taxil, one of the founders of the Anticlerical League, has abjured all the principles which he defended, and has betrayed Freethought and his co-religionists, the members of the League present at the meeting of July 27th, without pronouncing on the motivs which hav dictated his infamous conduct, expel him from the Anticlerical League as a traitor and a renegade."

The religious people who would point to M. Taxil's conduct as a proof that Freethought is not a satisfactory belief should remember that he has at the same time renounced republicanism. In thus doing, of course, he is perfectly consistent, but he has thereby taken the wind out of the big moral with which his religious recantation is distended.

Lectures and Meetings.

C. FANNIE ALLYN is to speak for the Spiritualists of Cincinnati, O., the last of September and Sundays of October. She will speak during the fall and winter for labor organizations, Liberal Leagues, or Spiritualists. She livs at Stoneham, Mass., where she may be addressed by those desiring her services, which, by the way, are second to none.

W. F. JAMIESON has thrown the clergy and their followers into a feverish state in Cedar Falls, Iowa. One of his subjects in the city park was, "Is the Bible a Total Abstinence or Prohibition Book?" Although he was in favor of total abstinence, he insisted that the Bible was overwhelmingly against it. It was made the subject of reference in two pulpits on Sunday. Mr. Jamieson desires all his Liberal friends who want him to deliver courses of lectures during September in Iowa, Missouri, or Kansas to address him at Burlington Junction, Mo., at once.

Letters from Friends.

BROOKLYN, July 26, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I will offer a theory of the principle of planetary motion that, like all my theories of physical science, will hav the merit of originality, if no other, to recommend it. I desire my theories to be subjected to the gaze of the closest scrutiny and the fire of the sharpest criticism. Unless they can pass through that ordeal and come out brighter for the rough handling they get, I shall not suppose them to be worth preserving.

The solid matter of our planet has a diameter of eight thousand miles. In computing its weight, we may giv full scope to imagination, for there is but little danger of an overestimate.

The density of our illuminated atmosphere is evidently equal to, if not greater than, the density of the matter in which the planet revolves. Therefore, planets should necessarily be enveloped by a greatly attenuated invisible atmosphere of great magnitude—of a magnitude sufficient to neutralize the weight of the dense matter at the center, or it could not possibly be so suspended, by the positivly known law of nature that applies to such phenomena. The fact that they are suspended should be accepted as prima facie evidence that they are enveloped with such an atmosphere.

The extent of our invisible atmosphere was indicated by the comet of 1862, whose trail became perturbed when passing our earth, as though it were in contact with an obstruction. It was suggested through the press at the time that the comet actually came in contact with the earth's atmosphere, which I believe it did, for it is not reasonably supposable that it could come in contact with any other obstruction in that part of the firmament. The comet was, at the time of contact, a little less than eight million miles from the earth; that radius should giv our atmosphere a circumference of a magnitude that should cover the earth's orbit around the center in thirteen revolutions. Please note that fact.

Then, the moon is within earth's invisible atmosphere, and, being motionless, is carried around the earth by the atmosphere, making thirteen revolutions per annum. Please note that fact in connection with the other.

There can be no motion without adequate force to produce it; expansion and contraction (condensation) are the only known agents of all the force that is known to exist in nature. An arctic temperature is met within nine miles above sea level. Therefore, all the force that is known to exist in our planet and to cause its motion is generated and operated within a radius of nine miles above sea level.

All matter beyond that radius, being in equilibrium, can hav no motion but that which is imparted to it by the pressure and friction directed against one side of its inner surface by the eccentric rotation of the inner activ part of the planet and lower atmosphere.

Therefore, the principle of planetary motion is that of a wheel within a wheel, the inner wheel being the driver by whose force and friction the whole mass is driven around the planet's orbit like a ball over a roadway.

"W. H. B." could not hav read the whole of my letter in your issue of July 18th. Had he read my statement that imagination, reason, and will are not matter, but inherent properties thereof; nor can they create matter nor force, but utilize that which is pre-existent, he should hardly be willing to compromise his reputation for fairness, to say nothing of veracity, by charging me with asserting that all matter has been formed out of imagination. The sentence he has quoted cannot be tortured into such an assertion; for every architect and mechanic knows, by personal experience, that no intelligent attempt at construction can be made until an imaginary idea of the form of the structure has been obtained.

I should not, as a friend, nor as a fair-minded enemy, advise "W. H. B." to take out letters patent for his method of controversy, for it is neither novel nor worth patenting.

To his astronomical friend I will suggest that nature is not a mechanic, but a chemist. Therefore, her operations are not effected through the agency of mechanical contrivances, but by chemical combinations. J. A. TUTTLE.

KANSAS CITY, MO., July 28, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The atmosphere around Kansas City has lately been filled with an extra amount of clerical scandal. A certain Episcopal priest of this city was accused by one of his parishioners of administering penance or punishment to a full-grown woman on the spot in his sacristy. The weakness of women for the company of priests was prominently set forth in a pamphlet issued by said parishioner, and afterward published in the Kansas City Daily Times An Episcopal commission, with the bishop present, investigated the matter, exonerating the local priest, whereupon this irate individual sued the Times company for fifty thousand dollars damages, also the parishioner who wrote the pamphlet for a like sum. The first suit came up, but for some reason advanced by the priest was postponed. The last, against the parishioner, has just been concluded, and the defendant acquitted. The Times published in full the testimony, which was of a most depraved character. This paper bravely continues holding up the father to the contempt and ridicule of the world, which he richly deserves, according to the testimony. Meanwhile the priest goes right along with his business of sky pilot, just as if nothing had happened.

A few men and quite a number of women are backing their chosen leader, as if their only chance of heaven and a harp depended upon his individual effort and success. The charges published were of a damnable character, but the jury in the case decided that they were no libel against the so-called holy father. Several little school-girls, whose parents were so concerned about their souls' salvation that a priestly parochial school would only do for their educational training, swore that he had taken improper liberties with their persons. One young woman swore that, after a sacristy confession, he, the priest, assaulted her in a most ridiculous and insulting manner, hence his sacristy has been dubbed a "spankistry" by the local secular press. This witness also swore that she gave the same statement before the commission and bishop, who had the effrontery to whitewash this priest on general principles, to sustain the character of the fraternity as a body.

Another question of importance to the general public is evidently coming to the front, in spite of organized clerical effort to down the specter, and that is, Which shall educate the masses, the pulpit or the press?—whether the slime occasionally oozing from a joint in an ecclesiastical junto shall be covered up by its shareholders, or whether this fountain of foulness, and robed rottenness, shall be purged by the influence of free expression of opinion in a free press?

W. W. JUDSO

SHIPPINGPORT, PA., July 29, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav examined the sample copy of your paper which you kindly sent me at my request, and am well pleased with it and the Liberal spirit that pervades the mass of the matter contained in it. It makes the blood bound through my veins until I can scarcely keep from shouting "right out in meetin'" when I think of the good that must be done by the thousands (I hope they are many) of copies of your journal that are weekly sent out through the land, "to assist the inquiring, animate the struggling, and sympathize with all."

Could a copy of your paper be placed in every family in the land, once a week for one year, I think that many reverend pound-texts would be forced to earn their bread and butter before a great while had elapsed, while the advocates of the Religion of Humanity would be wonderfully increased in number, and thousands be led upward and onward to a more beautiful and Liberal life.

Scattered all over this land are young men and women of intelligence and energy, who take no interest in the doctrins of orthodoxy, who hav a natural tendency to Liberal ideas, and who would gladly climb upward if they only knew where to find the steps. But these are carefully guarded from their sight by laity, clergy, and press. In all my reading of secular and religious papers, I do not remember seeing the name or address of any Liberal paper or publishing house. Could the name, address, and object of the Truth Seeker Company be brought to the notice of the people in general, I feel sure your subscription list would be greatly swelled.

I am a youngster both in years and in Liberalism. From the age of six until that of fourteen I attended Sunday-school, and was carefully drilled in the doctrins of the church that so falsely claims to be the exponent of the teachings of Jesus; but during the past six years the trend of my thought has slowly changed, until to-day, at twenty, I claim to be a Freethinker.

Believing that a knowledge of the Liberals who are doing so much for humanity and progress would be useful to me, I wish to take a Liberal paper. For inclosed sum please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to me during the time for which it will pay, after deducting twenty-five cents for one copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. ELMER LYONS.

CENTRAL POINT, CAL., July 26, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Will you kindly enlighten me upon the following subject? I hav had some discussion on the formation of the Christian religion now existing. My opponent is an Episcopalian, and claims that this religion originated before the time of the Roman Catholic church; that the Episcopal church was not only the first, but that the Catholic religion sprang from it. I claim that the Catholic church was founded by the Emperor Constantine at the Council of Nice in the year 325; also, that the Episcopal religion was founded by Henry VIII. of England, who, becoming infatuated with one of his wife's maids (whose name I think was Anne Boleyn), asked a divorce from the pope of Rome, but being refused, beheaded his wife, married the young lady whose graces had charmed him, and founded a religion to suit himself, which was the Episcopal rellgion. I would like to know if I am right on this question. I was raised a Catholic, but am now a firm believer in the doctrins you advocate. I am greatly interested in ancient mythology, and would like to be set right upon this question. WILL. E. FARR.

[The Protestant Episcopal church, history informs us, was established in this country in the seventeenth century by the English adventurers of that age. It is a descendant and branch of the Church of England, which is said to hav existed in England since the time of Saint Augustine (A.D. 597). Henry VIII. in the sixteenth century, it is claimed, merely rehabilitated that church, and restored its "ancient liberties." Roman Catholicism dates from the Council of Trent, 1563. The dogmas of the infallibility of the pope and the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary were first promulgated in 1854. These dogmas distinguish modern Roman from other kinds of Catholicism. Episcopalians call themselvs Catholics, but not Roman Catholics. They claim an "Order of Episcopal Succession" dating back to Christ as the first, and Peter and Paul next. Roman Catholics call the alleged succession "apostolic," with St. Peter as the first pope. Both use the same creed, the origin of which is doubtful. Each sect claims to be the oldest. The general verdict as to priority is in favor of the institution called the Church of Rome. It certainly did not spring from the Episcopal church. —ED. T. S.]

CORTLAND, OHIO, July 27, 1885

MR. EDITOR: I should hav notified you sooner that I received the last TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL all right. It is splendid. Those noble portraits speak volumes—yes, volumes that they hav written come back to me as I look into their faces; indeed their faces and writings seem brighter to me every day I liv. I hav not given anything yet to the Tent or Campaign Fund, and for that reason I am ashamed to say anything about it, but I mean to get there shortly. There is one thing—now that we hav Liberal Leagues all over the country we can preserve our Liberal literature, and protect our Freethought libraries, and if I giv it will be to help support the same. I hav a small library nearly all composed of Freethought works, but if we are not up and doing, no telling how soon I will be be prosecuted, and my books destroyed. The two pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER of late are excellent. I wish they could be colored up and put on heavy paper. How nice it would look in a frame! A short time ago we had a protracted meeting in our neighborhood. There were three young converts, and they did look innocent too, but what surprised me was, the minister, when about to make the final dip, said, "I am authorized by the Lord Jesus Christ to baptize thee," etc. Now, where is his authority? I must say he had more cheek than the law allowed him. Success to the cause of universal mental liberty. Respectfully yours, J. D. WHEELER.

MOUNT UNION, OHIO, July 21, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I see, by referring to date, that the time for renewal of THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year is at hand. I hope that it may be fully sustained in the good work it is doing in demolishing and breaking up that superstition which has been created by Christianity, so that people may be enabled to practice more humanely toward one another than under the influence and power of Christianity. I believe most strongly in the Nine Demands of our Secular Union. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 4, 1885, under caption "Refining Liberalism," the writer seems fearful of narrow-mindedness among Liberals; a "disposition of carping." He seems to take umbrage at the editor for publishing something about a certain Joseph Cook. I notice in several papers within the last five or six years this same J. Cook is on record, and if he is as there reported, there is not much use in "wasting ammunition on dead ducks." My judgment is that he would not be much of an acquisition, "a bad egg." I do not know who "Liberta" is, or what his qualifications are, but it seems to me he has taken up quite a large "job." When we hav as good an editor as the present for THE TRUTH SEEKER, we had best move slow.

"Liberta" seems to hav almost sullied that part of page 420 of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in the heavy names and epithets he has called to his aid. He seems to be in the same dilemma that he is "carping" at, and in the "Cook" case he might about as well agree to resuscitate a worn-out marble quarry. There is not much there. Mr. Editor, it gratifies me to see that you are able to grapple so successfully with the heterogeneous mass of material you hav to work with. My ardent wish is that you may be as successful in the future as in the past. Let everyone go strong for the Nine Demands, be tolerant to one another, be humane as we profess, usurp no rights belonging to another knowingly, abjure intolerances in every instance.

Please find inclosed three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year. ZENAS P. EDWARDS, SR.

VALLEJO, CAL., July 22, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Liberalism progresses but slowly here for the reason that we hav no speakers. We hav had the exquisit pleasure of listening twice during the past five years to that beacon light of the age of reason, Robert G. Ingersoll, but apart from that we hav heard nothing in support of Liberalism. If we could hav good lectures we could form a very strong organization in this little cosmopolitan town of six-thousand five hundred inhabitants. Although there are eight churches here, there is a large number of Infidels, and a very earnest vein of Freethought pervades the better part of the community. I earnestly hope that the National Liberal League will extend its influence to this coast by sending us a few lecturers. We will extend to them the truest kind of California hospitality. You must not permit this land of milk and honey, with its rich valleys of luscious fruits and waving grain, and its "lofty mountains that like giants stand; its fertil plains, its sequestered vales, its vine-clad hills, its deep blue canons, its furrowed mountain-sides dotted all over with American homes, the homes of a free, happy people, resonant with the sweet voices of flaxen-haired children, and ringing with the joyous laughter of maiden fair, like the homes of New England," to become the inheritance of the Christian oger, and the seat of ignorance and superstition. Decidedly you must not. So, look to it. We are looking to you. Fraternally yours, W. J. TOBIN.

"'Soft as her clime and sunny as her skies,'

BERLIN, N. J., July 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The sermons of H. W. Beecher are the greatest jumbles of truth and error, sense and nonsense, that I ever read, excepting in the Old Testament. e crosses his own track as often as the Israelites did in the wilderness. He preaches about evolution and progression till one would think he had given up everything that passed for religion fifty years ago, and then kicks over all he has said, turns about and picks up the Bible, with its angry, wrathful God, hugs them to his heart, and talks about divine providence and the watchful care of God over us, when he cannot prove that any divine being has any more regard for us than we hav for the worm and bug that crawl in our path by night. He says he believes God keeps special watch over individuals and communities. A year or two ago a volcano and earthquake in Java destroyed many villages and hundreds of lives. If God made the world he placed the materials in the earth that caused the volcano and earthquake; and if he knew all things from the beginning, he knew just what the result would be, and is therefore just as much responsible for the lives destroyed there as if he had gone there personally with Krupp guns and shot all these people himself. A fine specimen of his watchful care, to kill all those people, good and bad together, without giving them any warning, and leaving the universe without even telling people why he had killed their friends! Beecher's Bible says God once reproved a venal prophet by speaking to him through an ass with man's voice. If that is so, why did he not send an ass or some other animal—as his priests are too deaf to hear him—to warn the people of Java of their danger? Were not all those lives worth as much as one old prophet? Shame on you, Mr. Beecher, for clinging to that old book of contradictions, falsehoods, absurdities, impossibilities, cruelties, and obscenities, many parts of which you could not be hired to read to your congregation!

Again, Mr. Beecher says: "God's eye is on me and mine. He cares, he guides, he defends, and will bring me safely through life to life eternal." If that is true, if God watches over you and yours with such loving care, why did he suffer you to become the subject of that terrible scandal and months of trial in court which tortured you and your friends by day and by night almost to distraction? If God defends you, why did he not do it in that trial, and not force you to call in the most powerful lawyers? Why did he not go in an ass or some other animal and, speaking with man's voice, clear you on the first day of trial and save the court all that time of months and you and your friends months of agony? Will you be kind enough to explain this matter? For as your sermons are sent abroad in various papers, they become public property, and we all hav the right to ask you to explain these perplexing mysteries of your "divine providence." JER. HACKER.

HAMILTON, ONT., July 28, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I am so well pleased with your paper that I cannot do without it, so I will inclose $3 in payment for another year. Your paper and I agree in every point, and I can not see why Freethought does not progress more in Hamilton. I guess it is because people are afraid to speak their minds.

I must say R. B. Butland's letters are the most sensible ones written in Canada.

If I were able I would assist in erecting Bruno's statue and also contribute to the Campaign and Tent Funds and the Convention at Albany, but I am only a poor man and find it hard to get along. I am the only Freethinker in this shop, employing seventy men and boys.

Your ANNUAL is splendid. PHILIP LANGLEY.

CLEAR LAKE, DAK., July 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: As nearly every daily newspaper has taken to slandering the town of Liberal, I feel it my duty to throw in my mite in defense of its people. I was there two weeks last March, and I found the people to be sober, industrious, honest, and intelligent. It is true Liberalism carried into practice. The friends I made during that visit I will not soon forget. I noticed an article in the weekly Pioneer Press of St. Paul and Minneapolis, of May 28th, in which appeared, among other lies, the statement that there were three saloons there and that the morals of the people were bad, etc. That everybody who has ever been there knows is an infernal lie. I wrote to the paper and called the editor's attention to it; told him I had been there and was prepared to prove that the statement was false, and wished him to publish my reply to the slanderous article. I hav waited in vain for a correction from that semi-Christian organ. No, they do not want to publish the truth regarding Liberal. That slenderous falsehood still stands there, and the editor knows it is a lie but will not correct it and do justice to a people that are purer ten thousand times than the average of Minneapolis, where, as a traveling man told me yesterday, churches and houses of prostitution are prominent features. I ask every Freethinker in the name of justice to do all in his power to punish such men, and one way to do that is to stop patronizing the paper which can't tell the truth about Liberals. P. J. UMBRITE.

TALENT, OR., July 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Having read nearly all the copies of the Banner of Light, the Investigator, and THE TRUTH SEEKER which hav been published, also many other papers and books on the respectiv merits of Materialism and Spiritualism (for I believe "in proving all things and holding fast that which is good"), I see no reason for either party to speak of the other as being "fanatics" or "deluded" and thus waste their strength instead of using it against ignorance, which is a foe to both. Each party should, with all kindness and truth, giv their facts, then weigh them fairly, like the people of Liberal, who hav done so relativ to the independent slate-writing over the signature of D. M. Bennett. Some writers affirm that in earth life "D. M. Bennett was not a Spiritualist." But as I occupied for several weeks the room in Science Hall, New York, over his editorial and printing office, I was often in his company. On one occasion I asked, "Do you believe in the return of spirits?" His answer was, "Yes; I hav seen too much to hav a doubt about it." Subsequently we exchanged letters in which there was not a shade of difference on the subject.

Our departed friend Leland was also a Spiritualist. I boarded in the house with him several months, with a mutual friend who was a good medium, through whom we had very instructiv communications.

This reference to Mr. Leland reminds me of a correspondence between us upon another subject, and as it relates to the great work in which all reformers should engage, equal justice, I will repeat the substance.

My suggestion to him was that, as enlightened, practical citizenship is the only remedy for all our national wrongs, it would be well to organize an electioneering campaign to continue from now until Ingersolls or kindred Liberals (women as well as men) were duly installed in every office in the country. I think now that it should be a part of the business of the next great meeting of Liberals to nominate a president for the United States and hav plenty of time to compare his religion and politics with his compeers'. More people will investigate principles when associated with a candidate for the presidency of the United States, and thus the masses would rise above the degrading slang of politics.

My proposition is that the most central points of every state should be marked upon a plan for a series of Conventions, and that all the public speakers who can be engaged should attend them in accordance with arrangements for their diversified gifts to be exercised in every place. Two or more should be authorized to attend each Convention, and the local talent of each place should be invited to secure the best music and song for the occasions. The free distribution of Liberal tracts should be thorough at every meeting.

Mr. Leland wrote me a hearty approval of all I proposed. He thought it was practical and if adopted would succeed.

Now, then, as we hav heard and read so much about the facts of Spiritualism and the philosophy of Materialism, let us apply the best which we hav learned from each for the interest of all the people, without exception to race or sex. The achievement of this object is alike important to the people of the South as it is to those of the North, so that instead of conflict there should be union of all the best forces of our nation to blot out all oppression, and to fill the land with peace and gladness. JOHN BEESON.

NEW YORK, Aug. 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed, from the New York Times of today, I send you for the purpose of asking your opinion of it:

"GRANT'S MESSAGE TO THE CHILDREN.

"The Philadelphia Sunday-School Times reproduces, as below from its centennial number of June 17, 1876, the following message from President Grant to the children and youth of the country, and says that the words printed in small capitals were doubly underscored by him in his original manuscript:

"WASHINGTON, June 6, 1876.

"To the Editor of the Sunday School Times, Philadelphia:

"Your favor of yesterday, asking a message from me to the children and youth of the United States, to accompany your centennial number, is this moment received.

"My advice to Sunday-schools, no matter what their denomination, is: Hold fast to the Bible as the sheet-anchor of your liberties; write its precepts in your hearts and PRACTICE THEM IN YOUR LIVES.

"To the influence of this book are we indebted for all the progress made in true civilization, and to this we must look as our guide in the future.

"'Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people.' Yours, respectfully, U. S. GRANT."

Is this a pious lie? If it is, it should be met and exposed. Orthodoxy will, no doubt, try hard to make capital out of General Grant's views on matters theological, but they should not be allowed to misrepresent in any particular. Keep your eye on them. From your friend, K. D. C.

[We are unable to say whether this letter is genuin or not. Perhaps Grant was not above seeking the kind of popularity to be gained by writing that sort of hogwash. If he wrote the letter it is certain that he was a bad adviser of youth, and had formed a very erroneous estimate of the influence of the Bible on civilization. The production of the original letter would be a better proof of its authenticity than the fact that it appeared in the Sunday-School Times.—ED. T. S.]

ZANESVILLE, O., July 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Will you permit me to reply to Mr. J. R. Perry's communication in the issue of July 18th? It is not often I take up my pen to defend my principles, or am called upon to defend them, and especially to oppose an old and tried contributor to our TRUTH SEEKER. Nevertheless, as I deal in facts, as I deem them, I shall endeavor to defend them. I hav given Mr. Perry's communication a careful reading, and its just deserts, as far as I was capable. And in his proof relating to the existence of living spirits, I find nothing to oppose except the theory which makes up the first half of his communication. I ignore no fact. Phenomena pertaining to things after death are beyond nature and not proven. I admit of no spirits as Spiritual phenomena, unless the spirit is produced. I will admit a spirit livs after death, if materialized as claimed by mediums for a talk and shake of the spirit hand. I said in the article published: "When dead it ends all, and ends the individuality of the person. And the elements of which the body is composed separate and are eliminated into other forms and things, and are absorbed into and become a part of the fountain-head." Mr. Perry says there is no fountain-head. This statement surprised as well as amused me. I hope he did not try to pervert; I only think he misunderstood. I will try and make it more plain. All nature, I deem, constitutes the fountain-head—all the living and the dead, as well as the mineral and vegetable, earth, rocks, seas, air, and everything combined (excepting spirits). Is there any begging the question? I think not. To prove my proposition, I hav only to take away the fountain-head (nature), and where does it leave him or anyone who doubts? I said nothing about elements ever changing. I said they separate and pass into other forms and things, and become a part of the fountain-head (nature) again. I will even accept the misconstruction put on my words, and say elements never change. There is no matter, as generally understood, but what is a combination and of separate and different elements—gas in water, fire in stone—electricity permeates through and in almost everything. Separate, it becomes a simple individual element. He carries the impression that when combined it is changed. How changed? Is electricity changed when in combination, or is it annihilated? Elements are the same whether individually or in combination. Can wood be made out of electricity alone. But still a combination is there, and if electricity, or a particle of it, is in the wood, is it not electricity? The question was not mooted in my former article, and I giv this "free gratis." I agree when he says matter has no creator, and of necessity no destroyer. When he says the atoms that compose the natural body at death pass into other combinations, I agree. Nevertheless, all elements that constitute the body are elements still, however separated.

A beautiful theory is not always true. I only want a spirit to show himself, and long enough to convince Materialists. What I ask is the easiest and most convincing. I hav seen bodies said to be materialized, but they will not stand investigation. I saw one of the Davenport brothers here, and his hand was caught by an outsider. In getting loose from the grip he hurt his hand, and still that was the hand represented as spirit. I am pointed to Liberal, of Missouri, and to the sworn statement of Mr. Walser. I hav read of many things more wonderful. No doubt Mr. Walser is honest and gave the statement just as it was. All such phenomena amount to the same. Giv us the spirit; let us see, hear, and feel it. The statements I do not dispute, but it being done by spirits I do. Slate-writing is not evidence. I don't doubt the sincerity of an honest man. But I do say that until you prove a spirit livs and is something, an identity, the something that manifests the thing itself, you hav no case.

Again, when mediums can materialize in one place, why not in another place? Do they fear exposure? If honest, I think not. The conditions demanded by mediums look suspicious, and fraud may be hidden out of sight.

Speaking of Mr. D. M. Bennett, he was a good man and of broad views. He was my friend, although I never saw him. He gave us solid bread and comfort in THE TRUTH SEEKER. When living he was a true, manly man.

It makes no difference what may hav been claimed to hav been seen pertaining to spirit; I repeat it is only a claim. Facts are wanted, not phenomena, or a temple for assumed spirits. Slates are put in closets, door shut; writing appears on the slate and looks like that of D. M. Bennett. Do you call this proof of a spirit? It is absurd on its face. But he will say that it is a direct phenomena tending to a proof of spirits. It is tendency to nothing of the kind. If you hav seen mountains removed, or a man flying through the air by pulling on the straps of his boots without other visible cause, it does not tend to prove a spirit. If Mr. Perry has seen slate-writing produced at home with his wife in daylight, will he come here and do the same thing? I'll bet my bottom dollar he will refuse. Why? Simply because he cannot. The highest sum named in my challenge will be given even for that much (slate-writing) under the conditions named. Come down to rock-bottom and do it for me if you can. Things said to hav been done are only second-hand, and, therefore, "no revelation to me." I will furnish the slate; no medium shall touch it under my conditions already named. I defy all the spirits on earth to write on that slate.

I said in the article published, "Spiritism is an outgrowth of creed." I still say so. Soul, or spirit, was first invented by the pagans and plagiarized by Christians, with fire, brimstone, hell, and damnation added and accepted by all Christendom. Christendom before Spiritists. Spiritists after Christians. Spiritualists plagiarized from both pagans and Christians. The belief in soul or spirit is a dogma—a creed. The last was taken from the first. The first, if true, is the only true one. Spirit, not being invented by Spiritists, is nothing but an outgrowth of the older creed of soul, and a borrowed creed at that. I do not say Spiritists believe all the creeds of dogmatic religion. But the Spiritists do take the pagan and the Christian creed of soul or spirit.

If spirits can tumble chairs around ten feet away from the medium, why not tumble a weight here? It would confer an everlasting favor on me. His proposition to come there is not quite square. I hav not the time to devote to fancies. I made my proposition and it shall stand. I do not propose to let another hand but my own hold the pebble, but I guaraatee nothing shall interfere with its rising except its own weight, for right there lies the trick.

Mr. Perry says the human mind is something. This I deny so far as to say it belongs to the organization. I say it is a state, a condition. He says mind, being something, comes from something. I say, being nothing, nothing remains. He says something cannot go into nothing, and I am sure he is right. Will he tell me how nothing can grow into something, mind being nothing, except a state or condition? Even if I admit mind to be something, that something emanates from the brain, is necessarily a component part of the brain, and stands in the same relation to it as vapor or steam to water. The mind is a substance of the brain, being hatched in the brain, and constituted of brain matter, and when the master, brain, is struck with death, and ceases to act, mind goes with it, and it dies. Will Mr. Perry tell me whence come two separate, distinct individualities—body and spirit—one body possessing two separate identities, or two intelligences? No organization is perfect without mind. Man has no pre-eminence over a beast so far as a mind (not its quality) is concerned. The rights of one are the righ s of the other; therefore all created things hav minds (not souls or spirits). To prove my proposition you hav only to remove the brain—mind is annihilated. Mind ceases when death enters the brain.

Again, a tree before the shining sun casts a shadow; remove the tree—the shadow is gone forever. No doubt this will be disputed on the principle of phenomena. Will Mr. Perry tell us what a spirit is? What made of? Tell us of the something augmented or added? Whence it came? Will he tell me, or admit, that man is nature and must die? If so, whence comes this augmented something or spirit that he declares can write on slates? Will he say that the spirit augmented or added in man is a separate identity, existing or made to exist to order? If a spirit is of earth, nature its maker, it must die, is the conclusion of your humble servant, J. BURGESS.

MR. EDITOR: The "Balaams" you sent me hav come all right. They are just splendid, for they speak volumes of truth to the thinking mind. And now I want a dozen of the "Christian History." They are more than glorious for Christians to study. I am glad the Freethinkers' brains are not idle when there is so much need of activ workers, and hope they will liv long and work ever for liberty and humanity.

I am looking round to see if I can find a sufficient number of Liberals bold enough to try and hav Mr. Remsburg stop off here, and giv us a lecture when he goes to the Convention. It will make a great flutter among the churches, but let it come.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Now is the Time.

Now is the time; leave not undone
The work which thou can'st do to-day,
Because you think to-morrow's sun
Will shine with a more cheerful ray.

Now is the time; how many say,
At such a time I will begin
A better life, and cast away
My old companions, sloth and sin!

The time comes 'round, they're still the same,
To every vice and sin a slave;
Or worse than that, perhaps their name
Is carved above a drunkard's grave.

Now is the only time we know;
The future is by no one seen.
Thou can'st not tell how much of woe,
Despair, and trouble lies between.

Now is the time; do not put off
One moment of the blessed Now;
But struggle on—let sluggards scoff—
Success must, and shall, crown thy brow.

'Tis ever thus; in life we must
Be earnest, or we cannot win
That prize of happiness and trust
That cheers the heart and wards off sin.

A Haunted House.

"Who wants to go rowing? Doesn't Mrs. Hartley want to go? Come ahead, whoever's in the mood for a nice row around the island, or over to the haunted house, or anywhere you please," and James started for the shore with the row locks and the oars. Mrs. Hartley was not caring for a trip on the water, but Bertha and I were both agreeable, and we were soon on board the little gem of a boat, Jennie, named for its owner, a sweet girl and our next door neighbor. Bertha went majestically aboard in rubber boots, splashing through the water like a man. I like to hav my feet wet, and with shoes and stockings tossed in the stern of the boat, I boldly waded in through the sea-grass, as if I had been a sailor all my days, and hopped in the boat as easily as James himself.

"Across the water to the haunted house," said I. "This is not the hour for spooks and sprites, but never mind, we shall see what we shall see."

Bonnie doggie was bound he would go with us, and followed the boat, swimming till his caution told him he had better go back or he would be drowned. Back he went on shore and ran along the bluff, and down upon the little point at the end of which he fondly hoped he might intercept our boat. He appeared so cunning standing in the long, green, beach grass, with only his homely little head visible. Bonnie is not a very pretty animal, as I just heard a lady remark. "What a homely dog!" she said. "What matter?" said her companion; "He's just as good inside!" and so he is. It is not altogether the outward appearance with which we hav to do, with dogs or persons.

A delightful row soon brought us to the opposit shore where we pulled our boat up and anchored her, so that she need not drift away while we were rambling o'er the fields and strolling through the deserted rooms of the "haunted house," which is close to the shore.

James went barefoot, and so did I, while Bertha stalked ahead in her rubber boots like a brigadier-general.

A part of the haunted house is in ruins, and the floors are all rather shaky. We were possessed by a feeling of solemnity and awe as we traversed the echoing rooms where the sunlight streamed through broken windows, and the broken doors swung on creaking hinges.

"This must hav been the kitchen," we said, as we stepped carefully over the rickety floor.

"See the big fire-place and the big brick oven!" said James.

It did not require a great stretch of the imagination to see the loaves of brown bread, pots of beans, pies, pumpkin, mince, and apple, and the little pie in a saucer for the baby; and oh! such delicious Indian puddings as hav come out of that old-fashioned oven. We almost seemed to see the rosy faces gathered around the table at meal-time, and to hear the merry voices of the children who once loved to gather there. Off from this room was the pantry.

There were the long shelves, once adorned with lovely old-time dishes of deep dark blue and white earthenware, and rows of pewter plates and platters that came, perhaps, originally from England.

Oh, what fancies ran through our brain as we stepped carefully over the loose, worm-eaten boards from room to room, lifting softly the awkward wooden latches of the doors, listening, as if we almost expected to hear the voices of the long ago, or involuntarily turning our head, as though shadowy forms were stealthily following our footsteps through the forsaken mansion.

There were the front rooms—"fore-rooms," they used to call them—facing the fields and deep green pines, whose music, as the winds played among them, was as sweet in the years agone as to-day. From one window in each room could be seen broad glimpses of the blue waters of the bay and the wide stretch of forest and glade of the then uninhabited Onset.

We thought of the high, fond hopes that came into that house with the owners; how the young couple lived, loved, worked and planned together, building and hoping for the future; how, by and by, little feet went pattering along the floor, baby girls in pink calico dresses and baby boys, stout and handsome; how they frolicked and played in those old rooms, and went peeping into the cupboards and watched the old clock in the corner, as it ticked, ticked, ticked the time away. We thought how they ran, calling "Papa, papa," as the father came out in the twilight to feed the cattle and make them comfortable for the night, and as we went up the old worn stairs, we seemed to hear little ones climbing beside us, and to hear sweet child-voices calling, "Mamma, I'se a coming!"

When the children were grown, and young men and young women stood where the babies once had been, we fancied them, clad in home-spun, on Sundays, looking out over the same stretch of land and water upon which our eyes rested, and the young men hastening away to meet gay companions, or one who was sweeter to them than the whole wide world, while the girls watched eagerly for the coming of the rustic lover, who, in that same old room, painted pictures fair and bright as any that passes before a maiden's vision this summer day.

There were parties, merry-makings, quiltings, and bridals in that old house in the days and years gone by, and one and another went out to make new homes and new happiness, to sing again the song of love and joy, as it has oftentimes been sung, and as it will be to the end. There had been the home-comings too, the glad returning, the kiss of welcome and the word of love, again and again in that old, dilapidated house. And, ah! there had been funerals there; dear voices had been hushed forever in that home, the light of loving eyes had been extinguished, and sorrow and mourning had been heard within those low walls, from which the plaster was now falling and lying in heaps, like little bunches of snow on which the dust of the road has fallen. We seemed to see the long procession winding down the lane, and loved ones bearing away the precious remains of the dear child to its long and silent repose in the old family burial lot, and in the deep grief of that hour we hav no doubt the survivors felt that they had parted with the dearest one of all, and amid the struggling shadows there seemed no sunshine in the world. But after awhile hope sprang to life again, cares crowded, and the brightness came once more, but never again with its former strength and freshness.

And ah! how the voices once rang through that old house, in songs of joy and moans of sadness! How many, many feet, manly and womanly feet, little toddling feet, brisk, joyous, girlish and boyish feet, until the oaken thresholds were worn down as smooth as glass! Now they had changed to dust. The smiles had gone out into darkness, the bright eyes had faded all away, the voices were all hushed, and only the old house, fast changing into dusty particles, broken and windowless, with tottering timbers and falling roof, remained, a silent witness of what had been.

They said the house was haunted. It was haunted by thousands of memories that seemed to cling like clustering ivy around it in its motionless desertion.

There were ghosts of other days flitting to and fro, from room to room, and, mayhap, watching the woodbine that clambered up its ruined roof, the burdock that spread its broad, green leaves upon the very fire-place where, in other days, the children had warmed their fingers before a glowing fire!

In a corner of the open chambers a hen had made a quiet nest, and from day to day went there to leave her snowy eggs. In a cupboard where once was laid carefully away the handsome Sunday bonnet, was a Maltese cat and her seven little kitties, cuddled together as cunningly and sweetly as you please.

And these were all the ghosts visible to our eyes.

While we were fondling the kitties we heard a shout, "Blackberries!"

We followed the sound adown the lane, and into the open meadow. Bertha picked a few blackberries, but they were hardly ripe, and then we gathered great clusters of the real golden-rod, daisies, yarrow, wild pinks, red-lilies, and lovely grasses.

Then we went down in the orchard, the old, old orchard, with limbs dead and dying, but which dear old Time had covered tenderly with soft, green mosses, and many clustering ivy leaves. Wild grape vines covered the old stone walls, and now and then a wild cherry tree gave promis of fruitage by and by.

We had been walking barefoot over the fields, but the grass had been cut in the orchard, and it hurt our bare feet, for we left our boots in the boat. But we scrambled along as best we could, until a fiend in the form of a wasp, or some other insect, stung us, and we uttered a terrific shriek, and fell prostrate beneath the sheltering branches of one of the old apple trees.

"What's the matter there?" halloed James.

"Something has stung me," we shrieked.

"Why didn't you put your shoes on, then?" he asked, laughing.

"We wanted to be a little barefoot boy!" we said.

Oh, if that ankle didn't pain us! But we limped along to the boat, and coming home we wanted to to hang the stung foot in the water, but James objected.

"Do you want to upset the boat?" he said.

"No," we answered.

"Well, then, don't be a fool!"

We tried not to be, and fell to meditating about the "haunted house" that stands there in its innocence and fast decaying loneliness, and we wished we had our troop of girls and boys, who will read this, all there, rambling amid the ruins, and over the hills of the Burgess homestead.

Correspondence.

Middle Falls, July 27, 1885.

Miss Susan H. Wixon, Respected Friend: Believing, as I do, that the children of Rationalists are naturally brighter and better, mentally and morally, than those of their neighbors reared under the degrading influences of superstition, I am more than pleased to see our paper devote each week a page to their entertainment and instruction, where the rudiments of knowledge may be blended in a pleasing form with wit-sharpening exercises, unmixed with the seeds sown by a false theology, which, springing up in the young mind, only too often take years of after pain and mental suffering to eradicate, if indeed the effects are ever wholly overcome. Well has the church said, "Giv me control of the children, and I am impregnable;" and all her art is employed to secure their attendance, and so warp and distort their growing minds that only the visionary seems the real, and the more outrageously absurd the story the more readily is it believed.

By false education most hav been misled,
So they believe because they were so bred.
The priest continues what the nurse began,
And thus the child imposes on the man.

The harm done in this direction may hardly be over-estimated, and I trust the Truth Seeker children may never hav the vexatious trouble of unlearning, in coming years, false teachings acquired in youth.

I see that several of your correspondents hav sent original poems, and I inclose herewith three, which were written some years since at the age of fifteen. They hav been published, but will be new to readers of the "Corner," and if acceptable, are at your disposal. I commenced to contribute poems to the press at the age of fourteen; and, although they were doubtless crude enough, had none declined, all being accepted and published. The refining influence of poetry is greater than imagined among the young, and a taste for it and for poetical composition may be cultivated that will prove a pleasure in years to come, and render agreeable as a pastime many an otherwise wasted hour. Let our young friends try it—not alone for the recreation it affords—and see how rapidly they will learn the rules of correct English composition, and the broader knowledge and kindlier feelings they will acquire. Very truly yours, D. Louis Bodge

LETTER FROM A TEACHER.

Camp Douglas,
Manistee, Mich, July 25, 1885

Dear Miss Wixon: Knowing that you like to interest all the little people who come within your reach, I thought I would write to-day and tell you about my boys and girls, and the merry times they hav this beautiful summer weather in the green and leafy woods. It is impossible to hav any school during the cold winter months; consequently, when many of us are sighing for a whiff of the bracing sea-breeze, these little men and women are in school, busily conning their books.

Young maples and poplars grow near the school-house, and of the latter the children construct cool, shady playhouses to amuse themselvs in at recess. They select a spot where there are five or six young trees. One by one they bend them down, and jump upon them until they incline sufficiently for their purpose. Then they bring the tops together, and by weaving the branches in and out, or resting them upon other trees, form nice, covered inclosures. There are always enough logs and stumps around to serve for benches and chairs.

Not far from the house is another inclosure which is fitted up as a store. Boards placed between the trees serve as counters, and on these are displayed all the articles found in a camp store—groceries, dry-goods, boots and shoes, logging implements, and a post-office. Some of the advertisments are cute, and explain themselvs:

"Bracelets,
Made of Fresh Poplar Bark, in all New Styles,
10 cents each.
Sold by Winnie & May."

One other will be sufficient to show you that children naturally engage in the business which promises good return:

"Hemlock Bark,
Very Thick and Good, Furnished at Short Notice by H. Leitch.
Taken to Manistee on Rafts.
All Persons Treated Alike."

I think that nearly all of them engage in buying and selling with more vim and energy than anything else they do. They believe in co-operativ housekeeping. They take turns in doing the house-work—sweeping, dusting, and arranging their pictures with deft fingers, always hastening, however, to the store as soon as their work is done. Does this not prove that business and house-work, under proper restrictions, need not interfere with each other?

I hav three dogs who attend school with great regularity. Towser is a large brown and white shepherd dog with lovely hazel eyes. He reminds me of an affectionate child who cannot help showing his feelings. He lavishes kisses upon me every chance he can get. The other two are Carlo and Tip. They are hounds of jetty black hue, and possess deep, dark eyes. Tip is reserved by nature, and cannot form acquaintances easily. He is a good hunter; always on the alert, quick, eager, and anxious to be off to the woods. Carlo is open-hearted and a stanch friend. He has a warm, loving disposition, and hungers for caresses. They all sleep under the school-house during the time school is in session, but at recess they are wide awake and ready for a frolic. The other night, after I went home, I took my work and sat down in the door where it was cool. Tip and Carlo stretched themselvs out in front of me on the grass. The lady with whom I board started for the next house with her water-pail to get some water. Carlo and Tip started after her. They ran along a few feet, then stopped; Carlo looked at me, Tip did the same. I did not call them back, as I wished to see what they would do. There they stood for three or four minutes, as if considering the matter—ought they to leave me? They looked at me again with beseeching eyes, as if asking advice. Carlo walked gravely back, licked my hand as much as to say, "I will not leave you." Tip stood wagging his tail, vainly trying to solve the weighty problem. At last he came running back and laid his glossy black head in my lap. I put my arms around my faithful black friends and said tender words to them. It was beautiful to watch them while they stood trying to decide what the right thing was. I will reserve some other little items until another letter, as I fear you may be weary with reading my long epistles. M. E. H.

An Adventure in India.

"I choose that a story should be founded on probability, and not always resemble a dream. I desire to find nothing in it trivial or extravagant; and I desire above all, that under the appearance of fable there may appear some latent truth, obvious to the discerning eye, though it escape the observation of the vulgar.—Voltaire

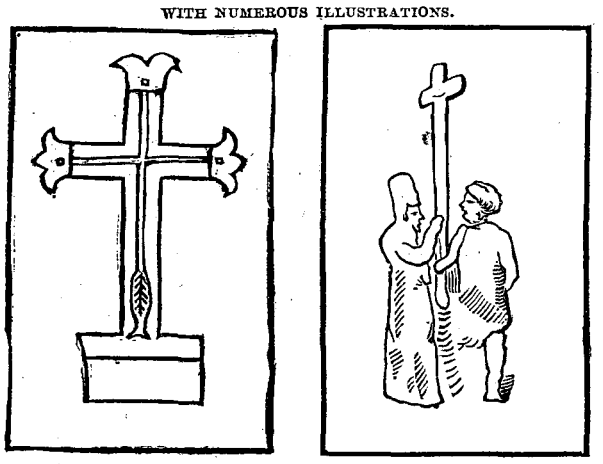
BIBLE MYTHS,



AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. BIBLE MYTHS shows this.

The Missing Link
—IN—
MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. Poetry.

An August Evening on Lake George.

The day fades in the western skies,
The busy hum of labor dies,
And night comes hastening on.
The wood-bird's echoing notes are still;
But from the line of leafy trees
That skirt the beach, the evening breeze
A melody has drawn;
Low, trembling, soft, a plaintiv rhyme
To which the lapsing waves keep time.

Beyond the wave-smoothed silver sand,
Tall in their pride the monarchs stand,
Their tops by sunset crowned.
Lulled by the breeze that barely stirs
Their trembling leaves, their boughs repose,
As evening's lengthening shadows close
The peaceful scene around,
And calm, unmoved, from discord free,
Seem lost in dreamy reverie.

As sinks the sun, the roseate hue
Far up the broad expanse of blue
A richer radiance lends.
Each cloud floats in a sea of gold;
And o'er the lake's slow-moving swell
Such glory lies, one scarce can tell
Where wave or azure ends!
So lightly heaves its placid breast,
So softly goes the day to rest.

Closer the gathering twilight folds
One distant peak alone that holds
The last expiring beam!
And now the lessening light retreats;
The shadows from its wooded base
Creep slowly up, with steady pace,
And quench the lingering gleam;
While clouds that change from gold to gray
Retreat, grow faint, then fade away.

From silence summoned to rejoice,
Each insect now, with tuneful voice,
The choir of evening swells;
The cricket pipes from hedge and stone;
And in the leafy branches hid
A sprite proclaims that "Katy did,"
But what, he never tells!
While clear from each low grassy mound
Shrill, quavering notes, at times, resound.

In hoarse alarms at times is heard
The protest where Night's solemn bird
Keeps his lone woodland reign.
And in quaint concert to the ear
The calls of wandering birds are brought
In varying cries, now faintly caught,
And then distinct and plain,
Where echo from the distant hill
The sharp notes of the whip-poor-will.

The moon at full, an orb serene,
In clear and rounded beauty seen,
Now climbs the eastern sky;
Whence pours in beams her silver flood,
And where it falls new beauties bright
Bathed in the soft and tender light
In splendor meet the eye—
Rich scenes of blended light and shade
With rarest gilding overlaid.

Softly the lustrous glory falls
On silvery stream and mountain walls,
On island, beach and bay!
And to the listening spiritu's ear,
Lightly as music heard in dreams
Time's footsteps come, while Nature seems
With folded hands to pray.
The hushed world lies in tranquil sleep
And solemn stars their vigils keep.

Now drops the feeble breeze its strength,
Dying, until the leaves at length
Rest in their sleep unstirred.
While, faintly brought, the lake's soft tone,
Seems harmonized with peace profound,
Like Night's own melody of sound
Or Love's low murmur heard;
Where, o'er the beach of snow-white sand,
Light waves go tripping hand in hand.

Thus through the night, in calm content,
O'er thy fair breast, St. Sacrament,*
The peaceful hours go by.
And memory oft, in days to come,
When Time has brought his hours of care,
Shall turn my wishful thoughts to where
Thy sparkling waters lie,
And brightly to my view shall rise
The glory of thy sunset skies.

D. LOUIS BODGE.

*The name given to the lake by Champlain in 1609.

Singular Freak of a Texas Clergyman.

The Rev. Surplus Eel, or Parson Eel, as he was more familiarly called in Austin, was a rather stout, middle-aged clergyman, who had heretofore had the respect and confidence not only of his own congregation, but of the community at large, but who got himself into a scrape which impaired his social status, and caused him to move away from Austin.

He had been denouncing very severely from the pulpit the custom that some very respectable people of Austin had of stopping their carriages in front of beer gardens while out riding, and having the cooling beverage brought out to them.

Parson Eel himself kept bottled beer in his house in the refrigerator, and found it very useful in alleviating his sufferings from the warm weather. Figurativly speaking, he made it hot for bottled beer, but he had never been known to get beer at a saloon.

One day Parson Eel had occasion to visit professionally a wealthy believer living near Mount Bonnell, several miles west of Austin. The parson went on horseback, because the doctor had recommended horseback exercise as an antidote for his increasing corpulency, caused by his overfeeding, and because his buggy was at the repair shop to hav a new spring put on it.

Paason Eel reached the residence of the invalid in safety, and was easily persuaded to stop for dinner. After he had done justice to a very good dinner, and was about to take a midday siesta, it suddenly occurred to him that he had an important engagement that afternoon and that he had to hurry home. So he mounted his horse and turned his face toward the busy haunts of men.

He returned to Austin via West Pecan street, by the road that crosses the railroad. The day was one of the warmest of the season. The heat was terrible, and the limestone dust, for which Austin is famous, made him very thirsty. His throat and mouth were parched with thirst, and somehow or other it seemed to him that the nearer he got to Pressler's beer garden, in the western suburbs of Austin, the greater were his sufferings. He removed his coat and tied it behind his saddle, but that did not relieve his thirst. How he wished he was at home, where he could get to the refrigerator and tap an ice-cold bottle of beer in the interest of science!

At last he was at Pressler's Garden. There were no vehicles in front of the place, and no guests in the garden, as it was rather early in the afternoon. Parson Eel looked all around. There was nobody in sight on the dusty road. The barkeeper who brought out beer to the sinful people in carriages had never seen him before. Would it be wrong for him to slake his thirst with a couple of glasses of beer? One glass would hardly lay the dust halfway down his throat. The second one would reach its destination in his midst and relieve his sufferings. Once more Parson Eel glanced around. The coast was clear. He rode boldly up to the door, and to the blonde German who appeared he said,

"Two schooners of beer, quick."

A minute later, Parson Eel, still sitting on his horse, had a schooner of foaming beer in each fist. He was just about to raise the right-hand schooner to his lips, but alas! "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip." He glanced around once more to see if anybody was looking, and, horror of horrors! coming down the road, not fifty yards distant, was a horse and buggy, and in the vehicle were Mrs. Colonel Perey Yerger and Mrs. Peterby, both ladies being members of his own church.

Fortunately he saw them before they saw him. They were talking together and not looking out for beer-drinking parsons. Parson Eel turned as white as the foam of the beer. He was so impolite as to keep his back turned to ladies, but under the circumstances he was justifiable. He reverentially held the two schooners in front of himself, on the outside, however, as if he were saying grace over them. He thought that horse and buggy would never go past, and he deprecated the slowness of the horse that enhanced his chances of detection, and kept him from putting the beer in the place where it properly belonged.

Neither of the ladies suspected for a moment that the broad back and vest of the rider belonged to their pastor, and all would hav ended well had it not been for Parson Eel's horse looking after the receding buggy, and recognizing perhaps an old acquaintance in the animal that propelled it, or for some other reason. he deliberately turned and began to walk rapidly after the aforesaid receding vehicle. Parson Eel could not reach for the reins to check up the animal, as he had a schooner of beer in each hand. In a gentle voice, so as not to be heard by those in the buggy, he requested the horse to "Whoa," instead of which the animal, finding himself still unrestrained by the reins, trotted briskly after the buggy, and before Parson Eel could collect his thoughts and get rid of the evidences of his guilt, he was within ten feet of the vehicle, being jolted up and down, holding out a schooner of beer at arm's length as if he was inviting both Mrs. Yerger and Mrs. Peterby to stop and try some themselvs. Poor man, such was not his intention! He wanted the beer for himself. But that's the way it looked to an unprejudiced spectator, for old Uncle Mose, who was passing at the time, gazed in astonishment at this new kink in the way of serving beer on horseback, calling the attention of the ladies in the carriage to the treat in store for them, by pointing to the parson, and saying:

"Hold up, dar, ladies; he is bringin' yer yer beer. Jess hold up, ladies."

Mrs. Yerger looked back, and then she saw her own beer-denouncing pastor, with a painful expression, bobbing up and down, holding out two glasses of beer to her, and saying:

"Stop, you blankity blank brute—hold up!"

Parson Eel was addressing his conversation to the horse, but Mrs. Yerger thought he was talking to her. She uttered a feminin cry of dismay, and laid the whip on her horse as if both were borrowed property.

"Oh, it's not possible!" exclaimed Mrs. Peterby. "Parson Eel drunk!"

"Yes, it is possible," (whack, whack) said Mrs. Yerger; "he is full of beer; you can hear the beer swash about inside of him."

"Why does he pursue us with beer?" asked Mrs. Peterby.

"Because he is so blind drunk that he mistakes us for some other females. (Whack, whack.) What will poor Mrs. Eel say when she hears of it?"

"And what will people say about us if they see him chasing us in this way?" and the horse was warmed up some more with the whip.

"Bolice! Bolice! Shtop dot schoundrel right avay already," said a loud voice in broken English, that proceeded from a moving cloud of dust just behind the parson. It was the German barkeeper, who desired to collect the two schooners and the money for the beer, with which Parson Eel was baptizing himself, his horse, and the road with profuse liberality, and language to match.

On hearing the voice of the German barkeeper, who was trying to overtake him with hostil intent, Parson Eel made no further effort to keep back his steed from overtaking the buggy. The noble animal overtook the buggy and passed it in a jiffy. Mrs. Yerger and Mrs Peterby caught a glimpse of a bare-headed horseman in a rainbow of beer. They heard some frightful oaths, and then they had a rear view of their pastor as he disappeared down the dusty road, still clinging to those two schooners of beer, and pounding his saddle with fearful violence. They were glad he kept right on. They were afraid he was going to insist on them joining him in his bacchanalian revelries.

Quite a number of the first families of Austin were driving out that way, and they all recognized the rider, whom at first they supposed to be a cowboy on a tear.

Parson Eel escaped from the pursuing Dutchman, got home all right, so to speak, but his efforts to explain the matter satisfactorily resulted in Mrs. Eel taking the baby and going to see her mother.

Although this was the first day since warm weather set in that Parson Eels did not get his regular rations of cold beer, it is conceded even by his best friends that on this occasion he was unmistakably drunk. They say that if he was sober, he had no earthly excuse for his conduct. The statement of Mrs. Yerger, confirmed by Mrs. Peterby, that they were overtaken by the parson on the road, and that they were not with him at all during his disgraceful orgies in the beer garden, is received with hilarious incredulity.

Expert liars, members of Parson Eel's own church, said that his account of the sad affair is one of the most remarkable productions of fiction they ever heard, and a chromo was offered to any man who would say that he believed it to be true.

The people who had been stopping their carriages in front of suburban beer gardens to get a cooling glass of beer said that the frightful example set them by Parson Eel had cured them of the habit. They said:

"If a regularly ordained minister of the gospel can't take a glass of beer without being transformed into a licentious ruffian, who of us is safe? We had better giv it up altogether."

Some of them even congratulated him upon his success in breaking up a custom against which he had so often preached unsuccessfully, but at the same time they conceded that the sooner he sought a new field of labor the better.—Texas Siftings.

New Books and Pamphlets.

"Poems and Poetry," by J. J. McCabe, of Albany, N. Y., contains twelve poems on interesting subjects. Mr. McCabe is an activ Liberal in Albany, and is possessed of a good poetic faculty.

J. Bastian, South Bend, Ind., prints a little pamphlet entitled, "How the God of the Jews Took Flesh Upon Himself on Account of the Devil." Published to set at liberty intellectual slaves. Price 10 cents.

We hav received from the publishers a book entitled, "How to Build a House." It contains plans for twenty-five houses, of all sizes, from two rooms up; also engravings of the buildings of which plans are given. In addition it has information on subjects relativ to building and building contracts, givs the quantity of material for building, and suggestions to those who intend to build. It will be mailed on receipt of 25 cents.

"Theosophy from a German Point of View" is the title of a 14-page pamphlet published by A. H. Gebhard, 35 Mercer st., New York. It sets forth the definition and aims of Theosophy in an attractiv manner.

"Industrial Independence of Women, through Their Equal Income and Equal Suffrage," by Bryan J. Butts, is a plea for dress reform and other advantages for women. The subject is an important one, and the author appears to hav handled it ably.

Mr. George M. Hare, a veteran of the civil war, lived nearly three years at the Soldiers' Home, near Milwaukee, Wis., and has written a pamphlet descriptiv of the "Mysteries and Miseries" of that institution. It is printed at the Patriot Printing House, Woonsocket, R. I., from which state Mr. Hare enlisted.

James H. Feurt, of Portsmouth, O., desires to know "The Reason Why," as indicated by a pamphlet he has published "To the Clergy of Our Day." The author's aim is good, as is also his writing, but the printer had bad luck with the mechanical part of the pamphlet. Nevertheless the clergy would never dare undertake to answer Mr. Feurt's questions, for the very good reason that they are unanswerable.

BOSTON, July, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I desire to add one more name to the long list already published of the friends of Aunt Elmina's "Little Lessons for Little Folks." It seems to me that even we "children of a larger growth" can also learn much from its valuable pages. I hope it will hav a sale large enough to make it do a "world of good" to all concerned, particularly to the aforesaid "Little Folks." GEO. N. HILL.

"Revolt! An American to Americans," by W. J. Gorsuch, givs forth no uncertain sound. Some might say it has more sound than sense. The author is a dynamiter, and desires to smash things. He thus exhorts:

"Through every vale strike! Strike the fierce alarm! On every hill-top raise the beacon-pyre! The tocsin must be sounded—To arms! to arms! ye brave! Let man confront the hour. Too long in silence we hav suffered. We can endure no more. Aroused at Duty's call, we swear, whate'er to us betide, the toilers shall be free!"

No one can read without a feeling of sadness the memorial volume published to perpetuate the life-services of the late John S. Verity, of Cambridgeport, Mass. It is an octavo of 48 pages, and contains an accurate photograph likeness of the deceased, preface, biography, and account of the funeral proceedings at Paine Hall, Boston. Mr. Verity was a reformer in all meanings of the word, and was always on the side of liberty. He fulfilled the conditions of the lines which close the preface to the volume:

"A good memory is the best monument.
A noble life is the best epitaph."

With the compliments of the Knights of Labor of America we hav received a pamphlet entitled, "The Crime of Poverty," being an address delivered in the Opera House at Burlington, Iowa, April 1, 1885, by Henry George, under the auspices of the Burlington Assembly of Knights of Labor, No. 3135. The address covers twelve pages, 6 3-4x4 1-2 in., nonpareil type. The poem, "Clear the Way," by Charles Mackay, is appended. Mr. George needs no introduction, and he is always interesting, if sometimes mistaken. The pamphlet sells for $1 per hundred. Apply to James Love, Burlington, Iowa. Five cents would probably secure a sample.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.
By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, prepaid, for $1, or either one for 25 cents.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for, and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Something for Invalids to read and stud over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

THE holding of the land by a few persons is a great evil and should be abated.—D. M. Bennett.

THE life of the hour absorbs us most completely as the hours grow fewer and less full; the pleasure, the exemptions, the modest interests, the afternoon peace, the gentle affections, of the present scene obscure the future from our view, and render it, curiously enough, even less interesting than the past. To-day, which may be our last, engrosses us far more than to-morrow, which may be one forever; and the grave into which we are just stepping down troubles us far less than in youth, when half a century lay betwesn us and it.—W. R. Greg.

TO-MORROW, and to-morrow, and to-morrow,
Creeps in this petty space from day to day,
To the last syllable of recorded time;
And all our yesterdays hav lighted fools
The way to dusty death. Out, out, brief candle!

Life's but a walking shadow; a poor player,
That struts and frets his hour upon the stage,
And then is heard no more; it is a tale
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury—
Signifying nothing. —Shakspere.

"WHAT is the sweetest word that mortals ken?"
A woman asked who walked between two men.
First one said, "Home;" the other, "Love is best;"
And then the woman softly whispered, "Rest."

"Yes," said the first; "wherever I may roam
My rest ideal is in a far-off home."
"Yes," said the other; "it is Love's behest
To those on whom he fondly smiles, to rest."
—Edgar Nash.

THE gods who are immortal are not vexed bscauss, during so many a long time, they must tolerate continually men such as they are and so many of them bad; and besides this, they also take care of them in all ways. But thou who art destined to end so soon, art thou wearied of enduring the bad, and this, too, when thou art one of them?—Antoninus.

THEN Peter came to him and said, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgiv him? Till seven times? Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee, Until seven times, but until seventy times seven.—Matt. xviii, 21, 22.

TO be learned in the lump by other men's thoughts, and to be in the right by saying after others, is the much easier and quieter way; but how a rational man, that should inquire and know for himself, can content himself with a faith or a religion taken upon trust, or with such a servil submission of his understanding as to admit all and nothing else but what fashion makes passable among men, is to me astonishing. I do not wonder you should hav, in many points, different apprehensions from what you meet with in authors. With a free mind which unbiasedly pursues truth, it cannot be otherwise.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

SCIENCE is not possible in a world governed by a miracle-working God; the "stoppages of the sun" by Joshua, and the "sending back" of the sun for Hezekiah, would render impossible all solar observations. Imagin the feelings of a Herschel in the days of Hezskiah, when some slowly elaborated results of careful solar observations were suddenly destroyed by the erratic conduct of the luminary, and he was informed, while perplexedly considering his problem, "Oh! it's only a sign that king Hezekiah will get over his boil."—Mrs. Annie Besant.

PHILOSOPHICAL discussion must languish a little if, when we ask for the philosophical grounds for a certain belief, we find one philosopher believing because he has a "personal wish" for it, and another believing because "he is told." Mr. Hutton says that, as far as he knows, "the thoughts, affections, and volitions are not likely to perish with the body." Professor Huxley seems to think it just as likely that they should. Arguments are called for to enable us to decide between these two authorities. And the only argument we hav hitherto got is Mr. Hutton's "personal wish" and Lord Blackford's "thus it is written." I confess myself unable to continue an argument which runs into believing "because I am told." It is for this reason that the lazzaroni at Naples believed in the blood of St. Januarius.—Fred. Harrison (Mod. Sympos.).

TO be happy in old age it is necessary that we accustom ourselvs to objects that can accompany the mind all the way through life, and that we take the rest [i. e. other things] as good in their day. The mere man of pleasure is miserable in old age; and the mere drudge in business is but little better; whereas, natural philosophy, mathematical and mechanical science, are a continual source of tranquil pleasure, and in spite of the gloomy dogmas of priests and of superstition, the study of these things is the study of true theology; it teachss man to know and admire the creator, for the principles of science are in creation and are unchangeable, and of divine origin.—Paine's Age of Reason.

HAPPY the man who, studying nature's laws,
Through known effects can trace the secret cause,
His mind possessing in a quiet state,
Fearless of future and resigned to fate.
—Dryden's Virgil.

WERE I now setting out in the world, I should think it my great happiness to hav such a companion as you, who had a relish for truth, would in earnest seek it with me, from whom I might receive it undisguised, and to whom I might communicate freely what I thought true. Believe me, my good friend, to love truth for truth's sake is the principal part of human perfection in this world and the seed-plot of all other virtues, and, if I mistake not, you hav as much of it as I ever met with in anybody.—Locke's Familiar Letters. NOTE.—Anthony Collins was born in 1676 and died in 1729. He was but twenty-eight years of age when Locke died. Collins is counted the greatest among the Deistical writers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. He not merely fulfilled but exceeded the expectations that Locke had formed concerning him. For mental vigor and acumen he had few equals in his time, and for integrity and benevolence his character always stood high.—Hylax.

TRAVELS IN FAITH,

From Tradition to Reason.

BY ROBERT C. ADAMS.

Odds and Ends.

SERMONS at sea are usually the least attractiv of a vessel's deck-orations.

A WRITER says that Cæsar had short legs. This is probably what made him pause before crossing the Rubicon.

A FEVER and ague victim got no better because, being of a literal mind, he waited to "shake before taking," as he observed on the directions.

"HOW shall we obtain our heat in the future?" asks an exchange. There is no need of worrying about that unless a man leans toward the revised edition.

AN Englishman has discovered that kissing, to be scriptural, must be between those of the same sex. It is evident that the Bible needs to be revised just once more.

A RESTAURANTER says the difference between him and the preacher is that he serves his "extra dry" to his customers over a table, while the preacher serves his over the pulpit desk.

A CLERGYMAN preached on the sin of attending to money matters on Sunday, and when the deacon passed the contribution plate not a person would put a cent in it. And somehow the preacher didn't feel flattered at the effect his sermon had produced.

A CLERGYMAN in Central Illinois startled his congregation a few Sundays ago by making the following announcement: "Remember our communion services next Sunday forenoon. The Lord will be with us during the morning service, and the bishop in the evening."

FATHER: "You are not sending George any more money, I hope. At the rate he is spending money his education will cost him more than it will be worth. He resorts to all sorts of devices to get money." Mother: "But this money is for an actual necessity. He writes me that he is just beginning to study German, and must hav a German student lamp right away."

CLERK (to Mr. Isaacstein in back room): "Mr. Isdacstein, der shentlemans who is looking at dot peautiful seventeen tollar coat, says he vas a clergymans." Mr. Isaacstein: "Make dot shentlemans who vas a clergyman twenty per cend discound off." Clerk: "Der shentlemans says he vill giv five tollar for dot coat, and not a cend more." Mr. Isaacstein: "Let him hav dot coat, Jacob, but dond make no discound off."

"Do I love George," mused Clara, softly, "or is it simply a sister's affection that I feel for—" Just then Bobby burst noisily into the room, and interrupted her sweet meditations. "Get out of here, you little brat!" she shouted, and, seizing him by the arm, she shot him through the door. "Ah, no," she sighed, as she resumed her interrupted train of thought, "my love for George is not a sister's love. It is something sweeter, purer, higher, and holier."

THE village minister was away on his summer vacation, and the editor of the local paper, being a literary man, and, like all editors, deeply religious, was conducting the Sunday services during his absence. Everything went well until, in expounding the scriptures one morning, the editor said: "Yes, my brethren, even the hairs of our head are numbered." And then everybody smiled, for it sounded so much like the editorial "we," and the editor was bald.

SCENE—English primary school. Mistress teaching her class the alphabet. To Johnny (aged five): "Now, Johnny, let's hear how well you can say your letters through." Johnny: "Ha, be, se, de, he, hef, ge, haitch—" Schoolma'am: "Can't you say 'aitch,' Johnny?" Johnny: "Yessem. Haitch, hi, ja, ka, sheol—" Schoolma'am: "What? There's no such letter as that. You mean L." Johnny: "Yessem; hi know. But my ma says we mustn't say hell any more, coz they calls it sheol now."

A BRIGHT little miss living on Eagle street was given a warm cookie by a neighbor. Though contrary to her custom, the mother allowed the child to eat it. Shortly the little girl exclaimed: "Mamma, let me go and get another cookie; I know Mrs. —— will giv me one." "No, dear, it will make you sick." "Will I die and go to heaven?" "Yes." "Well, my Sunday-school teacher says heaven is a beautiful place." "You don't want to go to heaven and leave papa and mamma, do you?" "Well, mamma, you get a cookie, too, and come with me to heaven."

"WELL, Johnny, my little man," said the Sunday-school teacher, as he took a small boy on his lap in a crowded car, "did you hav a nice time at the pic nic?" "Naw," replied Johnny, with a look of disgust mingling with the pie-stains upon his innocent face. "Did some one act rudely to you?" inquired the teacher. "or were you sad because your poor little sick sister had to stay at home?" "Naw," Johnny replied again; "didn't hav no fun at all. Me an' Tommy Jones climbed inter a tree an' cut the rope of a swing so Bill Wilson an' his girl would kerflop into the mud, but Bill he got onto us in time to save hisself. That spoiled de hull proceedin's fer me. Never had no kind o' luck at all at them pic-nics."

AN aged colored woman named Amanda Sykes, who owned a house and some cash, lost her husband, and the Rev. Whangdoodle Baxter went to console her. He said: "Hit's mighty tuff, dat you loses yer husband, Matildy, but you mus' try and bar up under hit. You has sustained a heaby loss, but you mus' brace up wid de consolashuns ob 'ligion. You knows dar am one who sticks closer den a brudder. He am a berry present help in time ob trubble. He will neber leab yer nor forsake yer." "Dat's a fac', parson," replied Matilda, drying her eyes. "He called ter see me las' night, and stayed eber so long, an' he am gwineter take me out ridin' in a buggy termorrer." "What's yer talkin' about, you fool niggah?" "Ise talkin' 'bout Parson Aminidab Biedso, the culled pasture ob de new Temple ob Zion; he has been payin' me tenshuns eber since de obsequious."

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 12. No. 34. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, August 22, 1885. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

SANITARY OFFICER TUPLE reports, in the Washington Republic, that insanity among colored people "in nearly every instance is due to religious excitement."

THE Jewish rabbis who attended the funeral of General Grant walked the whole distance traveled by the procession. It was Saturday, and their religion forbids them to ride on their Sabbath.

THE Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost admits, in a letter to the Sun, that "the existence of a personal God, or any other truth of a similar nature, is entirely undemonstrable by experiment or philosophy."

THE village of Milford, Wisconsin, was visited by a destructiv fire last Monday, which destroyed every business house but a cheese factory and a saloon. Whence the Sunday Gazetteer infers that "providence" is not a Prohibitionist.

AN Ohio paper says that the joy of the saints in heaven is undoubtedly increased by their beholding the torments of the damned, and that this is the meaning of Psalm xci, 8: "Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked."

FIRED with emulation of Evangelist Sam Jones, the Rev. Job Cooley, a Methodist minister at Spring Place, Tenn., preached a vigorous sermon to his flock, remarking that if they didn't like his style they could leave. In five minutes Mr. Cooley was alone.

THE editor of the Texas Siftings finds himself unable to answer all the qustions of his young son Alex. Says the boy, "Pa, why does God make it rain?" "To make the corn grow, my child." "But why does he let it rain on the streets?" "Go to the devil."

AMONG the queer advertisments in last Sunday's papers appeared the following: "Theodore Parker Fraternity—Spencer Hall, 114 West 14th street, New York. Conference 2:30 o'clock. Mrs. Myra Hall, under the influence of General Grant. Evening discourse 8 o'clock."

THERE is an uneasy feeling in the country, says the Philadelphia Bul etin, lest Parson Newman should break out in a book. Since Miss Cleveland is said to hav made $50,000 out of her alleged book—the on dit probably being a pure fable—there is no real protection for the people against Newman.

SIX very dirty beggars from Lebanon reached this city last Friday. They were returned as paupers on the vessel that brought them here. Lebanon is a hilly country to the north of Palestine. It was part of the "land of promis," which the Jews were to hav forever, but which they never possessed at all.

THE Albany Argus says of a discussion at the Concord School of Philosophy on Goethe's "Ewig Weibliche" (eternal womanly), that it "was conceded that the eternal womanly, the principle which draws on and upward, is the infinit love of the divine nature, the motherliness of God, so to speak, to which Theodore Parker sometimes addressed his prayers. Professor Davidson contended that the eternal manly is not wanting in this element. The best woman possesses something of the man, as the best man of the woman." Professor Davidson is evidently something of a Universologist.

THE Swiss hav been particularly severe on the Salvationists. In all, or almost all, the cantons their meetings are prohibited. Zurich, following the example, has forbidden Salvationist meetings, but on new grounds. It has been decided by the authorities that the Salvation Army is not a religious association, but a wandering troupe of performers, and that as such they cannot hold meetings without proper authorization. Authorization or patent is refused on the ground that their performances are worthless and obnoxious to the public sentiment. A captain of the army, a Prussian, has just been fined $20 for holding meetings which in the prefectorial decree are declared to be only an excuse for begging.

THE agitation in London in favor of church disestablishment is increasing. Mr. Jesse Collings, Mr. Henry Labouchere, Mr. Richard Dillwyn, and other radicals make disestablishment the main plank in their platform, and insist that the church funds should be applied for educational purposes. The Scottish Disestablishment Association has issued a manifesto urging the enlarged constituencies to demand the abolition of the state church.

PAUPERISM in London is on the decline, even while the city is growing rapidly year by year. Thus in the second week in July the total number of indoor and outdoor paupers relieved in the metropolis was 83,559 against 85,208 in the corresponding week last year, 84,653 in the corresponding week of the year before, and as many as 86,408 in the corresponding week of 1882. The extremely low prices of food, it is thought, may account for for this.

IT is stated in a Texas paper that "Senator Vest has a dog that, after being taken to church one Sunday, was found the same afternoon in the wood-shed, with a lot of dogs about him, standing on his hind legs in a dry-goods box, holding an old almanac under one forepaw, while he gesticulated wildly with the other. He swayed his head and howled to his audience of dogs." This story is hard to believe. The dog has the credit of being an intelligent animal.

MR. POITRAS, a well-to-do butcher of Montreal, Can., attended a Catholic church a week ago. He was attacked with cramps, and when the congregation knelt, he could only assume a position with one knee on the floor. His actions were noticed, and the churchwarden had him brought before the the court, charged with an act of irreverence, and he was fined $8. Poitras's lawyers hav written to the prosecutors that, unless the money is returned, and an ample apology given, actions for heavy damages will be entered against all concerned.

EQUIVALENT to the decision of the minister who would not pray for rain when the wind was in the wrong quarter, is the verdict of the small boy contained in the following: Elderly visitor to small boy at baseball grounds: "Why, Johnny, I'm surprised to see you here on Sunday afternoon. I thought you were a good little boy who went to Sunday-school and said your prayers regularly." Johnny: "So I do." E. V.: "Did you pray for the success of your club last night?" Johnny: "Yes, sir." E. V.: "Then they will win today?" Johnny: "No, sir!" E. V.: "No? Then you don't believe in prayer, Johnny?' Johnny: "Yes, I do; but you see the other fellers has got a new pitcher with four curves, and that will knock spots out of anything."

THE Washington National View says: Mr. S. M. Baldwin, underneath the office of the National View, has in his possession something that the government should obtain. They are the shoe buckles of Thomas Paine, which he wore in 1776, "the times that tried men's souls," when he walked with Washington, Franklin, Adams, Jefferson, Morris, Rittenhouse, Paul Jones, and other most illustrious heroes of the Revolution, and the common spectacles which Paine used when writing his "Common Sense," "Crisis," and unparalleled, thrilling appeals for American independence and union of states. The Hon. William Henry, 1776, was a well-known merchant and manufacturer in the city of Lancaster, Pa., and was the United States armorer, and furnished General Washington's army with arms, clothing, and provisions. His hospitality and generosity were widely acknowledged. During the sessions of Congress he entertained many of the members, and at that time Paine, Rittenhouse, Franklin, and Ross lodged and boarded at his house, and enjoyed his extensiv library. He was the patron of the "immortal West," Rittenhouse, "the Newton of America," Dr. Franklin, "the sublime philosopher," and "the great American inventor," Robert Fulton. Mr. West's first landscape was painted for Mr. Henry; and Mr. Fulton (though a boy) painted Mr. Henry's portrait on ivory, and made musket and pistol flint fire-locks in Mr. Henry's rifle factory. Dr. Franklin was his printer, and Rittenhouse his engraver. Mr. Paine wrote his fifth "Crisis" in that remarkable and famous library of inspiration; and there Mr. Paine left his arm-chair, walking-cane, spectacles, and shoe-buckles. Mr. West's paintings, and Mr. Paine's spectacles and shoe-buckles, were obtained from a grand-daughter of Mr. Henry, one of his heirs.

THE system carried out in Vienna for educating girls is stated as follows: They are kept at their studies until they are fifteen years of age. They then go through a course of teaching in the pantry and the kitchen under some member of the family, or sometimes under trained cooks for a year or two years. Thus they learn to do everything themselvs, and to know the value of things long before they commence housekeeping on their own account; and though they may never be required to cook a dinner, they become independent of cooks and servants. The Austrian women are said to be most affectionate wives and mothers. As accomplished and learned as any English governess, they are as witty in society as a Parisian, and are some of the most beautiful women in Europe.

A MOVEMENT is now in progress requiring instruction to be given in the public schools as to the effect of alcoholic drinks, stimulants, and narcotics upon the human system. Five states, including New York, hav laws requiring such instruction. In no less than nineteen other states, from Maine to Kansas, in the South as well as in the West, similar laws are before the respectiv legislatures for action. In Pennsylvania the petitions for such an enactment are signed by no fewer than 700,000 citizens. In Massachusetts the petitions contained about 50,000 signers, including the names of college presidents and professors, physicians, teachers, and ministers, and of the representativ members of the community. Instruction may well be given upon the effects not only of alcohol, but also of opium, chloral hydrate, chloroform, and of tobacco upon the human system. The instruction might not cure a habit already formed, but it would tend to prevent the formation of the destructiv habit. Not a few boys are led into various forms of self-indulgence, ignorant of their disastrous consequences, or perhaps under the belief that the indulgence is thoroughly healthful. Instruction, removing the ignorance or the error, will prove of advantage in the development of a strong body, vigorous mind, and noble character.—Health and Home.

THE man who desires to become a noted revivalist should not cultivate his mind, but should cultivate the habit of making rough remarks. Sam Jones's success seems to lie in his lack of learning. He has a vigorous way of telling people that if they do not do as he says, do not believe as he does, they will certainly drop into the bosom of the awful lake. With an uncompromising advocacy of this idea he has drawn many people to his support. Why cultivated people throw aside all attempt at thought, and willingly surrender to such an arbitrary man, is something we cannot understand. Divest the man of a certain kind of blunt and not particularly refined humor, and there remains nothing calculated to hold an audience. He is a kind of evangelical paragrapher who never fails to make a semi-humorous comment on every idea which he considers absurd. Revise his sermons, that is, take hell from them, and nothing but skeletons remain. If a woman dances, she is a candidate for hell. If a man goes to the theater, he is in league with the devil. With him Shakspere's name is the synonym of evil, because the greatest of all poets wrote for the the stage. By this time, in such an age as the present, people should be too intelligent to seriously consider the rantings of a fanatic. The hell doctrin is an injury to true religion. It raises the hair of a crouching child, but men should know better. It is a doctrin of cruelty instead of a doctrin of love. It fosters fear rather than inspires confidence. It only has one great accomplishment: It makes Mr. Jones famous.—Arkansaw Traveler.

News of the Week.

RICH gold discoveries are reported from Oregon.

THERE were 766 births and 756 deaths reported in this city last week.

THE English Parliament was adjourned by the Queen last Friday. It will sit again October 1st.

GREAT damage has been done by storms in New Hampshire in the vicinities of Plymouth, Portsmouth, and North Concord.

OLIVIER PAIN, the young Frenchman who was the military adviser of El Mahdi, the False Prophet of the Soudan, is reported dead.

THE Massachusetts Prohibitionists will place a complete state ticket in the field. Their convention will be held in Worcester, Sept. 10th.

A PARTY of clergymen from the states are making a tour through Canada on bicycles. They are viewed by the nativs with much interest.

THE workingmen of this city and vicinity hav set apart Monday, Sept. 7th, as a workingmen's holiday. They intend to parade on that day in full force.

HEAVY defalcations hav been discovered in the federal offices of Louisiana. The frauds on the government amount, it is said, to $1,620,000 since the war.

THERE is no abatement of the cholera plague in Spain. Fifteen hundred deaths per day is not above the average. This epidemic is also spreading in the environs of Marseilles, France.

THE fund for the Grant monument in this city does not grow as fast as might be expected. It amounts now to less than $50,000. The monument proposed is to cost half a million or more.

AN accomplished daughter of a deceased physician has just been released from a lunatic asylum in Harrisburg, Pa., where she has been confined for twenty-seven years on a charge of "extravagance and eccentricity."

GENERAL MILES, in command of the department of the Missouri, has been instructed to hold troops in readiness to enforce President Cleveland's proclamation warning the cattlemen off the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indian reservation.

THE Rev. S. R. Peck, of Cherokee county, Georgia, committed suicide on the 14th by cutting his throat. He was formerly a room-mate of the Rev. M. D. Turner, who committed suicide last month over the holiness agitation among Methodists in Georgia.

W. J. GORSUCH, the Anarchist, spoke to a meeting of workingmen at Cleveland, O., last Saturday. A Herald correspondent reports that Gorsuch advised the laborers to arm themselvs with rifles, visit the warehouses, and take whatever they wished, shooting down all who opposed them.

THE remains of Dr. Thaddeus Stevens Updegraff, a prominent physician and scientist, were incinerated on the 7th at Lancaster, Pa., in the presence of Thaddeus Stevens Updegraff, Jr., son of the deceased; Rev. Thomas K. Beecher, brother of Henry Ward Beecher, and other prominent men.

THE Pennsylvania State Greenbackers' Convention was held at Erie on the 12th. The platform adopted demands the substitution of government for bank currency, the payment of all bonds, the recognition of the right of petition, and the enforcement of the law relating to contract or pauper labor.

A CONVENTION of the advocates of woman suffrage of Jefferson county, held in Watertown, N. Y., has passed resolutions requesting the inspectors of election through the county to takes the votes of women who hav the qualifications prescribed by the revised statutes. Many women express the intention to vote at the state election, and take the voter's oath if challenged. A similar movement is on foot in this city.

The Animal Soul.—Concluded.

From the North American Review.

All the mental characteristics of the undegenerate specimens of our race hav their germs in the character-traits of our tree-climbing relativs. Inquisitivness, the presumptiv root of science—though Peter Lombard enumerates it among the obstacles to salvation—is a besetting foible of the simian mind. Altruism, as modern psychologists hav named the instinctiv interest in the welfare of our fellow-beings, is in some of its forms almost distinctivly a monkey-virtue. The little Javanese macaque, which trembles at the squeak of a mouse, will fly in the face of the fiercest bulldog to make a diversion in favor of a helpless comrade. At the mere sight of a cruel act, the chimpanzee, though otherwise meekness personified, will break out in a violent passion, strike the ground with his fists, and protest in savage whoops. According to a story from India, that instinct seems to assert itself even in favor of distant relativs: Colonel Lawrence, of the Agra Planters' Hotel, keeps a tame leopard, which once followed its master to the freight-depot of the railway station. The shady platform at the north end of the depot is a great resort for baboons and loafers, and while the colonel talked to the receiving-clerk, his leopard strolled out to the platform, where a little street-Arab had fallen asleep upon a pile of gunny bags. The moment he approached that pile a troop of baboons (probably the Papio Rhesus), leaped upon the platform, and, instantly surrounding the boy, faced the intruder with bristling manes and menacing growls, evidently resolved to defend their little relativ at the risk of their own lives.

Quite apart from educational influences, the same instinct sometimes manifests itself in the human species, and with the same disregard of consequences. "Two young sons of the Burggraf," says Carlyle (Frederick, Vol. I., p. 97), "once went out riding with their tutor, when a big hound of theirs, in one of the streets of Nürnberg, accidentally tore a child; and there arose a wild mother's wail; and all the scythesmiths turned out, fire-breathing, deaf to a poor tutor's pleadings and explainings; and the tutor, who had ridden forth in calm humor with two princes, came galloping home with only one, the smiths having driven the other into boggy ground and there caught and killed him"—though not one of them could hope to escape the wrath of the prince's father. But would the scythe-smiths hav risked their lives for a young Hindoo, not to say a young Rhesus baboon? The Hindoos themselvs are perhaps nearer to nature in that respect; for when Captain Elphinstone's servant had crippled a bhunder-monkey, he was repeatedly "pursued by a howling mob, and on one occasion was chased all over Delhi before he could giv his pursuers the slip in the Mohammedan quarter, where a stout Unitarian kept the rabble at bay till the fugitiv had effected his escape through a back-door." We may laugh at the excitement of the sympathetic mob, but a feeling much akin to theirs is perhaps the basis of the civic virtues.

Speech and music in their present development are acquired arts rather than innate faculties, for in solitary confinement a child would grow up inarticulate; but their germ—the disposition to express emotion by modulated sounds—distinguishes the quadrumana from all other mammals. No one that has ever heard the voice of the long-armed gibbon can forget the strange musical cadences of its cry, perfect solfeggios in zigzag scales and with rhythmical pauses and crescendos. A specimen in the shop of a Hamburg pet-dealer attracted a large assembly, who crowded around the house under the impression that the proprietor had imported an operatic South-Sea Islander. The Brazilian capuchin-monkey (Cebus capucinus), especially the white-headed varieties, hav a vocal organ of still wider range, though of less musical timbre. They grunt, they pipe, they chatter, they yelp, they combine a whoop with a strange coughing guttural, they utter all the simple and compound vowels with an endless variety of modulations, evidently not prompted by the almost exclusivly erotic motivs of the singing bird, but rather by an exuberance of complex emotions, which the unisons of the lower mammals would fail to express. The mental development of the anthropoid fourhanders has already reached a degree that enables them to dispense with the aid of those mysterious instincts that one is tempted to ascribe to the agency of a sixth sense—the faculty of direction, for instance. Monkeys hav no abiding homes, and are very apt to lose their way in the maze of the virgin woods; but they roam at will, well knowing that their mental resources will enable them to master the situation under any circumstances. With one (doubtful) exception, they build no nests, but carry their young wherever they go, and hav thus emancipated themselvs from the thraldom of locality, which roots the plant to its nativ soil.

Man has been called the "only creature whose thoughts range beyond the present life." That the thoughts of our fellow-creatures hav never strayed in that direction we may justly doubt, however soon their intuitions may hav admonished them to desist from a hopeless task. I hav seen a female leopard stand motionless and mute before the dead body of her mate, deaf to the voice of her keeper and all other appeals, till at last the wailings of her kittens seemed to awaken her as from a dream. Colonel Godolitz, of the Austrian army, gave me an account of a dog that exhumed the buried body of his master, and with an appealing look of inquiry turned his head toward the men that came to repair the mischief. Who shall say that no musings on the mystery that has employed philosophers as often as Trappists, passed through the souls of those animals? Though as for "other-worldliness," or the habit of neglecting the business of life about such musings, and the consequent "yearning after a better life," the natural history of the animal soul might, indeed, fail to furnish a parallel. The right to despise this world, and expect a celestial sinecure as a reward of that contempt, may be a human prerogativ, but a prerogativ that has always been most eagerly claimed by those whom this world has weighed and found wanting. Superannuated coquets become brides of heaven. Every border-ruffian that fails to "get the drop" on the sheriff pities his friends that hav to tarry among the vanities of a disappointing world. Unmasked hypocrits become candidates for a martyr's crown. When the French had beaten his last army, Charles IV. of Spain soothed his soul by embroidering a petticoat for an image of the Holy Virgin. This "best-known of all worlds" seems good enough to our fellow-creatures, as it did to the Greeks and Romans, and still does to all manful and successful men. Other-worldliness is the virtue of the vanquished.

It is, indeed, the difficulty of reconciling the ways of nature with the principles of pessimism that makes the antinaturalists so loath to admit the unity of nature's laws. Like Faraday, who lived in a twofold world, a world of science and a world of faith, they would distinguish between the ghost-disturbed soul of man and the nature-guided or automatic soul of his fellow-creatures. Animals consult their welfare by following the guidance of their instincts; their inclinations indicate the will of nature; the natural inclinations and the true interest of man are supposed to be hopelessly at variance. Nature has made happiness the normal condition of her children by associating every normal action with a pleasurable sensation. In the catechism of the antinaturalists the sinfulness of pleasure is still a cardinal dogma. The natural affections that hav aided the survival of the higher animals are considered unworthy of a model saint. "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother, and wife and children, and brothers and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." The greenwood harbors no pessimist. "The wood-thrush does not modulate her anthems in a whining drawl; no dread of a joy-hating priest-god disturbs the gambols of the squirrel and the aerial dances of the brook-midge." But the children of man are taught to frown on the smiling face of nature. "Blessed are they that mourn," "Woe unto you that laugh," "Be afflicted and mourn and weep."

Only men that hoped to be forgiven on such terms could "claim themselvs a sole exclusiv heaven." The dying Indian hopes that his faithful dog will rejoin him in the happy hunting-grounds; the horses of Achilles follow his shade to Elysium; and in the still earlier ages of the world, when the spirit of man had not yet strayed so far from its source, the repulsiv exclusion of our lowly fellow-creatures was wholly unknown. The forms of plants and animals are gracefully interwoven with the tissue of Hindoo mythology and the sagas of our northern ancestors. The dog Sarama discovers the theft of the Panis; the horses of the Asmins fight in the battle of the gods; Hanuman is summoned to the council-hall of Indra. Our medieval devotees retired to convents that never harbored a sparrow; the saints of Brahminism retired to the hills and spent their last year in communion with the guiltless creatures of the forest, as our pathologists hav again begun to study in the hygienic instincts of animals, in order to correct the prejudices of our denaturalized mode of life. For pessimism is passing away like a moral epidemic, and its fever-dreams will soon cease to be confounded with the normal tendencies of the human mind.

But if antinaturalism is a symptom of disease, it must be admitted that supernaturalism requires a different definition, and the fact that the imagination of all primitiv races has been haunted by ghost-terrors opens out a field of very curious inquiry. Were the lullabies of our species chanted by priests that could not dispense with bugbears? Rather more significant seems the circumstance that ghost-fear is a night phenomenon. Midnight is the ghost-hour par excellence. The goblins hide in day-time. "It was about to speak, when the cock crew." "Up! my horses shudder—the dawn is near!" Mephistopheles warns his companion. Knight Roderick, fleeing from the pursuit of the Wild Huntsman, feels himself safe when he sees the morning light. And the same sight must for ages hav cheered the hearts of our arboreal relativs. In day-time a panther would find it easier to kill ten birds than to catch one monkey. The nimble fourhanders can mock his claws; they disdain to flee; they pursue him with hooting yells from tree to tree, and seem to invite his attack by their defiant boldness. But the tables are turned after dark, when the fourhanders hav to rely on the vigilance of their sentries, whose sharp ears are no match for the owl-eyes of the prowling felidæ, though they giv the alarm at the slightest symptom of danger. These alarms, almost nightly disturbing the sleep of untold thousands of generations, must hav impressed the simian soul as well as the soul of our sylvan ancestors with an indelible dread of nocturnal apparitions, haunting a vague imagination with all sorts of monstrous shapes. "It is not books or pictures," says Charles Lamb, "nor the stories of foolish servants, which create these terrors in children; they can at most giv them a direction. The stories of the chimeras and gorgons may reproduce themselvs in the brain of superstition, but they were there before. They are transcripts, types: the archetypes are in us, and eternal." May we not guess that those archetypes were the night-walking ferœ of the primeval forests? Every menagerie-keeper knows that after dark the approach of any unknown ("uncanny") object will scare monkeys almost out of their wits. The fluttering of a window-curtain, the stealthy steps of a late visitor, a mere flitting shadow, is enough to throw them into a paroxysm of abject fear; capuchin monkeys dash to and fro like blind chickens; baboons, which in day-time would brave the attack of a mastiff, huddle together and seem disposed to lose their wits at a moment's notice. Hereditary influences hav transmitted that disposition to some of their higher relativs, as Hannibal well knew when he routed his blockaders with a stampede of fiery phantoms. The sibyl of the Egerian fountain declined to appear in day-time, and professional ghost-raisers greatly prefer to begin their seances after dark. The persistency of hereditary tendencies is proportional to that of the predisposing cause. The love of forest-life has survived its modifications, the hot-house mania and the park mania of our French and British cousins, and even among nations so thoroughly secularized as the people of North Germany, superstition still survives in the fear of night-hags.

The study of animal characteristics may furnish, indeed, many suggestiv commentaries to obscure, because half-obliterated, traits of the human soul, just as the caudal appendages of our next relativs explain the meaning of certain prolongations of the human spine. Dog-trainers often notice that a whipped hound falls savagely upon his mates, and exasperated monkeys reach around into the next cage to pull the tail of an inoffensiv neighbor. I had a raccoon that never failed to inflict that sort of vendetta upon some one or other, sometimes even upon the cows that passed its den on their way to the pond. Few civilized men that stump their toes against a stone would act upon the impulse of flinging that stone at the head of a by-stander; still, the truth that misery likes company well enough to supply the want by aggressiv measures is apt to assert itself in various disguises. Rejected suitors and dyspeptic gluttons are much inclined to engage in a crusade against the vanities of this world. Tea-drinking spinsters with nervous headaches take care that their affliction shall compare favorably with that of their servant-girls. Jupiter, after the death of Semele, makes a raid upon the astonished Argives; and when Krishna, the son of heaven, was crucified, millions of mortals were sentenced to renounce the joys of this life. Cætera qui nescit?

The evolution of plants and animals presents a curious but rarely noticed analogy—the sudden change, namely, that their forms undergo at the approach of perfect development. The slowly budding rose unfolds all its leaves in a single day. In a single hour the crawling mummy that emanates from a chrysalis becomes a broad-winged butterfly. The pheasant, the male tanager, and the bulfinch acquire their plumage by a sudden transition from neutral to brilliant colors. Is it not as if nature had intended to furnish us a commentary, suggesting an explanation of an apparent anomaly, namely, the wide interval in the scale of development from ape to man? In the evolution of man, nature approached the climax of her work, and unfolded a flower that the teguments of the inclosing bud had partly concealed. Science might adduce still closer analogies. At the dawn of creation the march of development moved very slowly; so slowly, indeed, that Sir Charles Lyell specially commends the Darwinian theory for "enabling us to dispense with a law of progress as a necessary accompaniment of variation." Myriads of ages after the first appearance of life on this planet, he tells us, "there were still as many beings of the simplest structure in existence as ever." Ages may also hav passed before our hirsute ancestors learned to exchange their stone clubs for bronze hatchets. Within the past thirty years science has surpassed the progress of thirty centuries of faith. On the higher planes of life, evolution strides with wider steps. In tracing those steps across the gap of the problematic transition, we should remember to compare the nearest points of approach: the advanced dawn of animal intelligence, and the first sun-glimpse of human reason. That sun seemed to rise in a mist. The occupations of our early ancestors were confined to defensiv and offensiv warfare; their children were cradled in the bulrushes of the lacustrine swamps that protected them against the approach of their enemies, in Lernean bogs and Swiss lagoons, while they left the fair uplands to their four-footed rivals. The anthropoid apes, too, are swamp-dwellers, and without pile-forts manage to hold their own against all quadruped aggressors. The gorilla, and, according to Brehm, also the nshiego and a nest-building ape of the upper Gaboon, stampede elephant herds by breaking off clubs and following the troop with furious yells. The first biped hunters probably used no other weapons. The poor hill-folk of the Malabar Ghauts eat several varieties of venomous snakes, which they catch by pinning them to the ground with a forked stick. But in times of scarcity the Abyssinian kutch-baboon takes greater risks, for he catches scorpions with his hands and breaks off their tails before they hav time to twist around. The vocabulary of the Veddahs, the probable aborigines of Ceylon, contains fewer than a hundred words; that of the white-headed capuchin at least twice as many expressiv sounds. Sir Emerson Tennent says that a Veddah hunter's attempts at conversation sounded to him like a combination of clicks and rasping grunts; the long-armed gibbon and the capuchin pronounce their vowels as distinctly as a trained vocalist, and modulate them to express all possible degrees of approbation, displeasure, fear, desire, and surprise. If the Veddahs can ever be even half-civilized, it is certain that they hav declined all invitations in that direction for the past three thousand years; and what compulsory education might do for the anthropoid apes we may imply by comparing, first, the mental status of the domestic dog with that of his wild relativs, the canis pictus and the Syrian jackal; and secondly, the docility of the ape with the stubborn misanthropy of the wild dog.

The social virtues are supposed to constitute a generic distinction of the human soul; but the difference between the social systems of Great Britain and Dahomey is greater than the difference between the family life of the African baboons and that of the Papua Islanders. Fish trust their spawn to the sea; the female tortoise disdains to hatch her eggs, though she deposits them in a kind of nest; the male wolf leaves the care of his whelps to their mother; but the adult baboons of both sexes not only attend to the wants of their own offspring, but watch over orphans and the stray youngsters of a neighboring tribe, and nurse their sick with a solicitude that shames the perfunctory services of many professional human nurses. I hav seen a female Chacma nurse a wounded babuin, or Berber-monkey, rock him to and fro with a soothing purr, peep under his plaster, but hastily replace it when his twitching betrayed pain, cover him with her own blanket, and for hours lick around the wounded spot and rub it with her fingertips. In their nativ rocks a whole tribe of the sympathetic brutes will rush to the rescue of a crippled brother, and lug him off to a place of safety where the champions of the encounter surround him, strutting grotesquely in the pride of their hearts—or souls, though the antinaturalist would probably grudge them the honor of a term that he would apply to the mental apparatus of a Polynesian, who cures his sick children in the smoke-house, and sells his wife for a glass of grog. Yet we must admit the probability that the Chacmas hav acquired their virtues without the aid of preternatural revelations. Sympathy led to co-operation; co-operation enabled them to hold their own against enemies that eliminated the less sympathetic varieties of their species. Natural selection favored the development of an altruistic disposition, as surely as any morbid aberration of that tendency would hav been speedily suppressed. The penalties of unfitness would hav been enforced against those whose altruism had tempted them to seek glory in self-torture, to whine instead of fight, to hate their friends and children, and bestow their affection upon their enemies. Such forms of virtue would hav succumbed in the struggle for existence, as they succumbed in the struggle of the Protestant revolt; but by just as much as altruism conduced to the welfare of the species, it was favored and perpetuated.

Hav the social virtues of the civilized nations been developed in any other way? We see no reason for that assumption. The "power behind phenomena" acts by self-regulating laws.—Fslix L. Oswald.

Work-People and the Churches.

An interesting discussion has lately been going on between the Independent and the Christian Union, both holding pretty broad religious views about church-going among the working people. It has often been said, and it is very generally believed, that the working people of New York are not much given to church-going; and it has been frequently pointed out that they are not invited by the churches with any particular warmth. All talk on this subject relates to the Protestant churches, of course. All the neighborhoods in which the working people liv are well supplied with Catholic churches, so the discussion relates to non-Catholic population altogether. The starting-point of it was an assertion that there is "a severance between the American Protestant churches and the working classes." The Independent denies that such a severance exists, and the Christian Union maintains that if there is not actually a severance, there is much indifference, at least, on the part of the working classes toward the churches. From my own observation, I should say most decidedly that the Christian Union is right. For a good many years past I hav been brought into direct contact with working people in their homes, probably a great deal more than any writer on either the Independent or the Christian Union, and what I hav seen and heard in this way has convinced me that only a very small proportion of these people—keeping to the Protestants, of course—trouble themselvs about church matters of any kind. I think it is perfectly safe to say that not more than one-tenth of them are regular church-goers. The Evening Post introduces itself into the discussion to ask a few pointed questions. It would like an explanation why it is that the greater number of large churches are in the "brown-stone region," meaning Fifth avenue and the streets immediately adjoining. "Only a very small proportion of the working classes," it says, liv between Third and Sixth avenues, and yet the bulk of the Protestant churches are to be found in that region, and a curiously large proportion of them on Fifth avenue itself—that is, on the dearest land in this city outside of Wall street. "Why is this thus?" it goes on—"why must a church stand on an expensiv lot, and in a fashionable neighborhood? Would prayer and praise not be as efficacious ascending from a $10,000 lot as from a $150,000 lot? Is it the working classes that want to worship on high-priced real estate?" They certainly don't, whether they want to or not.—Buffalo Courier.

The Question of the Future.

A colporteur of the Bible Society called to-day to sell the word of God and look after my salvation. Having the thought power of an average chicken, he was all the more faithful a reflector of his clerical teachers. Scandalized at my indifference, he appealed to my fears of old Nick. I told him the churches he urged me to attend were all in the service of that personage, and especially mischievous by keeping the people in a mess about the future that they could neither help nor hinder, while neglecting what most needed looking after here now, the government, that was in fact both God and devil. He replied that if he believed this little span of life was all, he should be perfectly indifferent as to what might happen. I told him I was the child of a race who are not taught to believe in any other resurrection than that of natural birth; but that as long as babies were plenty, we might try again. He might be mistaken about the interest in this world depending on another; for men known to me, who had no notion, however vague, of any future state, but believed that death would put an end to their consciousness, were most keenly alive to all worldly insests, much more so than myself, who had no belief either way, but simply awaited evidence.

He could not understand the difference between the knowledge of one's ignorance about a future life and the denial of it. The reflections excited by his silly answer bore on the importance of cultivating in young minds the sentiment of solidarity in the collectiv light of humanity and our earth, in which is sensibly contained the sort of immortality to which any individuate expression of them can attain. This would seem to be easier than the clerical phantasms, and the feelings connected with it are sympathetic, whereas the clerical notions are egoist as well as grotesque.

The idea of one's identity is at once fallacious and elastic. Blows on the head which sometime change a character and faculties, must puzzle it worse than the two Dromios or Siamese twins. When Napoleon said, "La France c'est moi," was it not a conscious extension of identity to which he had attained, as a focus of the nation's sympathies?

Suppose it should turn out that ideas, I mean great organic ideas that run through species, and such as the philosophy of history attests, were the true substances of nature, and persons only phenomena by which these ideas interacted on the stage of the world. Existence would then be proportional to insistence of persons identified with such ideas. That is one phase of survival for the fittest. I compare a species or a race with a tree, which periodically individuates itself in leaves. If it were conscious, this consciousness would flow with its sap into every organ, into every leaf, reproducing there an image of the treehood. We, at a certain distance, note the tree as one individual, but consciousness in each leaf, would naturally insist upon its own identity, and hav a vague notion that all would not be over when it dropped, a notion derived from the interfluent consciousness of the persistent tree.

EDGEWORTH.

Social Problems.

Mr. Edgeworth seems to think that the homestead should be exempt from taxation as much as clothing, food, houses, and all products of labor. He evidently fails to recognize the difference between the two kinds of things which I hav so often pointed out. Clothing, food, houses, etc., are in this very nature private things. The public do not produce these things. The public hav no more claim upon the coat on my back than Mr. Edgeworth has, for the public has not assisted me to obtain it any more than he has. To tax a thing implies that the party levying the tax has a right to a share of the thing; but the public has no more moral right to the products of my labor than Mr. Edgeworth has. But it is different with all that class of things which are not the product of any man's labor. All citizens hav equal claims to these things, and things which all people hav equal claims to do belong to the public. Roads, schools, post-offices, air, etc., are examples of things of this kind. They are called public, because all hav equal rights and claims to them. The public has a moral right to tax its own property, but it has no more right to tax anybody else's property than I hav.

Mr. Edgeworth's reasoning is inconsistent. It is that renting the land to the people, instead of selling it to them, would favor rich people and injure poor people. He argues that if the land were rented by the state to all, the poor people would hav to pay more for its use than they do now, and that the rich would hav to pay less than they do now. Mr. Edgeworth must know that poor people do now hav to pay rent for the use of land, and that if they should pay this rent to the government, it would be no harder to pay it than it is to pay it to a private landlord. There are 4,000,000 farms in this country, and 1,500,000 of them are cultivated by tenants. Now, these tenants are the poor people, and the owners of the land are the rich people. Mr. Edgeworth claims that if the government should claim the rent which now goes to the landlords, the change would injure the tenants more than the landlords. He claims that landlords would take up more land under the renting system than they do now. Mr. Edgeworth will surely see that this kind of reasoning is too absurd to require further reply.

I shall state, as a general proposition, that no government has a moral right to make any disposition of the natural things of the country which shall not forever giv to all citizens equal shares of those things. At present it must be admitted that the people hold shares of these things in proportion to their wealth. A man with two thousand dollars can buy twice as large a share as one with only one thousand dollars, and so on. But the great mass of the people—more than nine-tenths of them—hav no share at all.

Would renting the land giv all equal shares of it? If the land was rented to the people by the government, it would then belong to the government as much as the roads do now, and we know that everything which belongs to the government belongs as much to one person as to another. The post-office, for example, or the public schools, belong as much to Mr. Edgeworth as they do to Jay Gould. Mr. Gould may send more letters through the post-office than Mr. Edgeworth, but he pays more postage in proportion. So Mr. Gould might rent more land than Mr. Edgeworth, but he would hav to pay more rent in proportion. If the natural things of the country should be owned by the government and rented to rich and poor upon equal terms, and the rent divided equally among all, I claim all citizens would get equal shares of those things. For example, if a man, on dying, should leave his estate to be rented every year to the highest bidder, and the rent then divided equally among all his children, is it not evident that all would get equal shares of his estate? So, if the government rents the estates every year and then divides the revenue so derived among all equally, all will get equal shares.

When this question was discussed before the Senate Committee two years ago, Senator Blair gave it as his opinion that to rent the land of the United States on this principle would bring in a public revenue of five billions of dollars. If rich men should bid up the rents, as Mr. Edgeworth thinks they would, this sum might be doubled. We never hav used one billion yet for expenses of the government. This would leave four billions dollars to be divided equally among fifty millions of people, and this would be an annual pension of eighty dollars to each man, woman, and child in the country. If the rich folks should go to work and double the rent, as Mr. Edgeworth thinks they would, each man, woman, and child in the country would get an annual pension of one hundred and sixty dollars a year. Under such a condition of things poor people would not grumble, especially as they would not hav to work, for Mr. Edgeworth thinks the rich folks would do all the work with machinery. It would be such a change to hav the rich people doing all the work. I should think poor people would like to try this change for a year or two to see how it would work.

Not Quite Persuaded.

The following from Miss Wixon is in reply to a private letter from a correspondent. We hav her permission to publish it:

DEAR FRIEND: What made you think that I am on the "broad road to Spiritualism?" I tread the same path as formerly, and find it good enough and broad enough for me. I would be very glad to know that the main point of Spiritualism, that of conscious individual existence beyond the grave, is true, but, although I hav spent some time in investigating the phenomena since I hav been here in Onset, I am no nearer any fixed conclusion in the matter than before I came. From that which I hav seen, I believe the "materialization" business a fraud, a perfect fraud, every time. In regard to some other phases of so-called Spiritualism I am not so certain. There is a power, an intelligence, that I do not know how to account for. If it is "mind reading," it is a very wonderful gift, and worthy of investigation. Doubtless it will some day be better understood, and will occupy then its own place in the world of scientific facts.

Amid all the frauds of Spiritualism, I distinguish a grain of something else. What it is, I confess I know not, but am content to study and wait. For several years I hav been a careful and patient investigator of the "manifestations" whenever opportunity occurred. Be assured I shall never giv my adherence to any cause without due and calm deliberation and investigation.

I hav received a number of letters of the same import as yours, and while I thank my friends for their kind interest, I will say that nothing has occurred since my sojourn here to convince me that we can safely manage more than "one world at a time." Among my dear friends I count some who are pronounced Spiritualists, and they are no less dear to me on that account. All that I hav met here hav treated me with great kindness and cordiality, and when I go away from this place I shall bear with me many pleasant recollections. I think many are mistaken in their views and their methods, but I hav no disposition to quarrel with anyone. If there is one thing to be deplored more than another, it is the easy credulity of the masses, the taking for granted that which should invite the utmost care and caution.

Yours very truly, SUSAN H. WIXON.

A Statue of Voltaire.

The people of Paris hav recently dedicated a monument to the French Freethinker. A correspondent of a New York paper thus describes the occasion:

The unveiling of Voltaire's statue was a brightly Parisian ceremony. It was in the open air and in the angular space on the Quai Malaquais, formed by the jutting out of the Palace of the Institute. The weather was cool though summery. Of course there was a fine fluttering of tricolored flags and a velvet-draped rostrum set round with flowers. The back of the statue is to the Institute. When it was unveiled the declining sun lit up the vast forehead, the nose, the projecting parts of the cheeks, the lips, and the chin. Voltaire faces west. But his head is slightly turned and his eyes look at the window at which, in the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, Charles IX. set a murderous example to his fanatical subjects by blazing away with a carbine on Protestants who were trying to take refuge in barges on the Seine. The philosopher, who with his pen alone made the Revolution inevitable, appears to jeer at the Louvre. That den of poisoners and tyrants is now a people's museum and open to the whole world. One almost fancies that Voltaire is mentally rejoicing over that fact. He wears his ample crimson velvet dressing-gown lined with sable which the Empress Catherine sent him, and the wig that he dressed himself nearly every morning for sixty years. The shoes are square-toed and easy. Voltaire could not abide tight and high-heeled shoes. He appeares to hav ceased walking with the gait of old age just to cast his eye across the Seine at the royal rookery which he did so much to pull down. The face and head are intensely intellectual.

Caillé, a sculptor of great talent, was the author of this statue, which has been lying in a shed ever since 1877, when the Duc de Broglio overruled the vote of the Municipal Council granting for its erection the angular space where it now stands. Caille died of disappointment. He did not foresee that the republic was to triumph completely. The artist not only studied everything that was written of Voltaire by those who knew him, but his different likenesses, busts, and statues. He learned English to be able to seize completely the impression Voltaire produced on Oliver Goldsmith, who saw him in Paris and estimated him at his full worth. The other authorities were Houdin's statue, which was done from life, at Ferney, and Houdin's fourteen little pen-and-ink sketches of the philosopher's head, showing it in as many kinds of moods and trains of thought. Houdin had lived with him ten years. He was a poor artist on whom Voltaire took pity and offered a home at Ferney as long as he chose to accept it. He adored his host, and devoted himself to studying his face and reproducing it with pen, pencil, or with a scissors and paper. So expert did he become that he could, holding that instrument and the paper behind his back, cut out a perfect profile likeness of Voltaire. One of his diversions was taking the soft part of a piece of fresh bread, wetting it slightly and modeling with his fingers Voltaire's bust. He gave finishing touches with long and pointed nails.

Where is Your Basis?

While we talk so much about money no one seems to attempt a definition. It would seem that most people confound money with the thing used. We call the metal or paper money, without thinking. Now, money is not the thing used, because anything we agree to take as money does all the work of money. Hence the things we call money are only signs or representativs of it. What then is money? A considerable number of persons say it is the fiat of government! But this clearly will not do, because should government declare leaves of trees money, people would, under compulsion, take them but once, and never again trust the party who forced the leaves on them as legal tender. A thing must circulate to be money. And if a government of little power and credit should issue legal tenders beyond its power to make good, i.e., beyond its credit, these would not circulate. Fiat is a most desirable quality added to the money signs, but is not money. To ascertain what money really is, we must seek its origin. We cannot conceive of money as originating without thinking of a debt or difference arising. Were men able to exchange equally on every occasion of a trade, money could never come into existence, because there would be no use for it. No, a debt must be contracted, i.e., a credit must be given for a moment or longer, and then the thing to which the trust or confidence is given, called money, is born. Hence money is credit in circulation.

And though we by our laws say gold only is money, yet the natural money in shape of bills, checks, drafts, bonds, orders, arises in protest to do nearly all the money work of the civilized world.

When we declare a rare metal shall alone be money, we confine all its power to the metal, and who owns the metal masters the trade of the world. To-day a few of the wealthiest men could easily control the gold. It was not always so, but in the past it was known that quicksilver controls gold, and is a much rarer metal than gold, being found at but two or three mines. The head of the Rothschilds early learned that secret, and soon obtained mastery of the whole supply of quicksilver worth while.

If money be really what I suggest, and essential to our welfare, may not fearful consequences flow from our ignoring the fact, and by our institutions assuming it to be something else? It is always safest to legislate in accord with the nature of things.

As to a basis for circulation, or, "What are you going to pay in?" I opine that if a bank of issue had the power and right to order a tax off community of several hundreds of millions, no one would ask where their basis was. That is a basis more durable than any metal, and more reliable. This power is all the people's, expressed through their government.

The Candidacy of Mr. Moore.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Greenbackers of Iowa did themselvs a very great honor in nominating so competent and worthy a candidate for state superintendent of schools as the Hon. Mr. Moore.

Liberal Republicans and Democrats of Iowa! remember that there is no reason why one party should indorse him more than the other, while there is a very good reason why you should use your influence with your respectiv parties to that end, viz., he is the very man for the position. Also remember that even if you do not succeed in getting your party to indorse him, it will carry a very great influence in his favor.

New Rendering of an Old Text.

The so-called prophecy most frequently pointed to as foretelling the coming of Christ is contained in Isaiah vii, 14. In the old version it reads:

"Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel."

It has been shown again and again that this prophecy referred to an event which was to follow immediately upon its utterance, and that it was a merely local prediction. Christians, however, continue to claim that it had a direct reference to the Jewish messiah called Christ. The revisers hav not altered this verse. Indeed, they could not do so without making a radical change, the consequences of which they were not prepared to accept. But they hav put in the margin what they dared not incorporate in the text. The corrected version should read as follows:

"The maiden is with child, and beareth a son."

Grammarians will observe that, in a double sense, the difference between the old and the new version is intense; for whereas the verb was before in the first future tense, it is now in the present. What becomes, then, of the prophecy upon which was alleged to hang the messiahship of Jesus Christ?

The Tent.

HENDERSON, SHIAWASSEE CO., MICH.—The pouring rain on Sunday night the 2d at Owosso, prevented our lecture; about forty were present, but, under advice of friend Bedford and our faithful Tilney, we saved our strength. We had depended on Sunday evening to giv us a boom financially. Had good attendance on Monday and Tuesday. We reviewed a pamphlet by the Episcopal minister named Walton, an attempted reply to Colonel Ingersoll's "Which Way?" and, although Owossians were somewhat proud of having a minister who could publish a pamphlet replying to Colonel Ingersoll, they now wish he had not. There was very deep prejudice against Liberalism in Owosso. The spirit was manifest by the remarks of three dear little children from four to six years of age passing the Tent on their way to school, "Da'res dat wicked Tent; don't oo wish do Lord ud drive it away?" The Tent has one wonderful advantage—the Christians can go on the back street, get behind trees, or blow out lights and sit in rooms in adjacent houses, and hear distinctly. When our "stentorian" is under full headway, we can be heard five blocks off. This affords opportunity for the timid to learn the truth, yet dodge the responsibility of being seen at the wicked Infidel Tent. There were from one hundred and fifty to three hundred people standing around outside the Tent, numbers varying with the weather. Those inside eagerly took reading matter, and it was very thoroughly circulated during the day; constant applications were made for leaflets and papers. We are well pleased at results of our labors at Owosso. To Mr. George Bedford, the one subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER in the place (we secured five new ones), we are under deep obligations. He spared no pains or efforts to help in the good work. We fell short financially, but even in this direction he helped most generously; had avowed Liberals in the vicinity done one-tenth as much, we should hav come out of Owosso with replenished instead of depleted exchequer.

On Wednesday Mr. Leroy Cushing and Mr. William Kohlmeyer, from Henderson, came for us, accompanied by Mr. Barker with a hay-rack and lumber wagon, on which we loaded Tent and all belongings. Our Tent folds in bundles; center pole is spliced; chairs fold in compact bundles of six; books, trunks, everything can be packed and carried in an ordinary lumber wagon with hay-rack.

We had a very pleasant drive to Henderson, only six miles from Owosso. It is a small village, only one church—M. E. But a more rabid, bigoted, fanatical place it has not been our lot to visit, even famed Montezuma, N. Y., not excepted.

The minister is constantly running upon the streets or in the stores howling:

"What can we expect but that God will send some dreadful visitation of his holy wrath upon us, if we permit this accursed Tent to remain in our midst, flaunting so defiantly in the face of the almighty?

"This Reynolds is a disciple of the infamous convict, Bennet, who devoted his life to writing and publishing bscene books to debauch and demoralize youth, and was at last justly sent to end his miserable life in prison for his repeated crimes.

"These wretches with the Tent should be driven out, as you would drive them forth if they came polluted with leprosy to spread contagion and death among us. The vile poison of their infamous teaching is more deadly, more to be dreaded, than yellow fever or small-pox," etc.

Judge of the results. Our little fat corporosity and the Adonis proportions of our fascinating child of song Tilney, are scanned by the people with gaping mouths and wide, staring eyes, as though we were monstrosities. The children gaze on us in awe at safe distance, and run screaming, as if for their lives, if we approach them, while the fanatics pass us with fierce, glaring eyes flashing with hate and anger, grinding their teeth, and clenching their fists. The ordinary intelligent Christian is always afraid his God is unable to take care of himself, or punish his enemies without his help. Think, then, what must be the effect of this minister's ravings on the uncultured fanatics of this locality. Threats fill the air—we are threatened with being mobbed. A party was actually formed to attack us, avowing their intention to drive us out and hide the Tent where it could never be found.

Of course this is a little unpleasant—rather spoils the jolly little picnic (some imagin we are enjoying). But it advertises us most thoroughly, and results in greatly extending and increasing the interest in our lectures. We are more amused than alarmed, yet agreed with the friends that it was advisable to hav an armed watch during the night. We were much more afraid of the stealthy assassin in the dark than of any open attack, and as we walked alone along the road, from the Tent to the hotel, after midnight in the pitchy dark, we kept our ears strained, expecting the thud of the murderous bludgeon from behind, or the whizz of the piece of rock aimed from behind the fence, crushing through our skull; but thus far hav passed unmolested. A crowd of ruffians did make a start, on mischief bent, but skulked in the ditch beside the road, and, finding the Tent guard on the alert, ready to receive them, sneaked off.

Crowds flock to hear us, and although many are afraid there may be some deadly poison in our tracts and papers, yet a great many are being circulated. We hav already obtained three subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and sold quite a number of books and pamphlets, some much below cost, some on credit. But the fallow ground is broken up, the prejudice removed, the good seed sown, the future cultivation of the field made easy, and the harvest insured.

William Kohlmeyer and Leroy Cushing are genuin Liberals; not alone outspoken advocates of Secularism, but their lives giv evidence of the ennobling influence of its teachings. Their characters are in all things above reproach, while their devotion to the cause is worthy of highest commendation and emulation. It is finding such true, loyal, generous hearts, ready and willing to make real sacrifice to aid the good work, that reconciles us to our incessant arduous labors. They are plain, unassuming men, limited in means, but not in zeal, living amidst rabid fanaticism, yet keeping ablaze the torch of liberty; they are real heroes, worthy of all respect; living not for self, but earnestly endeavoring to advocate the best interests of their fellow-creatures, determined their neighborhood shall be the better for their having lived in it.

On Wednesday morning we shall bid farewell to Michigan and start for Carbon, Ind., which will be our address until the 22d inst.

The National Liberal League.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, President.

CHARLES WATTS, First Vice-President. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary, 33 Clinton Pl., New York.

COURTLANDT PALMER, Treas., 850 Broadway, New York.

Annual and Life Memberships.

Every Freethinker should become an Annual or Life Member of the National Liberal League. Life-membership certificates are issued at $25 each; annual membership, $1. These certificates are adapted to framing, and bear the signatures of the president of the League, Robert G. Ingersoll, and of its secretary, Samuel P. Putnam; they are therefore an ornament to any place and a memorial of great value. They should adorn the walls of ten thousand homes before the close of the year. The support thus given to the League would make its success certain. A. C. MACDONALD,

Chairman of the Finance Committee.

33 Clinton Place, New York city.

Call for the Ninth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League.

To the Auxiliary Liberal Leagues and All Citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Ninth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, to be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 9, 10, and 11, 1885.

According to a vote at the last Congress of the League notice is hereby given that an amendment to the Constitution will be submitted, as follows: Article I. of the Constitution of the National Liberal League shall be amended to read: "The name of the association shall be The American Secular Union."

Measures for the affiliation of the Freethought societies of Canada with the National Liberal League will also come up to be acted upon.

Also measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government as shall make the United States thoroughly secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local Auxiliary Leagues are entitled by the League Constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the president and secretary and three delegates. All charter members and life members, all vice-presidents, all chairmen of state executiv committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats but not to votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every Auxiliary League will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present. Having adopted a common basis of work upon which all Liberals can combine, it is now desirable to discover the best means by which this work can be carried forward, and to this end large attendance and free expression of opinion will contribute. It is hoped that all will come to the Congress to emphasize the unity of Liberalism and to create an interest for harmonious action which shall result in the abolition of all laws that are contrary to secular government.

Per order of Board of Directors:

R. G. INGERSOLL, President.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.
CHARLES B. REYNOLDS, Ch. Ex. Com.
A. C. MACDONALD, Ch. Fin. Com.

The Convention and the Congress.

The two Conventions at Albany and Cleveland are both for the same purpose—the creation of a vast interest and enthusiasm in the work of Liberalism throughout the United States and Canadas. It is to be hoped that as many as possible will attend both Conventions, for the one will not be a repetition of the other, but an evolution and advance. The noble impulse which we shall all receive from the Albany Convention will be carried on to the Congress at Cleveland for practical activity. At Albany will be displayed the intellectual wealth and resources of the Liberal party, and these will convince the world of the intensity of our determination, and the moral power which we represent. We shall obtain a recognition never yet accorded to Freethought principles. With the interest thus created, and the attention of the public universally attracted, our own forces made more compact and enthusiastic, the stream of effort will flow on to Cleveland with accumulating influence. The Congress in October will be pre-eminently the meeting for action; for the adopting of the best methods of work, and the pushing forward of the campaign for the coming year with unprecedented activity. We need a grand rally at both Albany and Cleveland in order to fully meet the necessities of the hour. What we need above all things is acquaintance, fellowship, corps de esprit, the magnetic powers of comradeship, the individual conviction blended with the universal inspiration. These gatherings are to develop and express the spirit of fraternity, to cultivate the humanity of our movement, and to mold those many-sided agencies that shall hasten the new integration of mankind on the basis of liberty and science. Those who cannot go to one will surely make an effort to go to the other. Many of our Eastern friends can only go to Albany, many of our Western friends can only come to Cleveland, but we hope that as many as possible from East, and West, and North, and South will attend both Convention and Congress. For a few weeks we hav given special labor to the Albany meeting. Its success is now assured. There will be a noble attendance of Liberals. Four weeks after this Convention will be held the national Congress. From now on with the splendid impetuosity of movement which we shall acquire at Albany, we hope that all will join heart and hand for a Congress of Liberals at Cleveland, which shall speak the most important word of the day for human advancement.

Our good friend Griswold does the right thing and says the right thing, as the following shows:

"AUBURN, N. Y., August 13, 1885.

"FRIEND PUTNAM: Herewith find inclosed $2 for two tickets for myself and wife to the Albany Convention.

"Most assuredly you can depend on our being there among the first ones, to remain with you all through the grand awakening, like unto which nothing yet has taken place in the history of our great movement. Our Rochester Convention, two years ago, was a grand affair, but I believe this coming one will even surpass it in all respects. It seems there never before was such concerted action manifested on the part of Liberals to make a Convention the greatest one ever held. I hav just returned home from a long business trip, and, though very busy in the occupation of bread-winning, I am going to spend just a few days in behalf of advertising this Convention, knowing very well that my meat and drink will relish better by having done my duty, even in my very limited sphere. Brother Reynolds's magnanimous call to duty of one week ago infused into me new vigor, greater determination, and stronger fixedness of purpose to present a bolder front upon the ramparts of the common enemy, giving them no quarter, asking of them no favor, until the 'Nine Demands' shall hav taken their proper places upon the scroll of our common cause.

"Not only do we oblige ourselvs to tear away from the dull cares of toil for a few days to attend the Albany Convention by buying our tickets one month ahead, but further insure the obligation of attending by even buying our railroad excursion tickets also one month ahead. This obligation is flanked on all sides by a longing for the 'good time coming' when we shall all once more intermingle with each other, becoming better acquainted with the objects, aims, and purposes of Secularism. We are now a unity, one inseparable whole, with no North or South, East or West, but one common, undivided compactness for good. L. DEWITT GRISWOLD.

"P.S.—Your circulars for church taxation, repeal of sectarian obnoxious laws, hav been received. I hope to get a little time to do something toward getting subscriptions.

Lucius C. West (Uncle Lute), author of "Paul Hart; or, The Love of His Life," will be at the Convention; also Elias Gault and wife, L. G. Bragg and wife—all of Kalamazoo, Mich. So they come from East and West.

N. D. Burnham, of Lowell, Mass., sends $1 for ticket and writes that he will be at the Convention. Milo O. Mott, of Springfield, Mass., sends $1 and writes that "he hopes for a grand time at Albany, and to see the veterans of the cause."

The following from correspondence givs especial pleasure:

"CASSADAGA, N. Y., Aug. 8, 1885.

"Please tell Secretary Putnam that I congratulate him on his program for the Albany meeting. The topics to be discussed are all interesting, and the persons to discuss them—we hav none more able in our ranks. I hav only time to say that Remsburg, in his capital letter, already published, expresses, better than I could, my own sentiments in regard to the meeting. What a "feast of fat things, of wine on the lees well refined," you will hav! And then the dessert—Ingersoll. How I envy those who will partake!

"Mrs. Lake, our John the Baptist, who has done such effectual service for the cause in the West, is one of the speakers at the meeting here, and bids me say she fully indorses what I hav said above. She hopes, and so do I, that the Albany meeting will be the second step in the evolutionary process marking the history of American Secularism, and that before many years pass by the laws and policy of the great state of New York, in whose capital the meeting is to be held, will be conformed to the secular character of the national Constitution. Respectfully, A. B. BRADFORD."

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Items of Interest From Albany.

DEAR MR. PUTNAM: We hav not made all our musical arrangements yet. We expect to be able to announce the full program very soon. Mrs. Gerdom, one of our lady members, is embroidering a satin banner for our society, which will be placed on the stage during the time that the Convention is in session. Our Troy friends are doing their share of the work also. Mr. Wade, of the Troy Secular Society, has made arrangements to hav the stage nicely decorated with hot-house plants. The ladies of our Society and the Troy Association hav got the whole matter of decorating the Opera House in charge, and the material is being prepared as fast as necessary.

I called on Judge Hurlbut yesterday afternoon at his beautiful country residence in the town of Bethlehem, Albany county, about two miles from this city. He was president of our Association about six years ago. I called on him for the purpose of ascertaining if his health would permit him to attend our Convention. He is all alone in his spacious mansion, his wife having died not long since, and his children are married and living away from him. The judge was one of the pioneers of Liberalism in this State. He felt the weight of the ostracising hand of orthodox superstition. Many of the old proscriptiv laws that hav become a dead letter owe their retirement from public use to his voice as a public speaker; to his pen as a newspaper correspondent; to his decisions as a judge of the supreme court of the state, and to his other labors of drawing up bills and having them pushed through the legislature.

But now he is an old man seventy-eight years of age, and quite feeble physically. He had a stroke of paralysis a short time ago, which has weakened one side of his body so much that he never attempts to walk around without the use of a cane. He does not often leave the house, as he is somewhat afraid that another stroke might be fatal.

The judge has been a deep student in his day. He has a splendid library, and can take up any scientific or historical work and find a passage to illustrate a theory or corroborate a statement he makes about an author's views on any subject under consideration. He was glad to learn that our association had changed its name to the Albany Secular Society, which was done two weeks ago in order that we might come out squarely in support of the American Secular Union. He considers that a great Secular movement, properly conducted, would wield an influence so powerful that every department of government, state and national, would eventually be thoroughly secularized. He has great confidence in the ability, integrity, and patriotic motivs of Colonel Ingersoll. He told me when I was about to bid him good-bye that when the Convention is in session, if he feels safe in doing so, he will try to attend. The first lecture I ever heard delivered against orthodoxy was by Judge Hurlbut. I was then a Christian, but a little skeptical. However, he worked up all the Christian blood there was in me to fever heat, and I prepared a reply to his lecture and with the permission of the lecture committee of the society of which I am now president, I delivered or read my reply three weeks later. The judge then prepared a more elaborate discourse on the same subject, which was delivered in Tweddle Hall. After hearing him through I came to the conclusion that I could offer no objections to his argument other than those which would be merely technical or ingeniously sophistical. And as I wanted to be honest with myself I never opened the subject up again. From that time forward I gradually gravitated out of Catholicism into Secularism, and I am now as bad as any of the rest of you, theologically speaking. I hav just received a letter from Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, who says that notwithstanding that she is somewhat feeble, she intends to be at the Convention.

Yours truly, J. J. MCCABE.

Lectures and Meetings.

OWING to many members being of town, and for other reasons deemed sufficient, the officers of the Manhattan Liberal Club hav postponed the opening fall meeting until the first Friday in October. T. B. WAKEMAN, President.
A. C. MACDONALD, Secretary.

MR. E. W. CHAMBERLAIN writes that Burnham Wardwell's friends hav made arrangements by which he receives the kindest care and the best medical treatment at the Hygienic Home of Dr. W. A. English, in Vineland, N. J., where he will remain until September. It is hoped that he will then be so far recovered from the effects of the outrage inflicted upon him at Dedham jail, that he will be able to continue with renewed vigor his contest against the abuses and inhumanities practiced upon prisoners, paupers, and the insane.

A Lesson from Lightning.

A telegram from Madrid brings news of a fatal thunderbolt which fell last week upon a church at Gerona while mass was being celebrated in the building. Two of the worshipers were struck by the lightning and instantly killed, while fifteen other persons in the congregation were severely hurt.

If these casualties had occurred on a Sunday picnic instead of in a church, and to people engaged in amusing themselvs instead of worshiping God, there would hav been many to think and say that the fire from heaven was simply an instrument of punishment from an offended deity, to signify displeasure at a transgression of his laws.

The doctrin of special providence, however, becomes peculiarly unsatisfactory in cases like this.

Doubtless it is better to worship than to revel; but if a congregation of worshipers is in an edifice peculiarly exposed to lightning, while a party of revelers is in a properly protected building, the chances will be decidedly in favor of the revelers.

Lightning, like rain, seems inclined to descend equally upon the just and the unjust. As the just man who wishes to keep off the rain must use an umbrella, so the just man who wants to keep off the lightning must use a lightning rod.

There was once a well-known Rhode Islander who, after having contributed liberally toward the erection of a church in the town where he lived, was asked to giv something more to help get a lightning rod.

"No," he answered; "not a cent. If God wants to burn up his own building, let him burn it!"

If his view prevailed, we fear the number of churches struck by lightning in a year would be much greater than now.—New York Sun.

THE Rev. Father Northgraves, a Roman Catholic humbug, has written a work entitled, "Mistakes of Modern Infidels; or, Evidences of Christianity. Comprising a complete refutation of Colonel Ingersoll's 'Mistakes of Moses' and 'Objections' of Voltaire, Paine, and others against Christianity." This is another book to be piled away on the back shelves with Watson's "Apology" and Lambert's "Notes." Meanwhile Freethought moves swiftly but serenely on.

DOES MARTYRDOM PROMOTE LONGEVITY?—Of the first sixteen popes, all but six are said to hav suffered martyrdom, and yet their average term of service was three months longer than that of the last sixteen preceding Pius IX. So Christian martyrdom appears to promote longevity in St. Peter's chair.—Antichrist.

More of Bacon and Shakspere.

A.D. 1596.

Bacon at 35 continues in retirement. Mr. Spedding does not wonder at his reluctance to devote his life to the ordinary practice of a lawyer, but is unable to discover what other plan he had to clear himself of debt and make a living. He says:

What course he betook himself to at this crisis at which we hav now arrived, I cannot positivly say. I do not find any letter of his which can be probably assigned to the winter of 1595–6, nor hav I met among his brother's papers with anything which indicates what he was about, more than a few notes relating to the satisfaction (or more generally dissatisfaction) of creditors. I presume, however, that he betook himself to his studies. One of the loose sheets which I hav printed under the title of "Formularies and Elegancies" is dated January 27, 1595[–6].

On the 2d of June an expedition, commanded by Essex, sails from Plymouth; on the 21st the Spanish fleet is burned, and Cadiz taken. Essex returns in triumph. The pope issues a bull authorizing Elizabeth's subjects to depose her. No letter from Bacon to Essex in relation to this enterprise is found until it is over, but, from subsequent letters, it is evident that he did not favor Essex as a commander. In a long letter dated October 21st, he says:

Although I giv place to none in true gratulation, yet neither do I repent me of safe counsel; neither do I judge of the whole play by the first act. . . A man of a nature not to be ruled; that hath the advantage of my affection and knoweth it; of an estate not grounded to his greatness; of a popular reputation; of a military dependence. I demand whether there can be a more dangerous image than this represented to any monarch living, much more to a lady, and of her majesty's apprehension.

During the Christmas holidays Bacon receives "gracious usage and speech" from the queen, making him hopeful of more substantial favors, and he in turn presents her with a sample of a meditated work on the "Maxims of the Law," which is never completed. As to his other literary work at this time Mr. Spedding says:

To the same period must be referred the "Essays" in their earliest form, the fragment entitled, "Colors of Good and Evil," and the "Meditationes Sacrae," which were published shortly after. From these we may partly infer the nature of his occupations during the autumn and winter of 1596, concerning which we would otherwise be left in ignorance.

Sometime this year Bacon writes to the earl of Shrewsbury, from Gray's Inn, "to borrow a horse and armor" for some public show. Another letter without date from Bacon to Lord Burleigh probably relates to the same affair, and belongs to the latter part of this year. Bacon expresses his sorrow that "the joint masque from the four inns faileth," and adds:

Rather than this occassion shall pass without some demonstration of affection from the Inns of Court, there are a dozen gentlemen of Gray's Inn that, out of the honor which they bear to your lordship and my lord chamberlain, to whom, at their last masque, they were so much bounden, will be ready to furnish a masque, wishing it were in their powers to perform it according to their minds.

A letter written this year to Sir Fulke Greville on his studies, and signed "E." (i.e., Essex), is claimed by Mr. Spedding to be written by Bacon. It has this remarkable sentence:

For poets I can commend none, being resolved to be ever a stranger to them.

Shakspere at 32, if we may trust the memorandum of a complaint by the "Inhabitants of Southerk," dated July, 1596, is living in Southwark, near the Bear Gardens. The names of eleven complainants are appended, the sixth being "Mr. Shaksper."

On the 22d of July Lord Chamberlain Hunsdon dies, and is succeeded by his son, Lord Hunsdon, as patron of the theatrical company to which Shakspere belongs. "Romeo and Juliet" has a great run, and is published in the following year.

John Shakspere, now a gentleman of Stratford, at the instance of his son William applies to the Herald's College for a grant of a coat of arms.

A.D. 1597.

Bacon at 36 publishes the first edition of his "Essays." In the "Story of Lord Bacon's Life," by Dixon, 1862, the author says:

Beyond the two state papers on Parsons's libel and Lopez's treason Bacon had yet done nothing publicly as an author. A few essays, a few meditations, with some other short pieces of his composition, were passing, as Shakspere's sugared sonnets and Raleigh's fugitiv verses were at the same time passing, from hand to hand. But a rogue of a printer being about to publish these scraps, their author, in fear of imperfect copies, put them with his own hand to press.

Raleigh's "fugitiv verses" were first collected and published in 1813. In 1590 he commended Spenser's "Faery Queen" in two sonnets, which are prefixed to the poem, followed by the versified praises of five anonymous or unknown poets, one of whom we shall prove was Bacon. Sidney and other men of rank had written sonnets; and when John Florio, in his "World of Words," printed in 1598, said, "There is another sort of leering crows that rather snarl than bite, whereof I could instance in one, who, lighting on a good sonnet of a gentleman's, a friend of mine, that loved better to be a poet than to be counted so, called the author a rhymer," may he not hav meant Bacon, whose poetic works were not altogether concealed? In 1592, as we hav seen, and in 1599, as we shall see, Bacon addressed sonnets to the queen, and afterward, in 1603, alluding to the same he said, "I profess not to be a poet."

On the 12th of March Sir Wm. Hatton dies, leaving a young widow, clever, handsome, and well provided; daughter of Sir Thomas Cecil, whose stepmother was Bacon's aunt—probably, therefore, an early acquaintance. A wealthy marriage would at any time hav been an effectual cure of Bacon's worst disease, poverty. Essex, at Bacon's request, writes to her parents and to herself on his behalf. Whether there was a proposal of marriage, and a rejection, we do not know; but on the 7th of November in the following year the wealthy widow is married to the narrow-minded Coke, a widower, aged forty-six, with ten children, and makes him miserable.

In Bacon's letter of October 21, 1596, he advised Essex not to aspire to the place of Earl Marshal, or Master of Ordnance, but rather to that of Lord Privy Seal. On the 10th of March, 1597, after a quarrel with the queen, Essex is made Master of Ordnance. Another expedition is prepared against Spain, and Essex is commander-in-chief. Bacon writes a letter to him concerning the widow Hatton: "My suit to your lordship is for your several letters to be left with me, dormant, to the gentlewoman and either of her parents." In regard to the expedition he says: "Preserve your person for further merit and service of her majesty and your country."

Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's.
—Henry VIII.

The fleet sails, but is driven back to Plymouth by a storm, and when refitted is not strong enough for an attack on the Armada. But it proceeds to the Azores for the purpose of intercepting the returning Indian fleet. This enterprise, however, fails, and Essex returns, apparently as popular as ever, but not in favor with the court and queen.

No record of any communication at this time appears between Essex and Bacon, who is now engaged in the business of the new Parliament, which meets October 24th and adjourns till November 5th. In this Parliament, says Mr. Spedding, "there is scarcely a committee list in which his name does not appear."

Essex's last quarrel with the queen made him Master of Ordnance; another quarrel makes him Earl Marshal, December 18th; the very offices which Bacon in October, 1596, tried to dissuade him from seeking, as being most likely to bring him into trouble. Truly did a great officer at court remark of Essex: "I know but one friend and one enemy my lord hath; that one friend is the queen, and that one enemy is himself" (Apothegms).

Some time during this year Bacon writes a letter of thanks to Lord Burleigh for favors received. He adds:

I see well the Bar will be my Bier, as I must and will use it rather than my poor estate or reputation shall decay. But I stand indifferent whether God call me or her majesty. Had I that in my possession which by your lordship's only means against the greatest opposition her majesty granted me [see 1589], I would never trouble her majesty, but serve her still voluntarily without pay. . . . I never thought so well of myself for any one thing as that I hav found fitness, to my thinking, in myself to observe and revere your virtues. For the continuance whereof, in the prolonging of your days, I will still be your beadsman.

Here we beg leave to insert what ought to hav come in seven years before.

The 33d anniversary of Elizabeth's coronation was celebrated November 17, 1590. Sir Henry Lee, the queen's champion and master of the armory, who had conducted the exercises from the beginning, appeared for the last time, and, after the customary performances, resigned his office to the Earl of Cumberland, whereupon the celebrated vocalist, Mr. Hales, a servant of her majesty, pronounced and sung the following verses, personating the aged man-at-arms:

My golden locks hath time to silver turned (O Time too swift, and swiftness never ceasing!),
My youth against age, and age at youth hath spurned,
But spurned in vain; youth waneth by increasing
Beauty and strength, and youth flowers fading been,
Duty, faith, love, are roots and ever green.

My helmet now shall make a hive for bees,
And lovers' songs shall turn to holy psalms;
A man-at-arms must now stand on his knees,
And feed on prayers that are old age's alms.
And so from court to cottage I depart;
My saint is sure of my unspotted heart.

And when I sadly sit in lonely cell,
I'll teach my swains this carol for a song:
"Blest be the hearts that wish my Sovereign well, Curst be the souls that think to do her wrong."
Goddess! vouchsafe this aged man his right,
To be your beadsman now that was your knight.

Parallels are found in Bacon and Shakspere with almost every sentiment and expression in these lines. See Mrs. Pott's "Promus," p. 528. The change of color in hair she finds noticed in these two authors only. Silver hair or beard occurs six times in the plays; "your beadsman" in Bacon's letter to Lord Burleigh, quoted above, and in "Two Gentleman of Verona," 1591.

The verses were published anonymously in Dowland's "First Book of Songs," 1600, and again in 1844; both times with the pronouns changed from the first to the third person—e. g., "His golden locks," etc. In the "Works of George Peele," 1828, they are credited to that poet, but the only evidence adduced of his authorship is the fact that he, as an eye-witness, wrote a poetic description of the celebration in 1590. Mrs. Pott is doubtless right in claiming for Bacon the authorship, and is only mistaken in supposing that "The Retired Courtier," to whom the verses were intended to apply, was Lord Burleigh, who at that time, on account of the loss of his wife, had temporarily withdrawn from court (see Segar's "Honor, Military and Civil," 1602).

Shakspere at 33 negotiates for the purchase of public securities in Stratford (afterward perfected for £260), and buys a house there for £60. He is engaged in agriculture and traffic, and his father enters a suit in chancery for the restoration of his estate.

"Richard II." and "Richard III." are entered, printed, and played. The former was probably produced the year before. The printed edition omits the entire scene of deposing King Richard. The omission is attributed by Malone to fear of the queen's displeasure. The play receives the countenance of Essex and excites the jealousy of the queen.

The "Merchant of Venice" is either played or in preparation. A tragedy of this name is entered and printed, but the critics presume it is not Shakspere's. From two small fragments accidentally preserved, "it is clear," says Mr. Halliwell-Phillipps, "that Shakspere did not hesitate to adopt an occasional line from his predecessors."

Up to this time nearly half of Shakspere's plays hav been written or sketched, and most of the same put upon the stage. Six of these hav been printed, but without the name of the author on the title page. Nor does Shakspere's name thus appear as a writer of plays until some time after the publication of Bacon's "Essays."

ANTIQUARY.

Mr. Reynolds Facetiously Criticised.

I always read with great interest whatever our indefatigable and able brother, the Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds, givs to the world through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I know his great worth as a propagandist of what he believes to be the truth; but I think I now and then catch glimpses of the "old faith that was in him," and which doubtless made him, as a minister of the gospel, somewhat decided or emphatic in his sermons, in claims of knowledge about sundry things regarding which nobody, except gospel preachers, knows anything, and of which "nobody who is anybody" ought ever to know or wish to know anything; and I wish to "point a moral" here by citing a few lines from Mr. Reynolds's contribution to THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 8th, "Facts and Fallacies of the New Testament," p. 499, col. 2. Mr. Reynolds writes therein:

"Jesus answered, In the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven" (Matt. xxii, 30). Here is the plainest possible, the most positiv, declaration that there is no human love in heaven, that angels were never fathers, mothers, husbands, wives, or children; that in heaven there will be no more love for husband or wife than for any other saint, etc., etc.

Now, I make no comment on the last clause of what I quote above, but I do say that Mr. Reynolds's "exegesis," as above, of the language he quotes as Jesus's is the boldest and baldest non sequitur I remember to hav ever met in literature, not excepting anything I hav seen in the ordinarily inconsequential diatribes of professional pulpiteers. It is wholly illogical, bearing no necessary relation to the premises (the text cited); such is the exegesis as it stands unsupported by context, and bald to the eyes of ignorant readers, whom Mr. Reynolds ought to try to enlighten, rather than leave them in "spiritual darkness," dependent for their opinions upon his dicta alone. So I will assume that Mr. Reynolds drew upon some fund of knowledge obscured to most other people's minds, when he made bold to launch upon the world his peculiar "exposition of the holy scriptures" as to the text he cites. It will therefore be in order, I suppose, to ask him to please tell us how he knows it to be a fact that, while there's no marrying in heaven, there are no children born there, no fathers and mothers there. It is true that the mother of the Jesus from whom he quotes is said to hav been married to Joseph here on earth, but I suspect that Mr. Reynolds is aware that all Christendom supposes that the angels of God were quite sure that Jesus, a child of Mary, was not the issue of the marriage of Joseph and Mary; (and I hint at this merely to giv "respectability" to that alliance of the sexes throughout the world which is so "natural" and common—without marriage—that a vast portion of the inhabitants of the globe to-day are what we under our laws would call "bastards"). Fie! Mr. Reynolds's pen must hav slipped in some way; else he has important information which he ought to giv to the public touching the co-relations of the "angels of God."

I do not expect Mr. Reynolds to make a play upon words, and claim that the Greek aggelos (an angel) is masculin, and that therefore angels are all of one gender and so not given in marriage; but he may, for this is the only ground of defense, I opine, which he could well present for his very broad assertion—in the way of "exegesis"—posed on a very narrow basis. The logicians who read THE TRUTH SEEKER will wonder, till they know, where Mr. Reynolds keeps his "major premises." Let us hear from him.

Some Language Needs.

Our list of words, numerous as it is, is yet not comprehensiv enough to fulfil the highest ideal of a perfect tongue. We need more tools—a good many of them—and it sometimes seems a pity rather that we cannot manufacture and introduce them when the need is perceived, than that some of those we hav offend in their composition the strict requirements of congruity. We badly need, for instance, epicene pronouns in the singular answering to they, them, and their, in the plural. True it is, one can often use he, him, and his, expecting hearers or readers to remember that "the brethren embrace the sistern." True it also is, one can often get around the difficulty by rearranging a sentence; but there is a difficulty, for all that. A man wishes to say that each of his two children—a boy and a girl—has the exclusiv use of a bedroom. He naturally begins: "Each of my children has a room to——" how shall he finish? It is not quite right to say that each has a room to himself, or to herself, and it is certainly far from grammatical or pleasing to say themselves. What shall he do? The problem is of daily occurrence, as anyone will find who will take pains to watch for it.

We need, too, a preterit for the verb ought. We are compelled to say, "You ought to hav done such and such things"—which is by no means what we really mean. One cannot possibly be under obligation to hav done anything—the phrase is absurd. All obligation is to do, and it would be an important gain in the direction of clearness and conciseness if we might say, when speaking of past time, "you oughted."

We need, again, a word almost synonymous with many, but having a slightly different shade of meaning—a lack which is often supplied, awkwardly and incorrectly, by the use of numerous with a plural noun. People say, "There are numerous books on that subject"—which is clearly ungrammatical. There may be a numerous list of books, but that expression, correct in syntax, does not seem quite to express the idea; and to say there are many books may be rather too strong a statement.

We need, once more, a verb for which replace is commonly substituted, there being nothing better at hand. One removes a painting from his wall and hangs up an engraving in its stead. For a brief statement of this action, we hav at present nothing better than to say that the painting was replaced by the engraving. Yet this is really nonsense. To replace a thing is to put it back where it was before.

Then there are not a few adverbs which one meets in foreign tongues, and finds so useful that he wonders at himself for never having noticed the absence of corresponding words in English. Familiar examples are freundlich and höffentlich in German. One cannot say in English, "he received me friendly," convenient as it would be sometimes to do so, neither kindly nor cordially quite answering the purpose. Nor can we say, "The doctor has hopeably given the right medicine." If you presume he has done so, you may say presumably—if you are sure of it, you hav undoubtedly—but if you only desire to express a pretty strong hope, you must cast your sentence in another mold.

At the same time, we hav certainly bad words enough—bad, not because they are irregular in form or composed of incongruous elements, but because they are for some other reason (adopting Noah Webster's sententious expression) nonsensical. Helpmeet is one of these monsters. The result of a stupid blunder in running together a noun and an adjectiv that stand separate in the familiar verse in Genesis, it can hardly be called a word at all; it means nothing in particular, and is worse than useless. Equally useless for the most part is the school-ma'amish insistence upon indicating, by the addition of ess, the feminin gender in a number of nouns indicativ of occupation or position. Sometimes, of course, the sex of the person referred to has a direct bearing upon her relations to her calling, as in the case of an actress, whom it is often doubtless well to discriminate, in speech as in thought, from an actor. But it can hardly be maintained that any such necessity exists in the case of a woman who may happen to be an editor, a postmaster, a manager, or a poet. Yet we read not unfrequently of editresses and postmistresses; the dignified Westminister Review calls poet not sufficiently distinct when the poet is a woman, and gives its sanction to poetess; and the Illustrd London News, which often devotes a considerable portion of one of its most entertaining departments to discussions of colloquial English, its meaning and its proprieties, is actually guilty of manageress. Here, as before, the extra syllable is merely an encumbrance; we could not only get along just as well without it; we should actually do better.

But by far the most important suggestion offered by the analogies of the little group relates to the folly of misusing our verbal tools. People speak, for instance, of preposterous statements, meaning only that they are incorrect or absurd. No preposterous is not properly synonymous with either of these adjectivs, but has a definit meaning of its own, which can be expressed by no other word, signifying as it does the putting of something first which ought to be last—the getting of the cart before the horse, as it were. We are badly compensated for losing the power of expressing this idea in a single word by gaining a new and hardly distinguishable synonym for absurd.

Then there is aggravating for exasperating. The distinction has been pointed out a thousand times. Everybody knows that to aggravate is to make worse. A man's crime may be aggravated by the circumstances; to say that the man himself is aggravated means, not that he is annoyed, but that, being an evil at best, he is made a greater nuisance than he has been. Yet it is surprising how many influential writers, especially in England, insist on confounding the terms. Dickens does so over and over again in "Great Expectations." I read the other day in the Mark Lane Express of persons who "jerk the reins in that aggravating manner." A pamphlet lately published in London, and relating to a certain class of books in the British Museum, is entitled, "Aggravating Ladies." Most surprising of all, perhaps, is the following, from the Westminster Review (October, 1881, p. 284, Scott edition): "The selections from 'The Giaour' are exceedingly aggravating."

Restiv for uneasy.—A restiv horse is a lazy horse that wants to rest, and by no means, as sometimes seems to be supposed, a nervous horse that wants to go.

Fabulous for very great.—One may properly speak of the fabulous wealth of an impostor, meaning the property which he falsely pretends to hav. But what nonsense it is, when one thinks of it, to say that a lady's jewels are of "fabulous value," meaning that they cost a great deal of money!

Temperance and protectiv.—Without expressing any opinion as to the advisability of indulging in alcoholic beverages, one may properly denounce, from grammatical considerations only, the absurdity of speaking of a man who abjures them entirely as "strictly temperate." How can one be temperate in the use of that which he does not use? And similarly, without expressing any opinion as to the wisdom of a national policy of limiting importations from foreign countries, one may point out that the name "protectiv tariff," as applied to a tariff by which this result is brought about, is objectionable for the reason that it begs the whole question at issue. Such a tariff restricts, limits. Whether it really protects anything, in any proper application of the term, is disputed.

Circumstance for event.—We continually hear people say that they will "relate a circumstance" that occurred under their own observation. A circumstance occur? They might as well speak of the motionless scenery at a theater as performing.

Demean for debase.—This blunder seems to hav arisen partly from an imagined relationship between the verb demean and the adjectiv mean, and partly from the fact that the verb is used in a good many rather familiar passages in old and standard writers in such connection that debase would hav made equally good sense. A recollection of the noun demeanor, which is certainly not synonymous with debasement, ought to be a sufficient correction of the error.

Merchant for tradesman or shopkeeper.—In the older and better use of the word, it was strictly confined to persons who carried on foreign traffic. To call retail dealers "merchants" is to multiply synonyms uselessly, at the cost of losing a very convenient distinction.

Sustain for receive.—Chiefly in daily-paper language: "The victim sustained a bruise on his left arm." Well, it would hav been remarkable if the victim had not "sustained" a wound of that description. The writer was of course trying to say that the person received the wound. How hard it is, sometimes, to be simple!

Liable for likely.—A wrongdoer is liable to punishment. To say that he is "liable to escape," meaning that he is likely to escape, is to commit an error that is really comical in its absurdity, when one compares the true meaning of the sentence with the idea intended to be conveyed.

The list stretches out indefinitly; one knows not where to stop. It seems that on this subject, as on some others, there is verily need of line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a good deal. Yet one word of caution must be added. The doctrine that words should not be used to convey ideas foreign to their real meaning ought never to be so perverted as to interfere with their employment in a secondary, derivativ, or figurativ sense, the legitimate outgrowth of their primary significance. A single illustration will make this clear. The verb to indorse means to put on the back of, and the United States post-office department informs the senders of registered letters, by a placard displayed in many post-offices, that such letters "require the name of the sender to be indorsed on the face of the envelope!" Indorsed on the face! The writer of this notice—who, doubtless, imagined that indorsed was merely a more elegant synonym for written—might as well speak of hoisting a load down. But no small quantity of what I venture to think rather wooden-headed criticism has been expended on the use of the same verb to signify approve or sanction, as in the common expression, to indorse a candidate or a movement. It seems to be forgotten that in the usual application of the term—the indorsing of a note or a check—we hav always in mind, not only the fact that something is actually written on the back of the paper in question, but also and chiefly the far more important fact that the writer of the indorsement, in putting down his name, agrees to warrant and defend the holder of the document against loss resulting from his confidence in it. In other words, he may be said to back up the original maker. And just as it is indisputably good English to speak of a man's friends as backing him, so it is absolutely good English to speak of a lawyer indorsing a layman's opinion about a legal question, or a scholar indorsing the positions maintained in a book on classical subjects. To object to such use of language as this is to push grammatical criticism to an extreme that is likely to render it ridiculous, though, if the critics could persuade the people to follow them, it would result in a senseless limitation of our choice of words—a real and by no means inconsiderable injury to the language.—Gilbert M. Tucker, in the New Englander.

Criminals on the Bench.

E. W. Chamberlain in John Swinton's Paper.

The notion is very prevalent just now that every judge "has his price," and as long as the conduct of our judges is such as to justify this notion, so long will the standards of integrity throughout the community remain low. I want to add my mite to the literature on this subject, for I believe it will some day be regarded as valuable history. I hav in my possession the deposition of Ambrose H. Purdy, who for eight years acted as public prosecutor in the United States Circuit Court in New York city, where Judge Benedict, during that time, presided. Mr. Purdy testifies:

> Q. Don't you think that your services in that case were just as valuable as those of the defendant's counsel? A. No, nor in any government case; because we don't put a man on trial until we hav two-thirds or nine-tenths the best of the case before we start, and the lawyer on the other side has harder work. It is easier for the district attorney. You hav all the power of the government of the United States behind you, and you hav all the detectivs you want, who will swear almost anything you want them to swear to, and you hav all the jurors, because they are paid by the United States, and they don't pay the jurors as they are paid in this court—there they are paid so much a day, and the verdict is for the government every time.

No more truthful description of Judge Benedict's court could be given. This short paragraph tells the whole story of fraud, corruption and outrage. Until very recently, a person accused of an offense in this court had no opportunity to testify in his own behalf, and to-day the farce is enacted of an appeal from this court to a court composed of three judges, one of whom is the trial judge himself. The proceedings in this court are a mockery of justice and a disgrace to humanity. I believe many innocent men hav gone down to an ignominious doom from this court. I can certainly name several. Here Mr. Edward Lange and the philanthropist, Dr. Foote, were convicted. The conviction of D. M. Bennett in this court shocked the moral sense of the world. It was said of it that "it was a predetermined fact that conviction had to be had, and that everything was conducted to that end with such unsparing disregard of the ordinary rules of justice, law, and fair-dealing that no other result than that arrived at could hav been expected."

I write to-day only to perpetuate the evidence of Mr. Purdy, and bring it to the notice of those who are interested. Rev. J. M. Pullman said once, at a dinner given to Henry George, that the most dangerous criminals are those who liv under frescoed ceilings. We might truthfully go further, and say that, of all criminals who liv under frescoed ceilings, the most dangerous are the criminals who occupy places on the bench of justice.

A True Bourbon.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 1st Mr. Malcolm says: "They hav passed laws in the state of Michigan which hav enabled rich men to buy up and hold out of production 28,000,000 acres out of the 36,000,000 acres of the lands of that state." There is not a syllable of truth in that statement. Mr. Malcolm seems to be one of those men who are stocked with a certain amount of data and arguments, and when these hav been ground out in a mechanical way, he begins where he did before, and grinds them all over again in regular turn. He made the above statement less than a year ago, and I corrected it for the benefit of others and explained the whole matter. I promised to offer no criticism of Mr. Malcolm's views as long as he refrained from misstatements in matters of fact, and I hav kept that promis, but if he makes that statement again, I shall be compelled to reject the excuse of ignorance or absent-mindedness and say plainly that he has wilfully falsified. It is said that a Bourbon never learns anything, and never forgets anything.

Intellect and Faith.

We are thankful to the New York Sun for this admission that faith in the supernatural can exist only by a subordination of the intellect. We hav believed it all along. The Sun says, in answer to a correspondent:

"Men of strong intellect are apt to find that they cannot satisfy the religious sentiment, which is also strong in them, in any other way than by giving up reasoning about religion and allowing their emotions full play by the aid of faith. They get relief and rest by ceasing from vain inquiries and falling back upon unquestioning belief. They want to giv vent to their religious feelings and their desire to worship. But at this time, perhaps more than at any other since the advent of Christianity, the number of those who hav given up faith altogether is steadily and even rapidly increasing; and it unquestionably includes a large part of the strongest and best educated minds of the world. They are adopting a philosophy which ignores the supernatural, and, consequently, takes no account of theology except as a superstition which has had an enormous influence upon mankind. They are not troubled about their future state, for they are not at all sure about immortality, even if the future life does not seem to them contradictory to probability; and they are not oppressed by a sense of sin, for it appears to them that they do about as well as could be expected of them. Yet many of these men, too, hav the religious sentiment strongly developed, and the barrenness of their philosophy on the emotional side is often very unsatisfactory to them. They cannot accept the existing religion, and they are vainly waiting for one to turn up which will better suit their notions. Vainly, because how can there be a religion without faith?"

Upon those who "get relief and rest by ceasing from vain inquiries and falling back upon unquestioning belief," Colonel Ingersoll has very appropriately commented. In his discussion with Judge Black, he said: "In this age of fact and demonstration it is refreshing to find a man who believes so thoroughly in the monstrous and miraculous, the impossible and immoral—who still clings lovingly to the legends of the bib and rattle—who through the bitter experiences of a wicked world has kept the credulity of the cradle, and finds comfort and joy in thinking about the Garden of Eden, the subtil serpent, the flood, and Babel's tower stopped by the jargon of a thousand tongues—who reads with happy eyes the story of the burning brimstone storm that fell upon the cities of the plain, and smilingly explains the transformation of the retrospectiv Mrs. Lot—who laughs at Egypt's plagues and Pharaoh's whelmed and drowning hosts—eats manna with the wandering Jews, warms himself at the burning bush, sees Korah's company by the hungry earth devoured, claps his wrinkled hands with glee above the heathens' butchered babes, and longingly looks back to the patriarchal days of concubines and slaves. How touching when the learned and wise crawl back in cribs and ask to hear the rhymes and fables once again! How charming in these hard and scientific times to see old age in Superstition's lap, with eager lips upon her withered breast!"

The answer to the closing question of the quotation from the Sun is that there assuredly can be no "religion without faith." And there are men of intelligence, too, in the world who, looking over the history of the past, hav inquired if it is altogether necessary, all things considered, to hav a religion; and whether, perhaps, people would not on the whole be just as well or even better off without any. The religions that hav existed hav unquestionably had many harmful results, and their utility has as yet to be demonstrated. What, for instance, has Christianity ever done to atone for its atrocities? Has it ever saved as many lives as it has taken? Has it ever built asylums enough to hold the orphans it has made? Certainly not. And even if it had been, as it professes to be, a religion of peace, it would still hav a long account to settle with progress and civilization for having opposed every step of science and discovery.

But if there are those who believe religion to be unnecessary, there are also many intelligent persons who, while taking "no account of theology except as a superstition," still believe that much good may be accomplished by a proper manipulation and guidance of the so-called religious sentiments. These are the Positivists, whose religion is the Religion of Humanity, and whose faith is an abiding trust in the happy destiny of mankind upon earth. In this religion the believer finds his supreme being ever with him, and his faith, if sometimes misplaced, is at least not always, like the supernaturalist's, empty and futil.

If any object is destined or fit to receive the homage of the world when it shall be no longer directed to a mythus of the skies, that object is Humanity in its entirety. Its "worship" will be the performance of any good deed. Such a religion may be adopted by those who "cannot accept the existing religion," and "are vainly waiting for one to turn up which will better suit their notions."

Mr. George's Great Mistake.

In a letter from Henry George to the New York Tribune we are surprised to find the writer taking the absurd position indicated by the following paragraph:

"Something stronger than the combination of 'Atheism, Malthusianism, and Republicanism' is coming to the front, something more capable of rousing enthusiasm and inspiring effort. In the polished society of England to-day the Salvation Army is regarded with something of the amused contempt with which the cultured Roman of the first centuries of our era must hav regarded that uncouth Galilean superstition then beginning to make its way among slaves and proletarians. But the thoughtful must see in an organization that can raise the enthusiasm and do the work that the Salvation Army has already done, at least a social power. As preached in churches where Dives occupies the best pew and Lazarus would be ashamed to enter, Christianity may be a bulwark of conservation, but let loose in alleys and byways, and preached to the poor and the outcast by enthusiasts of their own class, it cannot be so muzzled that it will not be a revolutionary force. Whatever be its absurdities, the Salvation Army carries into that seething mass of want and suffering in which the foundations of the English social structure are laid the message that it was for such as they that Christ died, and for such as they that the mansions of heaven hav been prepared. In the exposures of the Pall Mall Gazette the Salvation Army has had a primary part, and they can hardly fail to turn to something partaking of the nature of a Socialistic propaganda the work of this powerful organization."

Nothing more preposterous than this, that we hav seen, has come from even the most deluded of the Christian Socialists. The idea that the Salvation Army, or any other religious crusade, is likely to help the cause of labor, will strike the trades unionists and other movers for the rights of the workingman in this country, probably in England, and especially on the Continent, as something peculiarly novel. The drift of the labor movement is at least toward "Atheism;" more "Malthusianism" would be beneficial, and in "republicanism," or in something still further removed from kingcraft, is the worker's only hope.

The Salvation Army in England is merely a scheme to feather the nest of "General" Booth. Its participation in the Pall Mall Gazette exposures only serves to throw doubt and discredit upon those revelations and to float the army into public notice, as refuse is washed into the streets by the flooding of a sewer. Girls may as well fall into the hands of London patricians as to be abducted by Booth. It was only last week that a mother was obliged to appeal to the authorities to rescue her thirteen-year-old daughter from the clutch of this fanatic. In 1858 the pope's police stole the Jewish Mortara boy, and could not be made to relinquish him to the parents. General Booth, it seems, prefers to trade in girls.

To assist the workers in their conflict with capital is furthest from the intentions of the Salvation Army. Not long ago there was a strike in Toronto, and the Army sent word to the bosses that it would supply two hundred men to take the places of the strikers. That is the "message" which this crusade carries! And what kind of Socialism would that be which had its inception among the class that the Salvation Army professes to deal with? It would be the Socialism of the mob—the kind of Communism that has made real Communism disreputable. Of all fanaticisms, religious fanaticism has carried men to the farthest extremes of atrocity. Human lives are taken "in the name of God;" they are spared in the name of humanity. The Salvation Army is ridiculous while it is insignificant. When it becomes strong it will be dangerous.

There has been noticed of late a tendency on the part of Mr. George to indulge in religious twaddle. It has been regarded, however, merely as ballast thrown in for a sop to religious readers, and overlooked accordingly. But when a representativ man like him goes so far as to recommend and encourage such a movement as the Salvation Army, it is time a protest was entered. The workingman may well mistrust his self-appointed leaders when he finds them aiding or abetting his immemorial enemies.

The Albany Convention.

We are glad to notice the encouragement which Messrs. Putnam and McCabe are receiving in their preliminary work for the coming Convention of the New York Freethinkers' Association at Albany. This certainly promises to be one of the most important occasions in American history. And not alone will the occasion be important, but the speakers to be present are sufficient to attract all lovers of inspiring speech.

First and foremost, though last on the program, there will be the one whom all delight to listen to; the man whom a writer in the Investigator has aptly termed the Demosthenes of Free Speech—Col. Robert G. Ingersoll. It is a crowning glory of the National Liberal League that it can name as its president the foremost orator of this or any other age. Then, taking the speakers as they are announced, we are to hav Charles Watts, who bids fair to do what his forefathers failed to accomplish: conquer the American people—their hearts at least. Elizabeth Cady Stanton—one of the noblest and bravest of women. She brings with her the good will of all who favor the just demands of her sex. Courtlandt Palmer—how could we get along without him? One of the élite, he will tell us about "The Aristocracy of Freethought." Mrs. Mattie Krekel—the woman of judicial mind. Her place is with the judges on the bench. James Parton—the Plutarch of American history. May he find a faithful a biographer as he has been. T. B. Wakeman (he should come home president of the Association)—the stanch defender of the constitutional rights of the humblest and most unpopular citizen. Let us call him our Aristotle, "the father of those who know." Helen H. Gardener—the modern Hypatia, "no less admired for her beauty than her wit." When she discourses about "men, women, and gods," all three listen.

If these were all, it would be glory enough for one day, or for three days. But they are not all. Elizur Wright, the Nestor of Liberalism, will be there. Horace Seaver, of the Investigator—we wish he were read as far as he is known—is coming; so is G. N. Hill, Joseph McDonough, Mrs. Hoban, and C. B. Reynolds, the Little Giant; and over all will beam the genial countenance of S. P. Putnam.

Beside these will be the People, who, after all, will constitute the Convention.

We do not see how anyone can be happy and stay away from the Albany Convention. We shall drop our pen and go.

Two Good Letters.

The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER have not heard as much from Brother John Peck of late as the favorable remarks about his productions indicate that they would like to. We are glad to print the appended letter:

NAPLES, N. Y., Aug. 10, 1885.

"DEAR FRIENDS: Please send me a half dozen pictures—three of the historical 'Lessons,' and three of the 'Balaams.' The man who brought out those pictures is entitled to a reserved seat in the New Jerusalem. They are a decided hit; they are addressed both to the eye and to the reason. I would be satisfied with the work of my life if I could be the means of putting these pictures in every house in the United States. They ought to be in the house of every Freethinker.

"Some one has sent me a pamphlet entitled 'St. Matthew Before the Court,' with which I am well pleased. Although it contains but little which is new to the intelligent Freethinker, yet I give the author great credit for his ingenuity in clothing an old figure in a new dress. Thousands should and will read this little book and be induced to search the pages of history to find the facts to correspond with the statements set forth in the pamphlet. Every Liberal will be pleased with it. It gladdens my heart in my old days to see the good work go on. Truly, JOHN PECK."

Thanks. Letters like the following, also, are refreshing in this season of dull trade—or at any other season, for that matter. The writer is an old and esteemed subscriber:

"HOTCHKISS, COL., Aug. 1, 1885.

"EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed $20.00 to pay up my subscription, and also for the inclosed list of books [here follows a long list of books and pamphlets], and for the balance please send such books and tracts as in your judgment will do the most good. I am doing all the missionary work I can with my limited means.

"On the 11th of July we heard the first Liberal lecture ever delivered in this part of Colorado. The lecturer was O. A. Phelps. He spoke on the 11th on the subject, 'What is Infidelity?' and on the 12th he gave two lectures—'The Garden of Eden,' and 'What Must We Do to Be Saved?' He handled his subjects ably, and I think the lectures did a great deal of good. The Liberal element is getting rather too strong for the clergy in this part of the country, and I hope to do more to advance the cause by scattering broadcast Freethought documents. Hoping the truth may succeed, I remain, as ever, a truth seeker, E. T. HOTCHKISS."

SOME of the newspapers hav been raising objections to Parson Newman's funeral sermon over Grant, on the ground that it was tinsel-oratory. These papers had never seen the ministerial slaver that has come in since, or they would regard Newman's pyrotechnical display as something respectable. The following extract from a sermon by the Rev. H. Stone Richardson is a good sample of the worst that can be done. At the Grant memorial services at Oskosh, Wis., Mr. Richardson said:

"Last night I dreamed, and yet 'twas not quite a dream. I saw sitting upon the bronzed statue of America that crowns the dome of the Capitol at Washington, an eagle. In his beak was a scroll, upon which were the words, 'First in peace, first in war, first in the hearts of his countrymen.' And I heard a voice say to the eagle, 'Fly, and place that scroll upon the monument where truth and justice will place it in the ages to come. He unfurled his pinions and flew, and I was given power to follow him in his flight. He crossed the sea. Flew swift over the towers and monuments of the old world; flew over the tombs of Hannibal, Alexander, and Cæsar and Napoleon; flew more slowly over the grave of Wellington and the Andrew Marvells and Ireland's Emmett and O'Connell and over the tomb of Kosciusko. Then he turned his flight homeward and recrossed the sea and flew toward Mount Vernon, and stood poised above the grave of the sublime Washington. Long and lovingly he hovered over the grave, but at length he unfurled his pinions, and with slow, meditativ flight, directed his way to Springfield, and again poised in mid-air above the monument of our martyred Lincoln. Long he hovered above the tomb and circled round and round about it, and flying away from it stopped and returned, and again looked down upon the tomb, and then, with swift, graceful, decided flight, swept through the sky, nor rested until he stood above Riverside park, and there he poised his wing and began his downward flight, lower and yet lower, and laid the scroll—'First in peace, first in war, first in the hearts of his countrymen'—tenderly upon the tomb of U. S. Grant. God, walking over starry spheres, has taken him by the hand, and led him through a wide world's tears up to the deathless land."

The picture of an eagle standing above the grave of Washington, or flying meditativly toward Illinois, could hav been equaled only when God walked over the starry spheres, took that same proud bird by the hand, and waded with him through a sea of tears to the shores of the deathless land. Rev. H. Stone Richardson, of Oskosh, Wis., receive the cake!

ON March 28th last Thomas Crawford, the city treasurer of Oswego, N. Y., absconded, owing the city $25,000. He traces his downfall to a Catholic priest named O'Connell, who induced him to invest the city's money in gambling speculations. Discussion of the subject led to the discovery that O'Connell was apparently involved in rascalities in more ways than one. Crawford had a sister, who was the housekeeper of Father O'Connell, and she has brought charges of seduction against the priest. Michael Crawford, a brother of the defaulter, gathered together the testimony of witnesses and some letters of the priest that seemed to him to compromise the clergyman's character, and, going to Albany, submitted to Bishop McNierney charges against the priest. They are as follows, and are those upon which he is undergoing trial:

1. Drunkenness.
2. Criminal intimacy with Mary Crawford.
3. Abortion.
4. Bastardy.
5. Assault on Maggie Burns.
6. Operating in bucket shops.
7. Complicity with Thomas Crawford in using city money in bucket shops.
8. Cursing the people from the altar.
9. Attack on Thomas O'Brien.

O'Connell has been brought to trial by the church authorities, the case being opened last week Wednesday. He denies all the charges except the sixth, but Michael Crawford promises to prove them all. The specifications, if true, show the priest to be a most unprincipled scoundrel, and that he has lied, gambled, cheated his friends and parishioners, and betrayed the confidence of women. If the church council finds him guilty, O'Connell threatens to carry the case to Rome if necessary. On the other hand, if he is cleared, Crawford will appeal to the civil courts. As O'Connell is pronounced a "useful pastor," the latter alternativ will probably be adopted. The Catholic church is notorious for whitewashing its criminals.

IT is not clear to us what Truth, a Liberal paper published at Pittsburgh, Pa., means by what it says in its last issue. The editor inquires:

"Are we to hav a convention of the National League this year? It seems not. It appears to us that the officers of the National League are giving too much of their time to the Albany Convention to insure the success of the National Convention—if we are to hav one—to be held at Cleveland, O., September next. Much as we hope the Albany Convention will be a success, we do not think, however, it should be allowed to interfere with the success of the National one, which it undoubtedly will. The time for holding the National Convention is near at hand, and so far there has been nothing done to make it a success. If we are to hav a National Convention next September the matter ought to be vigorously agitated immediately. If we are not to hav one we ought to know the fact. We think a serious blunder has been made by arranging to hav the Albany Convention held in September. It ought to hav been postponed. What is to be done?"

There seems to be a misunderstanding on the part of Brother Pierce. (1) We are not to hav a "National Convention," exactly, but there will be an annual Congress of the League, which will be not only national but international, as the Canadian Freethinkers will be invited to attend. (2) The Congress will not be held in September, but in October, on the 9th, 10th, and 11th. (3) The officers of the League, as League officers, are giving no time at all to the Albany Convention. Mr. Putnam is an officer of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, and is performing the duties devolving upon him as such. As a League officer he is lecturing every Sunday. The men elected to conduct the Liberal campaign invite counsel and criticism; they can hardly be expected to welcome misrepresentation. (4) "What is to be done?" inquires the editor of Truth. Do all you can, Brother Pierce, to make successful both the Albany Convention and the Ninth Annual Congress of the League.

THIS rather startling dispatch appeared in the New York dailies of the 12th:

"PARIS, August 11th.—Advices from Tonquin say the Bishop of Quinhon reports that over ten thousand Christians hav been massacred in the provinces of Biendinh and Phuyen. Murders and incendiary fires are of almost daily occurrence. The vicariate has been annihilated."

The following day the dispatch was supplemented thus:

"PARIS, August 12th.—The Times says the massacre of Christians in Annam is the outcome of the immunity that criminals hav enjoyed there since 1883. It adds that it is the duty as well as to the interest of France to insist that exemplary punishment be inflicted upon the murderers."

If it is true that ten thousand Christians hav been massacred in China, punishment should certainly be visited upon the perpetrators. But then it must be remembered that "Biendinh" and "Phuyen" are a long way off; that ten thousand is a large number of people to stand still and allow themselvs to be massacred; and that the informant is a bishop. A subscription list for the relief of the sufferers will, of course, be opened immediately, "all subscriptions to be forwarded to the Bishop of Quinhon." It may also be remarked that it makes a difference whose ox is gored. When Christian soldiers enter the country of a barbarous people, where they hav no right, and kill off a few thousands of the nativs, the event is not telegraphed all over the world as a "massacre." It is merely a brilliant victory. But the outrage is gradually dwindling down. Here is the next dispatch:

"PARIS, August 13th.—The reports of the massacre in Annam were greatly exaggerated. Instead of 10,000, it is now stated that only a few hundred Christians were killed."

It is safe to predict that this "massacre" will ultimately be reduced to the dimensions of a street fight between a Chinese laundryman and a European who was trying to cheat him out of his washbill.

IT was thought that Squire's lines on Grant were the worst that could be written. Mayor Grace was of that opinion, for he ordered them to be taken down from the front of our city hall. But they hav been surpassed in foolishness. The Rev. N. B. Thompson, pastor of a Free Baptist church in this city, perpetrated the following in a recent sermon:

"What means this drapery, black and white?
Why these emblems rich and rare?
Why this grief on every hand,
This mourning all over our great land?
Is it because
The greatest of men has died?
Oh, no! there remain many as great as he,
But he was America's great son,
Whose name and virtues were praised
Far over land and sea.
For weary days there waited about his bier,
Mourners more than fifty million,
Of every rank, color, and creed,
Of every grade and station.
Was such a mere display of sentiment
Gotten up for political show?
Ah, no! such reason we do not hear;
But it was the united sentiment of
More than fifty millions of mourners
As they waited about his bier."

WE note this in the Independent of August 13th:

"You can find anything in the Bible if you look for it. See this about Grant, from 1 Sam. xvi, 18: 'Behold I hav seen a son of Jesse, . . that is a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in matters, and a comely person, and the Lord is with him.'"

Our contemporary is mistaken. The passage quoted refers unquestionably to Cyrus Romulus R. Teed.

WE are in receipt of the following:

"In Boston, Mass., August 11, 1885, by Rev. Allen Putnam,

—MARRIED—

Andrew Jackson Davis, of New York, to Della E. Markham, M.D., of Detroit, Mich."

Being a sequel to "Beyond the Valley."

IN the course of a long reply to our remarks on the "poverty" of the pope in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 25th, the Catholic Union and Times says:

"There can be no slavery so unbearable as that which binds to false guides, none so unqualified."

We accept the statement as a truth. The editor of the Catholic Union and Times will now be pleased to lift upon us the light of his reconciled countenance.

SOME of the lightning calculators, says the Philadelphia Ledger, in the true commercial spirit are at work already estimating the "total cost" of the Grant pageant. They think it will not be far from a million of dollars, on the following basis: "Expenses of regular troops, $3,000; expenses of National Guard, $90,000; expenses of the city, $29,000; expenses of civic organizations, $250,000; expenses of draping, $500,000. Total, $872,000." That is a large sum of money to expend upon a man after he is dead. Yet a funeral must needs be expensiv when Uncle Sam conducts the obsequies.

THERE is an eloquent temperance lecture in the fate of young Curtain McClain, of Orbisonia, Huntingdon county, Pa. He is twenty-one years of age, and has a pretty little wife of eighteen and an infant child. In August of last year he attended a camp-meeting at Newton Hamilton, in Mifflin county. On the way he purchased a large bread-knife for his mother and carried it along in his pocket. On the night that the camp-meeting closed, becoming intoxicated with whisky, he plunged the knife into the back of William Smearman, a young married man of twenty-four, who had a wife and three babies. McClain had never seen Smearman before and had no reason for quarreling with him. He has been found guilty of murder in the first degree, and awaits his death warrant in the Mifflin county jail. When sober he was industrious and inoffensiv. So far as practical responsibility goes he is innocent. In the eyes of the law he is a murderer. Whisky did it. But this is the age of whisky, and what is the best method of hastening its departure is a leading question. Religion has not done it, and, indeed, it is well known that religious ecstasy is the brother and counterpart of alcoholic intoxication, and the prolific parent of kindred crimes. Intemperance has defied all the resources of prohibition. It defies public opinion, which is supposed to make it disreputable. It will yield only to that mental enlightenment which teaches that any abnegation of the reason is a start along the highway of irresponsibility, that leads to every species of crime.

Answers to Inquirers.

TEXAS INFIDEL, Sulphur Springs,—The word sheol is pronounced as though spelled she-ole, with the accent on the first syllable.

AUSTIN WILSON, New York.—We do not know how the cross comes to surmount the tomb of General Grant, but we hav noticed that religious people are very assiduous in keeping that phallic symbol before the public eye. It is fair to suppose that some priest put it there. It should be taken down, and, along with Parson Newman and Squire's poem, become an ornament to obscurity.

P. B. R., Adrian.—The colonel, according to the best information we hav, raised a regiment and was in several engagements. He was captured by Forrest, who soon expressed a desire to exchange him because, as Forrest said, "he was too damned popular," and gave promis of winning the Confederates over to the Union. He was paroled. The colonel acknowledged himself unfit for a soldier. During an engagement, he says, he always thought of the widows and orphans every volley made. Chaplain McCabe cannot be relied upon. Many popular Sunday-school romances are referable to his ability as a prevaricator.

Measure of the Pope's Toleration.

Some time or other the pope will abandon his quarrel with United Italy. Leo XIII. evidently hopes that some trouble of the European world will giv the papacy a chance to return to temporal authority in Rome; but the next pope may hav learned that the kingdom of Italy is strong for the very reason which makes it weak in papal eyes, viz, that it is modern, and exists in spite of traditional Europe. The twenty-one parliaments of Austria are a proof that Europe is governed by a new order of ideas, and that United Italy is not an accident. Pope Leo has recently frowned upon his organ in Rome, the Osservatore Romano, for saying very hotly that a pope cannot tolerate Liberalism. The pope's censure may only mean that a pope can tolerate French Liberalism, or any other which will giv him temporal Rome.—Advocate.

A Peculiarity of Immoral Romance.

The Herald, under the editorial management of the Rev. Mr. Hepworth, rebukes the publication in London of certain scandalous chronicles, denounced as obscene contributions to the press, and at the same time takes advantage of the opportunity to parade its own knowledge of the worst portion in the class it pretends to denounce, through enumeration of authors not one of whose names one reader in a thousand in America probably ever heard mentioned. It is somewhat remarkable that nearly every immoral romance, from the days of Boccaccio and Pietro Aretino to that of Clelland, author of that infamous work which has never been out of print since it was burnt at Tyburn, has been the production of Romish priests or Protestant clergymen.—Mercury.

THE publishers of the North American Review announce that "Grant's Memorial: What Shall it Be?" is discussed in the September number of that periodical by Launt Thompson, Karl Gerhart, O. L. Warner, and Wilson McDonald, sculptors; W. H. Beard, painter; Calvert Vaux and Henry Van Brunt, architects; and Clarence Cook, art critic. This symposium is sure to attract wide attention at this time, when the desire is so general to erect a monument to Grant that shall be worthy of the man, the nation, and American art. The same number of the Review contains a consideration of the question, "Shall our National Banking System be Abolished?" by George S. Boutwell, F. J. Scott, S. Dana Horton, and Edward H. G. Clark. "Ouida" contributes an essay on "The Tendencies of English Fiction," and Elizabeth Stuart Phelps writes on "The Great Psychical Opportunity." But the most readable article in the number is ex-Sergeant-at-Arms French's "Reminiscences of Famous Americans," which is a series of delightful anecdotes about the famous war Senators. Mr. French is writing a book of these reminiscences. If it equals this instalment in the Review, it will be one of the famous works of modern literature.

Letters from Friends.

ALTOONA, PA., August 9, 285.

MR. EDITOR: It may be evidently right and proper to hold memorial meetings in honor of great men after they hav died. General Grant was, without a doubt, one of the greatest soldiers the world ever knew. His valor, his simplicity, his magnanimity toward our Southern brethren, won for him the admiration of all good people throughout the world. The great trouble is that great men are greatly slandered when living and then greatly praised when dead. Let us be more charitable to them when living, and then, as a distinguished Altoonian has said, "there will be no occasion to blush at their graves."

On yesterday (August 8th) memorial services were held in the city Opera House in honor of the dead general. Certainly nothing could be done without the aid of the preachers or shepherds, not less than seven of them taking part in the proceedings. Of course, the meeting opened with prayer and closed with prayer. Rev. M. J. Fiery (Lutheran) spoke of the great men of Europe, poets, statesmen, and great military leaders, and then of the great men of this nation, of those connected with the Revolution and the civil war, but not once did he refer to the name of Thomas Paine. Why was this? Just because Mr. Paine did not belong to the "charch." Another distinguished shepherd of the flock compared Grant to Joshua, Moses, and the babe of Bethlehem. Was not this blasphemy from a Christian standpoint? And then what a poor comparison between General Grant and General Joshua! Although there was no great orator present at the meeting, it was not because Altoona does not possess such a personage. We hav in our midst a gentleman who is preacher, poet, author, orator, and comedian. His name is William Scott Wilson. His reputation commenced last winter, after having reported the Freethinkers' Convention held in our city. He is a very vindictiv character, and greatly resembles an eight-day clock, for if you wind him up he will run a week. At a negro camp-meeting held near Altoona a few weeks ago the orators of the day were rev. William Scott Wilson and Rev. John Jasper, of Virginia, who says "the sun do move." WILLIAM J. BURNS.

ADRIAN, MICH., August 1, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Among the many memorial sermons preached in honor of General Grant during the past two weeks, the one by Rev. R. W. Wallace, of the Congregational church of Detroit, and the one preached in this city by Rev. John Wilson, of the M. E. church, must take the preference for absurdity and Christian malice.

Reverend Wallace draws a comparison between General Grant and the Israelitish butcher Joshua, but the reverend did not stop to consider that there is a very radical difference between the two men. General Grant led the Union armies to conquer a rebellion inaugurated for the purpose of destroying the government and building up a Southern Confederacy, whose chief corner-stone was human slavery.

Joshua led a horde of savage barbarians against innocent, inoffensiv nations, and waged war of extermination. General Grant always protected helpless women and children when thrown in his power. Joshua butchered all in cold blood—men, women, and helpless babes—without pity or remorse. Then, I ask, where is the resemblance between them, as the Rev. Wallace would hav us believe?

But hear the reverend hypocrit again. He says: "What a scandal and disgrace it would hav been upon the Christian people of the United States if General Grant and his family had chosen Colonel Ingersoll for a confidant and a companion during his long and severe sickness instead of an evangelical minister of the gospel like Dr. Newman! But General Grant and family gave all Liberals to understand no Infidels need apply for the very high and honorable position." By the way, do you think the gallant colonel will survive this awful shock?

Now for our own Rev. Wilson, of Adrian. He gave out a very polite invitation to the Woodbury Post No. 45, Grand Army of the Republic, of which your correspondent is a member, to listen to a memorial sermon on Grant. I was present and heard the sermon. I would send it to you, but do not think it would pay to waste your time to read it. P. B. REASONER.

MR. EDITOR: Accept herein my first letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER since my subscription. Your subscription list will show that I belong at Freeman, and I am simply visiting my old home, from which I changed base a year ago.

This is an unpretending village of the most orthodox type. Sunday music is eschewed, unless it be "sacred"—as though all music, good music, were not sacred—and even the barber won't shave on the "Lord's day." Yet, in spite of all this, I find a few Liberals here; but Oh! how nerveless they are! how very fearful of losing business by speaking out their true sentiments! Two of them are M. D.'s (one a church-member), and still another is a D.D.S. The doctors are good citizens, worthy men, but they dread the club that theology swings over the heads of honest Liberals, and fear they shall lose their practice and their "respectability" by avowing their Infidelity. Oh! how I wish brother Reynolds could reach thus far with his Tent, and giv us an anti-Sam Jones revival! Some of the worthy orthodox fossils here—good honest people though they be—will never themselvs read a line of any kind of Infidel or Agnostic literature, nor allow their families to do so. How they would open their eyes, and prick up their ears like a lazy beast of burden, if they could only once be punched up with the prod of Freethought! I hav preserved every copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER that has ever come to me, and I hav been giving them out here to people that I think will read them. No one here had ever heard of our paper, and some did not know that there was such a thing in existence as a journal devoted exclusivly to Infidelity. It set them to guessing when I showed them copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Fosdick's Rising Sun, and told them of the Investigator, Green's Magazine, and numerous other periodicals devoted to Freethought and the disenthralment of humanity.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2.25, which credit on my subscription to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER.

It was recently announced here, in one of our Methodist Sunday-schools, that Colonel Ingersoll had been converted to Christianity, and that he hoped he would never deliver another Infidel lecture as long as he lived. It was impossible for me to learn the name of this enterprising clerical liar, who was a stranger here. But, however, let Talmage, "Boy" Harrison, Joe Cook, Sam Jones, that great religious clown of the South, and Comstock, and the rest of them take notice—a new lie is started about the colonel, which should go the rounds of the religious press and be instilled into the minds of all the Sunday-school boys and girls, weak-minded men, and nervous old maids.

I am now engaged in a heated discusssion with a good Christian in a newspaper of Louisville.

MR. EDITOR: Having investigated Spiritual manifestatic ns in all of their varied phenomena for some thirty-five years past, I naturally notice all that is being said, from time to time, in your invaluable paper upon the subject. I see in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER one S. Brewer givs an article under the heading, "Has Medium Mansfield been Proved a Fraud?" and he handles the matter right well; showing up Aunt Elmina to be just what I presume her to be. As partial as I hav been, and am still, to her ability, shrewdness, and English cleverness, which she displays upon the various subjects she descants upon, still, from careful observation for years past of her effusions on the numerous topics she has discussed, I must say that I think her (like myself) possessed of faults, and one, as I read her organization, is superabundance of dogmatism. Instance the case of her carefully sealing the letter for Mansfield, and on its return admitting that he had read it, and that she could not discover any marks which would lead her to suppose he had opened it, yet she could not allow herself to acknowledge anything whatever that would militate in the least in favor of his mediumship, but rather, she says, the letter must hav been opened because the answer showed that it had been read.

Notwithstanding what she says of herself, as I read her traits of character, I think it would be difficult to convince her that she is wrong concerning any subject she has formed an opinion upon. Howbeit, I will venture to giv Aunt Elmina in a condensed form, for scrutiny and investigation, a private seance I once had with Mr. Mansfield. On taking a trip to the state of Maine, in December, 1858, to visit my friends, the idea came to me to call upon Mr. Mansfield, who was then located in Boston, and ask for a spirit-friend of mine who had promised me before he died that, if there was any truth in Spiritual manifestations, he would communicate with me providing he could find a medium he could control. Consequently, I stopped over at E. V. Wilson's hotel for the accommodation of Spiritualists for a couple of days, and called on him at his office in Winter street, and found him alone. I made known to him my errand without giving him any clue to who I was or where I c. me from.

After stating my particular desire, he replied by saying that he had just finished a lengthy communication for another person and was quite exhausted from it, and doubted if he could get another that evening that would giv me any satisfaction. I told him that I was anxious for him to make a trial, as I was a long way from home and, probably, would never be that way again. He finally consented to make the experiment, al hough late, and placed a long strip of paper, and pencil, upon the table and told me to write my request at the top of it and put my signature to it, and then fold it down a number of times, and he then left the office. I seated myself, and wrote at the top of the paper, "Mr. Hiram Leavenworth, are you present?" and signed my name underneath it, "C. B. Thompson" (nothing more), and folded it down some fourteen times and told him it was ready. He came in from the other room and took the chair, and I took another at the other end of the table to watch him. He then pasted down the last fold and passed his fingers back and forth over the folding a number of times to ascertain if there was any spirit present to communicate, and said there was. He then took up the pencil and, after a number of gyrations, his hand was influenced to make a number of short marks upon the folds to indicate the number of letters in the name of the spirit purporting to be present, and they agreed with the number of letters in the name of the one I had called for exactly, but I kept mum. His hand then commenced making a profile with the pencil to indicate the sex of the spirit, which, when finished, he said was a male. His hand was then moved to make two parallel lines, one-fourth of an inch apart, over and down either side of the profile, between which letters were made, commencing on the right-hand side, making one above the other, up, over, and down, as the lines were made, and, when finished, it spelled, to my astonishment, the name I had called for precisely. His hand, after gyrating for a little time, then commenced below the profile to rapidly write on the strip of paper left all the way to the bottom. It read at the commencement:

"My dear mortal friend Charles B. Thompson, hav I at last succeeded in reaching you? Thank God I am with you still. You are fighting the battles of truth manfully. Persevere in well-doing," etc., ending at the bottom with, "from your spirit-friend and once co-laborer, HIRAM LEAVENWORTH."

Now I will ask Aunt Elmina to inform me from whence came the above, if not from the source purported, viz., Spiritual. I gave the medium no clue whatever for any of it.

Notwithstanding all, after reading it over I was seized with doubt, knowing, as I did, that there were clairvoyants who could read writing and printing through wood and even iron.

I said to myself, he may be one of that kind, and may hav read what I had written through the folds of the paper, and maybe he reads the letters sent to him in the same manner.

But my doubts were soon dispelled, for on casting my eyes again upon the commencement of the communication, I noticed that I was addressed, "My dear mortal friend Charles B. Thompson," etc, I said to myself, at once, that would not work, for, if he was clear-sighted, he could not read through the folds what was not there, for I had signed my name within "C. B. Thompson," as usual, and Mr. Leavenworth was one of the few. As that exploded that idea, and I could devise no other mode of disposing of the operation, I said to myself it may hav come from the source purported.

It surely could not hav been mind-reading, for nothing of the kind was in my mind at the time.

I hav scores of tests which I cannot account for in any ordinary way.

I see in the July 25th number of THE TRUTH SEEKER a candid, able, and convincing article (as usual) from J. R. Perry upon the subject of Spiritualism, and worthy the attention of anyone who cares to investigate the subject at all. His philosophy pertaining to immortality is good, and should be convincing to any candid mind not dictated by dogmatism. His deductions are sound and conclusiv, and I would advise all of the T. Winter style of Materialistic assertionists to carefully read and digest what Mr. Perry has descanted upon in the matter, and further, to get and carefully read Professor Hare's scientific work upon spirit manifestations, which investigations converted him from Atheism to Deism, fully substantiating the answer to the question often asked, What good do Spiritual manifestations do?

And I see that the able editress of the Children's Corner does not yet obtain any satisfactory proof of the real truthfulness of a hereafter, but I would advise her to persevere. She may, in time, get some tangible proof, as thousands of others hav before her. She, probably, like myself, requires positiv proof for everything, but if she seeks she may find, and if she knocks it may be opened unto her when conditions are favorable. As ever, C. B. THOMPSON.

KANSAS CITY, MO., Aug. 10, 1885.

"PERSONAL.—WANTED.—CORRESPONDENCE.—A gentleman who is engaged in a lucrativ business requiring him to travel through the Western states would greatly appreciate the companionship of a refined lady twenty five to thirty-five years of age, and religiously inclined. He adopts this method, hoping that a correspondence mutually beneficial may ensue, and result in an honorable matrimonial alliance. The advertiser is sincere, so that trifiers need not answer. Address,

"——, Hamilton County, Nebraska."

MR. EDITOR: We clip the above personal from a Kansas city daily of August 5, 1885. Taking this advertisment in connection with recent exposures of a certain Episcopal priest of this city, whose sacristy and confessional hole were used to train young women and girls to travel the strait and narrow (railroad) way leading to Christian felicity, we are not surprised that such an advertisment found its way to this point. It has been repeatedly asserted that irreligious, promiscuous men generally sought the precincts of the holy sanctuary, and the association of ladies religiously inclined, in order to more successfully carry out their designs. But this is the first time, to my knowledge, that an appeal has been openly made to religion to furnish traveling men with female companions. It strikes me that husbands and fathers who place their wives and daughters under training to priests, that they may become religiously inclined, ought to understand the education they are getting as well as any traveling man; but the world is full of men who for years hav listened so attentivly to priests that their ears hav gradually become developed and elongated to such an extent that they ever flop forward toward the sanctuary, and on all other occasions fall backward. When honest men devoid of superstition affirm that priestcraft must go; that the press, with its secular weeklies and dailies, must educate the people; that free schools, with secular teachers, must train the children, they are voicing the wish of the masses, who privately admit that they see no use for a great army of pious mendicants, and regret that our forefathers did not abolish the fashion of having priests for teachers at the same time they did that of having kings to rule over them.

Yours, etc., W. W. JUDSON.

BRATTLEBORO, VT., Aug. 4, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find thirty cents, for which please send me by return mail six copies of a "Short Lesson in History for Christians."

You are doing a grand, good work for the cause of humanity, and your unceasing endeavors to eliminate from the minds of the people the deep-rooted forms of ignorance, hypocrisy, and superstition, under the alias of Christianity, are meeting with success.

Spiritualism may or may not be true; but, being a Materialist like Brother Winter, of Cincinnati, O., I am not yet prepared to accept it as a fact, for the simple reason that it is not susceptible of a fair and impartial investigation by those who doubt its authenticity, as has time and again been demonstrated. Now, allowing, for the sake of argument, that it is true, will some of our kind friends of the Spiritualistic order please tell us of what earthly or heavenly use it all amounts to, anyhow? There are many people who prefer total annihilation to an eternity of continual consciousness in an extramundane sphere; and I am happy to say, as one of such, that is my sincere desire, and always has been. Giv me oblivion—the only perfect rest we know of.

It is often a query with this one and that one how we are to pass an eternity of years in a future state of existence, provided the theory of immortality is true. The mystery, however, remains unsolved—theories, opinions, and speculations to the contrary notwithstanding. What motiv or desire there can be to induce one to want to liv on forever and ever is more than I can conceive. Think of the monotony and feeling of vague unrest that must necessarily ensue; for, in an existence here, no matter how varied and pleasing it may be, there are times when we sigh for forgetfulness. There, "over there"—though I understand no such thing is known—there is no night, no sleep or slumber, no rest, but a continued state of activity, whether we like it or not. One thing is certain, and that is that a person cannot suffer mentally or physically who becomes totally unconscious after death. Speaking for myself, I cannot say that I know of any feeling so peaceful and blissful, so easy and calm to the body and mind, as that experienced at the moment of falling asleep after a hard day's work. To me it is heaven—in fact, it is all the heaven I want.

A. L. FRISBIE.

A WORD TO C. SEVERANCE.

BARRE, MASS., Aug. 8, 285.

In your letter, August 8th, you say "certain men of prominence among the Spiritualists are in favor of a complete separation between Spiritualists and Materialists," because Materialists use "harsh invectivs, . . abusiv and insulting opposition to those who differ," and if there are any Spiritualists who do the same, "I [you] hav never met them."

Now, I hav been on both sides of this question, and my experience is that the Spiritualists, as a class, quite equal, if they do not exceed, the Materialists in this respect.

You also say, "LaRoy Sunderland admitted, as does Miss Gibson, that phenomena occur such as Spiritualists attribute to spirits." I not only admit this but know it, having been a possessor and an activ demonstrator of this living principle ever since my earliest remembrance, but more distinctivly since 1851, when its knowledge became utilized in first healing myself, then others, in lecturing and improvising by impulsion, in diagnosis, impersonation, magnetism, character reading, and all the various kinds of clairvoyance, previous to any knowledge that others had done the same. I not only admit these facts, but maintain that the workings of this occult force, be its source what it may, will, when understood, renovate the world.

You are pleased further to class me with the Materialists. I am not quite sure they would accept me as one of their number, for I am of the opinion that mind is a composit quality belonging to every human being and to all matter—an integral part of the great whole—and like the physical, disintegrates and loses its activ identity at death, or annihilation of organization. My reasons for so believing, and my theory, I hope soon to be able to giv to the public more fully than I can in this brief letter. Suffice to say, I hav no controversy with Spiritualists as to these facts, even though they affirm they know the cause of this phenomena to be of spiritual origin. It is the frauds that I know exist, and that every Spiritualist knows exist, against which I wage war, and if any Spiritualist is unwilling to work with me because of my efforts to "hunt the rascals down" in Spiritualism, I hav no desire to work with them in hunting the rascals down in old theology.

ELLA E. GIBSON.

STURGIS, MICH., July 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: At the conclusion of a recent visit to one of your subscribers, Mr. Fleming Hopkins, of Indiana, he handed me a bundle of selected copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for perusal at home. They hav afforded me much pleasure; and having observed several communications from Spiritualists therein, I feel tempted to offer a few remarks for your columns, if you will permit their insertion.

The "text" from which I would "preach" occurs in a letter from Mr. Seward Mitchell, which he quoted from "Judas," viz.: "It has been shown that a belief in Spiritualism, whether true or false, is not as good for this world as a belief in Atheism."

In the first place, Spiritualism is not necessarily Theistic. A man may accept the doctrin of the existence of a future life, and not believe in the existence of God any more than if he were a Materialist. Spiritualism is simply the demonstrated proof of a future existence, and that spirits can, and do, under peculiar conditions and circumstances, communicate with and render themselvs visible to mortals. It does not teach religion, nor any particular system of morality; it does not even point out how we are to deport ourselvs here, so as to secure happiness and exaltation hereafter; nor is it in the mature of things that it could reveal the true spirit life to us as intellectual creatures. It merely sets the mind at rest on an all-important question.

In my opinion, the first duty of man on earth is to be happy and mind his legitimate business; and if he does that, as every honest man should, he has nothing to fear from so-called "death," of which orthodoxy had taught him to stand in dread. There may be a few who are selected from the mass for special purposes, but these are but rare exceptions to a general rule. Their preparation is painful as their agency is peculiar.

"Judas" will doubtlessly agree with me that the Materialist is a better citizen of this world, and perhaps a better man, than the mere emotional Spiritualist—the wonder-seeker who is ready to swallow a house, if it be but yclept "Spiritual;" indeed, the worst enemies of Spiritualism are not the Materialists, but the superstitious Spiritualists themselvs; not the orthodox religionists, even, but that class which regards it as something to gape at and be prayed over and preached over, rather than squarely and honestly investigated as a substantial fact. Sir, if Spiritualism is true, it will stand scrutiny, and if it is not, I, for one, am willing to wash my hands of it; and I must confess that the claims and the Quixotic style of some Spiritualists, when dealing with the subject, are of such an unearthly character that they are calculated to disgust sensible people, rather than encourage them to the calm study of its facts and philosophy.

The greatest question which can occupy the mind of man is that of Spiritualism: "Is there, or is there not, a future for each of us?" Yet the knowledge is not essential in every-day life. It does not help us to manage business affairs; but when our day's work is done, and we contemplate nature, or when misfortunes weigh us down, or we watch by the bed-side of the dying, or stand by the coffin of the "dead," then we may realize in some degree the inestimable value of that knowledge which overtops and reaches out beyond the affairs of physical sense.

I agree with Materialists that a namby-pamby Spiritualist awakens as much disgust as a howling Methodist, and he may be quite as useless a character. I hav long since concluded that the "spirit world" is a practical, every-day sort of place, and not a huge concert room where saints play on harps, or a theater where noisy vulgarians act the farce of Red-man rampant—it is a place for useful work, and not for pious play.

"If human brotherhood ever comes to this earth," says Mr. Mitchell, "it will be by the teachings of Spiritualism." If he had said, "by the ultimate union of mundane and spiritual methods—by the blending of the two conditions—by the accomplishment of that great end hinted at in the so-called 'Lord's Prayer,' 'Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven;'" if he had said "by the palpable brotherhood and sisterhood of all intelligences, human and divine," and that this should be accomplished by and through the means of a scientific Spiritualism, my belief in the good times coming would hav induced me to acquiesce. But this end is not to be brought about by taking things for granted, or by praying and psalm-singing, but by well-directed scientific investigation with the eyes wide open.

My dear brother truth seeker, a great deal of what is called "modern Spiritualism" is bosh, and a great deal of its literature and lecture talk is twaddle unworthy of a great cause, and if all Materialistic intolerance and all Spiritualistic bigotry were transported to that locality where "the woodbine twineth," it would be very much better for the cause of human enlightenment and progress. The knowledge of man is what is needed by mankind, but sentimental weakness is the bridge by which many knaves pass over to the pockets of fools, and extort money under false pretenses. We Spiritualists must not allow our hearts to run away with our heads. If we cannot hav an intelligent Spiritualism let us hav none. But when the skeptic rejects reasonable testimony he is insane, just as is the Spiritualist who accepts too much; in both cases a cold compress to the region of the reflectiv faculties is indicated.

If the aim of both Spiritualists and Materialists is to deliver the world from superstition and intolerance, they ought not to quarrel nor be intolerant of each other; so that that invisible essence or force which is called "spirit" may the sooner elevate mankind to a condition of harmony and peace, for at present we find that perpendiculars are crossed, the best people often driven to despair, and, alas! that fools sometimes imagin themselvs wise.

THOS. HARDING.

CORRY, PA, August 9, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: This county (Erie), sandwiched between Chautauqua, N.Y., and Ashtabula, O., is similar in tastes, education, religion, and politics. Fifty years ago the people were devoted Methodists; fifteen years ago Republican in politics. Freedom of thought was called Infidelity; in politics, copperheadism. A great change has come. The noblest men and women now are outside of creeds. In all the villages old dilapidated churches, shut up for good, are rotting; preachers, even good ones, are not half paid. This district, for the first time elected a Democrat to Congress. The township of Wayne, in this county, Horace Greeley's early home, where his only brother livs on the old homestead, so long the Gibraltar of Republicanism, elected Prohibitionists to every office at the last election. The better class of young men and women are wide awake for freedom of thought and earnest to banish whisky.

Chautauqua and Cataraugus counties, N. Y., gave St. John 1,570 votes, which decided the presidential contest. What has caused this great commotion is chiefly the law of progress or evolution. The people hav outgrown dogmas and political rings. The Spiritualists, of which there are many in this section, hav held annual camp-meetings during the month of August for the past six years at Cassadaga, a beautiful lake in Chautauqua county. On Sundays thousands of the best men and women assemble where freedom and purity are held out as the only atoning power of redemption. Nearly all of them are Prohibitionists, and favor equality of women. On the 3d of September the Prohibitionists hold their camp-meeting on the same grounds. On Sunday, September 6th, St. John will speak there. The probity, intelligence, and social status of these men and women giv them a moral power greater than ten times as many Pecksniffs, flunkies, or toadies. Yet the Pecksniff's hav helped to break the shackles of religious and political bigotry. On Chautauqua Lake a camp-ground, ostensibly for the glory of God, has been held for years. Vincent, who styles himself bishop, has long played into the political rings of which the Hon. Walter and Loren Sessions are chiefs. Last year Miss Willard, of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, was induced to visit the show grounds, hoping to get their influence for Blaine, etc. But they spoke for St. John, whereupon the women's flag was torn down, the women bullied off the stage, and General Logan put in their place. This was too much for anyone possessing a spark of manhood, and broke the spell. It is now discovered that Vincent and Flood, who were poor when the pious show commenced, are now millionaires, while gate fees of forty cents per day, a tax of ten per cent on all groceries, ice, in fact, everything on the grounds, is by no means a free salvation—is not even a counterfeit of him whose whole life was humility and poverty.

BOSTON, MASS., Ingersoll's Birthday, Aug. 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I was inexpressibly delighted to learn through Brothers Wakeman and Seaver that our glorious Colonel Ingersoll takes such a great interest in the Bruno Statue at Rome, and that he had volunteered to giv one of his inimitable lectures for the benefit of the Statue Fund.

All doubts concerning the grand success of the American portion of the international subscription for this splendid purpose can, of course, be now dispensed with, because the fame and ability of the gallant "Orator of Freethought" will insure a magnificent contribution to this eminently meritorious work.

As Brother Wakeman says, however, each one of the Liberals must imitate the eloquent colonel and do his or her best for the cause before the lecture comes off. This latter will illuminate, beautify, and finish up the whole in a manner that will be a joy forever to every friend of universal mental liberty.

Verily the memory of the heroic Bruno, the first man in modern times to make science a standard to both liv and die for, is not to be forever left to the mercy of his religious murderers.

What a poetic justice it would be if Bruno's memory should become a most effectiv destroyer of all religions, and finally cause science to reign among mankind! Cordially yours,

GEO. N. HILL.

NEW ALBANY, IND., Aug. 5, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 1st a communication from J. G. Malcolm, under the heading, "The Let Alone Doctrin," in which he says: "We want laws which shall make it impossible for one man to turn another off of land he is not using and never has used," etc. I agree with him in regard to having such laws. But as we cannot get those laws at present, and as the poor are suffering for the necessaries of life in consequence of the bad laws we hav, would it not be a good idea to form societies, buy up land, and deed it to the societies for their mutual use—said societies to be open to take in all wishing to join them at any time in the future?

I think a great many of us would do a better work if, instead of complaining of what we hav, we would go to work and make what our ideal is of what we should hav, if not on a large scale, on a small one. And if there is the good in it that we think there is, it will form a center around which the nation will eventually revolve.

We are now organizing a society of the kind referred to, and if the friends of Mr. Malcolm's stripe will lend a helping hand, we hope to soon hav a little government that states may pattern after. Yours, for humanity,

E. E. PARK.

HARWICH, MASS., Aug. 9, 1885.

"The Catholics claim that at least one-half the inmates of our prisons are Catholic Christians, and that therefore they should hav equal privilege with the Protestant Christians in administering Christian pabulum to the prisoners."

MR. EDITOR: Acknowledging the bad effects of the Protestant branch of Christianity, I think the Catholics can turn out from their factories two criminals to the Protestants' one. But who shall say that since both Catholics and Protestants did the manufacturing and furnishing that class of boarders and lodgers to our national hotels, the Infidels shall not hav a large share of the management and demand that the hotels shall not be the branch factories for finishing up the criminals?

STONEHENGE, MASS., Aug. 8, 1885

MR EDITOR: I am going to make this letter welcomed by you by inclosing enough money to pay up and to keep THE TRUTH SEEKER a visitor at my cottage. Please use twenty-five cents of it for an ANNUAL, to be sent to my address. I want to congratulate the TRUTH SEEKER family circle because the Tent campaign is doing so well. No one would doubt its success who once heard the eloquence of Mr. Reynolds.

I am glad to find Miss Wixon is investigating. Dear sister truth seeker, keep on, and may you be as successful as you are in your writings. I hope all our family hav read her books. Her "All in a Lifetime" well pays the reader. Mr. Comminkle is a Yankee type, well and vividly portrayed, and Nancys are to be known everywhere. I wish she could write a story to be first given to the readers of this paper. The papers say, "Miss H G. Gardner claims to be the only Infidel woman lecturer." If Webster's definition is correct, there are many of us who are complete Infidels. I am glad I am one, hav been for a long time, and am growing more so, if that is possible. I should think the term would soon belong to everyone.

In view of the two recent extra-brutal murders in Boston—minor ones thrown in—it seems time that there should be less talk of "heaven above" and a more earnest effort for one below. If we could only get the hell out of human brains as easily as out of the Bible, we should soon hav a small branch establishment here. It may shock the heaven-seeker to find God's mysterious ways create so many murders and vices of all kinds, but it cannot fail to attract attention. I'll tell a true story on that point: Some years ago a Mr. Ballou, Presbyterian reverend in New York state, was a lover of children, but loved theology more. Mrs. C. was a devout member of his church, but Mr. C. thought more of horses than churches. The reverend had a habit of lifting their four-year-old Nellie to his lap, and then forgetting her. Mrs. C. answered Nellie's complaint on this matter by telling her that when Mr. Ballou paused, she could attract his attention by some gentle remark. The next time the reverend called he took Nellie as usual, and was soon busy expounding theology. For a long time poor, neglected, but tight-held Nellie endured this. At length a pause. The child's hand was placed on his, and a soft voice said, "Please, Mr. Ballou." No answer, but an instant later he was in full tide of talk. A second pause. The tiny hand again touched the minister's sleeve. He looked down. Overjoyed, and beaming with satisfaction, Nell said eagerly, "Say, Mr. Ballou, my father drives some of the G—d d——d plugs you ever saw." It is needless to say she attracted attention, and her martyrdom was over.

The rapidly increasing numbers of truth seekers diminish the ministers. Long may THE TRUTH SEEKER and its really Liberal editor flourish. So wishes

C. FANNIE ALLYN.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find three dollars to renew my subscription. At the Cassadaga meeting I subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months on trial. I like it well and wish it continued. I lend it to my neighbors, who also like it. Six or seven copies are taken in this town. It is read by many interested readers, and its principles freely discussed. In fact, I think a growing interest in the great reform question is evident throughout the whole country.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

NOTICE.

All who hav written stories for the prize offered in these columns a few weeks since will please forward them at once to the address of the editor of the Children's Corner, when the selection of the best story will be made, and the same printed in our columns. The prize will at the same time be awarded to the writer of the story. Ed. C. C.

Lines;

Written on the back of a Calendar.

This calendar, that serves to show
The progress time is making,
Points silently the days that go,
Their annual record taking.

How fast to fill the measured hours
The moments pass before us,
One after one, sunshine or showers,
Day fades and night is o'er us!

Yet every hour that slips away
A thoughtful sermon preaches,
And this the lesson that each day
In passing from us teaches:

He wastes his wealth who useless frets,
O'er troubles real or seeming;
Time pauses not for vain regrets
Nor day for idle dreaming.

Who squanders time in vain deplores
A failure of endeavor;
No power the ill-spent past restores,
Once gone 'tis lost forever.

Patience and diligence insure
Rewards not evanescent;
The coming harvest they secure
Who wisely grasp the present.

Not slothful waste, but time improved,
Brings hope and conquers sorrow.
Gleans something from each day removed
And brightens each to-morrow,

O'ercomes each obstacle that blocks
Our way with hindering measures,
And, serving those who seek, unlocks
The future's store of treasures.

Reader, you can, if you obey
Time's teachings thus extended,
Welcome without regret the day
That tells the year is ended.

Jim.

Jim—the Jim that I write of—was not a boy, a man, a cat, a dog, a monkey, or a mouse. What was it, then? I'll tell you. Jim was a crow—a black crow. His color was a handsome bluish black, and his plumage was as glossy as the feathers of a well-fed, independent crow can be in these United States. In its early infancy it fell into the hands of a farmer's family in the western part of the state of Massachusetts. It was a great pet, and could do many cunning tricks.

The crow is a very intelligent bird, and is capable of being taught to speak some words of our language. They are great pests of farmers, and sometimes are very mischievous in corn-fields. But Jim, after he was adopted in the family of our friends, seemed to be impressed with the dignity of his position, and never troubled the corn-fields after the fashion of other crows. He went out and came in the house at his leisure. He was very fond of getting his mouth full of beans and then carefully hiding them under a rug. He would never forget where he had placed them, and after a certain time he would go and pick them all up, and, perhaps, carry them to some other hiding-place. And, although Jim never injured the growing corn, he took great delight in running along the fields and planting it, thrusting his pointed bill into the ground, and depositing a kernel of corn, and then another and another, and so on. Thus he would work all day long, for Jim was not an idle bird, but always liked to be busy about something.

When Jim was hungry he would fly into the house and straight into the closet, and help himself to whatever pleased his fancy—pie, cake, or bread, or anything else that he might care for. Once, when the tea-table was set for company, and a handsome cake adorned one end, Jim thought he would like to know how such a pretty cake would taste. Without great deliberation, he went to the table, and with a quick movement, took one of the triangular pieces in his bill, and flew off with it to another part of the room, where he tasted, and nibbled, and ate all he liked of it, and, no doubt, pronounced it in his judgment pretty good cake.

He would watch the people when talking as earnestly as though he understood every word of what was said; and perhaps he did—we cannot tell.

Sometimes for hours he would perch on a tree, or on top of the barn, and watch the clouds as they floated above his head, or the wild wood crows as they flew by. Occasionally a crow would salute him with a "Caw, caw, caw," and Jim would politely answer, "Hock, hock," but he never attempted to follow any of his kind to their wildwood home, seeming content with his home and surroundings.

He would roam about with the children at the farm, interested apparently in their plays and pursuits, and when tired of their company he would stroll among the hens and chickens, listening to the gobble of the turkeys, the cackle of the hens, and the quack, quack of the ducks, with as much pleasure as any tame crow might experience in such company, and at night he went with them to roost, but always had his bed a little apart from the rest of the feathered family.

He delighted to follow Farmer Temple around the farm, and when planting, hoeing, or mowing, he had to be careful lest he should step on Jim and injure him for life.

One morning he was weeding the cucumber bed, and Jim was close at hand, trying to help in his crow fashion. Suddenly an unlucky movement of Farmer Temple, and his hand came in contact with Jim, who in a moment lay prostrate. Poor Jim! his little neck was broken, and a few short gasps, and Jim was no more. He was dead.

Farmer Temple felt very badly, for he knew how much Jim would be missed. He took the dead bird in his hand, and stroked his glossy breast, as his tears fell upon the little limp form, so still and pulseless. He quietly laid the remains away in the earth, brushed away the tears, and went into the house, for he could work no more that day. He told no one of what had happened to Jim, except Mrs. Temple, who promised not to tell the children the fate of their dear little pet. The little ones watched and waited for Jim for many a day, and they mourned for him when the days went on and he did not come. He was sadly missed, and the house seemed lonely to the three little girls who lived in it, and whose playmate and favorit Jim was. It was a long while before they knew his real fate, which they bemoaned with many a tear, and even now, after the lapse of years, they cherish with tender regret the memory of their feathered playmate, black Jim Crow.

Two of My Neighbors.

I hav near me two sweet neighbors,
That I wish you all could see,
They are full of noise and frolic,
And they often call on me.
Willie's eyes are like the bluebells,
Bessie's eyes are black and bright,
Both are like the summer sunshine,
Bringing rays of love and light.

Sometimes they will play they're engins;
"All aboard," they loudly cry,
"Do-in' down to Mel-yoze Hi-lan's,"
Willie shouts out clear and high.
Sometimes they are little horses;
"Get up," and "go-long," they'll say;
You can hear their feet go patting
As they swiftly trot away.

Sometimes they are "bands of moo-sic;"
"Toot-te-toot" and "dum-de-dum;"
If the melody is missing
You will find the noise has come.
Then, again, they call as salesmen,
Sell Aunt Fannie fruit or ice;
Cash-in-hand I hav to pay them,
Made from candy good and nice.

Sometimes Bessie tells me gravely
How her dolls "are sick to-day,"
They hav "scarlet fever dreffal,"
So "the doctor" seems to say.
One is headless, but is tended
Just as if she had a head,
Wrapped within a red shawl careful,
And then softly laid in bed.

Bessie's earnest, self-reliant,
Growing helpful every hour;
Willie is activ, quick-discerning,
Promis of a business power.
"Gypsy Queen," I call my Bessie,
With her eyes so dark and bright;
"Sunlight," oft I christen Willie,
With his curls of golden light.

How I hope they'll walk in honor,
O'er the lowlands here of earth,
And that Truth will always lead them
By her path of moral worth.
Wish you all could see my neighbors,
With their merry laugh and talk,
Blue-eyed Willie, black-eyed Bessie,
Coming up my garden walk.

"He Has No Mother."

Sitting in the school room, I overheard a conversation between a sister and a brother. The little boy complained of insults or wrongs received from another little boy. His face was flushed with anger. The sister listened awhile, and then, turning away, she answered:

"I do not want to hear another word. Willie has no mother!"

The brother's lips were silent. The rebuke came home to him, and, stealing away, he muttered, "I never thought of that."

He thought of his own mother, and the loneliness of Willie compared with his own happy lot. "He has no mother!"

Do we think of it, when want comes to the orphan, and hard words are spoken to him? Has the little wanderer no mother to listen to his little sorrows? Speak gently to him then. —Good News.

Egyptian Superstition.

Egyptians, like the Jews, fry their fish in oil; but, of course, good Florence oil has to be used—no other oil would do. Those who hav partaken of fish prepared thus, can testify as to flavor and sweetness. Salmon and cod-fish are best treated thus.

Of good traits, the Egyptians hav one which the much-vaunted Christians do not possess. The purposeless slaughter of harmless and helpless animals they regard as a great and irreparable wrong. Animal food they must and will hav of course, but they are much opposed to the unwarranted and reckless destruction of life.

Flocks of vultures—great awkward creatures they seem—act as health officers in the Eastern cities by eating all the garbage and filth in the streets, and he who would wantonly kill one of these birds would be regarded and classed as an utter barbarian or heathen.

The corvus umbrinus, or black raven, in Egypt, is held in high esteem. He is commonly spoken of as "Noah's raven," being the bird that ancient sailor sent out from the ark (if such an event as the flood ever took place), and which did not return. This bird is considered an uncle of the colored race, who are chiefly recruited from the Soudan in Central Africa. When it becomes known that one of these ravens has been shot, or otherwise disposed of, great crowds of the Soudan blacks become angry beyond endurance, and insist on being paid "blood-money" for the murder of their "uncle," who occasionally brought them news of their relativs in Africa. These tumults, which frequently become very demonstrativ, do not subside until an amount sufficient to cover all damage is paid, and then the dead bird is buried with great pomp and ceremony, as if he were some respected and honored citizen. A kadi killed one of these birds on one occasion. He was besieged and attacked and his house-door walled up by the Soudanese blacks. They demanded blood-money, but the kadi refused to pay. But at last, finding he could not gain admittance to the outside world, he concluded to make the required payment. On another occasion, a pasha at Jeddah shot an uncle, and, in like case, had to pay. The kedive himself would hav been treated in the same manner if guilty; no distinction is made whatever when a person kills one of these ravens.

Correspondence.

Bradford, Pa., Aug., 1885.

Dear Miss Susan H. Wixon: I read The Truth Seeker—every number, every word of it—and no part givs me greater pleasure than the Children's Corner. Although an old man, I love children dearly, and I know you do, or else you could not write such pretty stories and sweet things for them, and I think I am right in believing that you like letters from little children—bright ones. I hav one from a little nephew of mine four years and five months old, that some of my friends think is a gem. It is at your disposal, if you wish to use it. It is printed, as a matter of course, as all letters from little ones are.

[copy.]

"Snow's Falls, Me., July 29, 1885.

"Dear Uncle Joseph: I was glad to get your letter. The pigs grow well, and the chickens, too. We hav some plaguey big roosters. Our cat—Patrick—is well. Mr. Curtis found two little kittens—waifs. They said, 'Rom, rom, rom,' which meant 'meow.' Mr. Curtis is going to keep them. With love, Robert."

Yours most truly, J. W. Prentiss.

Clearwater, Neb., Aug. 1, 1885.

Dear Miss Wixon: I think we children of the Children's Corner ought to make up a purse for Mr. Hacker. He is old and poor, and has done as much for the Liberal cause as any other Liberal lecturer is doing now. Now, suppose we children of the Children's Corner each giv twenty-five cents, and as much more as we like. I think the Liberals ought to take better care of him. I hav sent fiftv cents to-day.

Your Western friend, Earle A. Finch.

P. S.—Let each one write to the Children's Corner, and tell how much they hav sent.

E. A. F.

[The sentiment of Earle's letter is beautiful, and we trust his example will be generally followed by our readers of the Corner. Father Hacker has accomplished a good work in his time; and now that he is aged, feeble, and poor, it is just and wise that his declining days should be made as smooth and pleasant as possible. The contributions of our little readers will be doubly valuable to our aged friend, on account of the sweet and loving spirit of sympathy and tenderness with which they are accompanied.—Ed. C. C.]

Clearwater, Neb., Aug. 3, 1885.

Dear Miss Wixon: In sending a new (and a true) poem [poem next week.—Ed.] for the Children's Corner, Earle sends his little letter to the children in behalf of our poor, old Father Hacker. I do hope the children of Liberals will come forward with their dimes as the children of some other people furnish money to buy flannel shirts and overcoats for the suffering people of India.

A few days ago Earle had been paid a small sum for doing an errand for a neighbor, and spent a part of it foolishly, as I thought, and I told him if every child who spends even five cents for something that will be useless would send it to Father Hacker, how much better it would be. And Earle said, almost with tears in his eyes, that "the very next corn he sold he would send him half a dollar." He had raised a small piece of early sweet corn, which is his own.

Let us see how many of our kind-hearted little ones will write and say they hav sent their mites to the tired pilgrim who nears the end of his long and useful journey. With many kind wishes for the prosperity of the Children's columns, I am,

Fraternally yours, Mary B. Finch.

The Missing Link
—IN—
MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the realty of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. Hindoo Virgin and Child.

The worship of the "Holy Virgin," the "Queen of Heaven," the "Mother of God," etc., which has become one of the grand features of Roman Catholicism, was a tenet of faith for centuries before the virgin now adored was born. In India, they have worshiped for ages, Maha Devi—The Great Goddess—and have temples erected in honor of her. Like her Roman counterpart she is the Goddess with a thousand names. As Devaki, she is the mother of Vishnu, the Preserving god, in the form of Krishna. "The gods, invisible to mortals," says the Vishnu Purana, (p. 502) "celebrated her praise continually from the time that Vishnu was contained in her person." She is represented in Moor's Hindu Pantheon, adorned with jewels, and the infant Saviour at her breast. BIBLE MYTHS shows that nearly all nations of antiquity worshipped a Virgin Mother-Goddess.

Poetry.

The Bible.

Blessed Bible! Dearest treasure!
Holy Book, divinely given;
Ceaseless fount of consolation;
Chart to show the way to heaven,
Dearest Bible;
Record of the mind of heaven.

I will hold my Holy Bible
Near, and nearer to my heart;
Reverent, I will heed its teachings;
That and I will never part.
From the glorious
Word of Life I'll never part.

God-illumed, its brilliant pages
Show the way our fathers trod;
How they lived, and how they worshiped,
How they walked before their God.
Glorious history!
Showing us the mind of God.

Patriarch life it grandly teaches;
Angels guiding where they moved;
Single virtues never mentioned,
Every sinful act approved.
Happy Israel!
Chosen people; God-beloved.

Blest the lot of good old Abraham—
Father of the patriarch line;
By his concubines surrounded,
Reveling in his lust and wine
Good old Abraham!
How his superstitions shine!

Sinner vile, despair no longer;
See the favor Jacob gained;
Base, blaspheming lying coward,
By deceit and robbing stained;
Unrepenting,
He especial favor gained.

Tyrant ruler, cease to tremble,
Joseph was a tyrant too;
Meaner, viler, more exacting,
More detestable than you.
Heaven approved him:
Proof that heaven will smile on you.

Cruel, heartless, fierce invader,
Fired for conquest, drunk with blood;
See the proof of approbation—
Bloody Joshua walked with God.
How ennobling
'Tis, like him, to swim in blood!

Harlot, foul and soulless traitor,
Most unprincipled and vile,
Hang your guilty head no longer;
See the Lord on Rahab smile.
Harlot; traitors!
Favorit of the Lord the while.

Sinful man, whate'er thy station,
Why so many painful qualms?
Cheering words are written—for you,
Cease your fears, and sing your psalms.
As did David,
Tune your lyre, and sing your psalms.

Lustful, bloody, weak, deceitful,
Stained with every crime beside,
Canonized as God's beloved—
God in David typified;
Sanctifying
Craven murder, lust, and pride.

Murderer, drop your eyes no longer,
Conscience-pained for what you've done;
Since the deity you worship
Boasts the murder of his son—
Dark, cold-blooded
Murderer of his only son.

Here in this my blessed Bible
Shield for every sin is given;
Every crime is sanctified, and
Made the key to open heaven.
Blessed Bible!
Sinner's hope, and guide to heaven!

The Story of David and Goliath.

As Revised by Bill Nye.

Goliath was originally the giant in a side show in Gath at thirteen dollars a week, but when the war broke out he enlisted in the army of the Philistines more for the bounty than anything else. This life seemed to hit him about right, for Goliath was naturally lazy and trifling.

Every morning after breakfast Goliath, dressed in his brass plug hat and cast-iron corset and copper clothes, would sail out and poke fun at Saul and his home guards.

Goliath was a large, husky yahoo from the headwaters of the Chug, and had a hand on him like a horse-block. He was muscled up in good shape, too. When he began on a man it meant six months in the hospital with careful nursing, and if Goliath felt grieved and hurt about something a man had said about him, and took the man aside to hav a little talk about it, the man's widow applied right off for the life insurance. In this way Goliath used to be respected very much around Gath.

So every day he would come out on the mesa and sass the armies of Israel and tell Saul that if he had a full-grown man who had any sand, he would like to hav him come over and get him measured for a pair of wings. Day after day he would walk out with his bomb-proof clothes on, and cordially invite the Israelites to come over one at a time and let him paralyze 'em. And Saul, on behalf of his people, declined the invitation with thanks. He told Goliath that while he would be glad to meet him for a little soft-glove tete-a-tete, he would hav to decline any meeting on a basis of open hostility. This caused the campaign to drag, and the daily papers in Israel began to criticise Saul and to ask why he did not come home and hoe corn instead of fooling away his time with the Philistines.

Just then David came down from his sheep ranch in Independence mountain, over against Bethlehem, Judah, on the old California trail, to see how the war was progressing. He wanted to make a trip to some place where there would be no danger of bodily harm, so his parents thought it would be safer, perhaps, for him to go down to the front "where war waged its wide desolation, and threatened our land to destroy." They told him to go down where the two armies were engaged in open hostilities, and they would feel perfectly easy about him, but they cautioned him not to wander away from the army into the woods and get lost.

Just as David got to the front, Goliath came out and spoke with a loud voice, and cried out and defied the armies of Israel, and Saul's army scattered and fell over each other trying to get into the woods, and behold, there were not trees enough for all the soldiers of the armies of Israel to climb.

And David was disgusted, and told Saul that he would like to go out and fight the Philistine if some courageous Israelite would come along and hold his coat for him. Every boy laughed at David, and his brothers especially, as soon as they had stopped running and got behind a tree, and recovered their breath, began to ridicule David. But David insisted on it, and told Saul that one time when a mountain lion and a grizzly bear came and carried off several of his father's sheep he ran after them and overtook them, and after he had knocked the lion silly with his fist, he ran his hand down the bear's throat, caught him by the tail, and turned him wrong side out. The king said: "Well, did you really do that? If you did I've a good notion to giv you the freedom of the Philistine camp, and if you will bring me Goliath's scalp, stretched on a shingle, I will giv you all the money you want and my only daughter, for I'd just as soon tell you in confidence, that this side-show giant is getting to be a perfect eye-sore to me, and between you and me, I thing he is overdoing this thing, and making a nuisance of himself."

So David said he would go, and Saul dressed him up in a railroad iron overcoat, but the boy couldn't handle it. He took off the fire and burglar proof overcoat, and filled his pocket full of rocks and sailed in.

When Goliath came out he turned his nose up at David, and asked him if his mother knew he was out. He talked mean to David, and finally told him to come over and he would feed him to the coyotes.

Then David, in a gentlemanly way, told Goliath that he didn't claim to be much of a talker in public, but that he relied on the righteousness of his cause. He came not with words, and banners, and torchlight processions, but he believed he was right and came there to prove it. He was no public speaker, he said, but he thought this thing had gone far enough. He then surprised Goliath with a moss agate behind the ear. The gentleman from Gath fell to earth with a "sickening thud," and David cut his head off with the giant's own sword. From these injuries Goliath never fully recovered, and finally deceased.

Then the men of Israel and Judah rose up and whooped with a loud voice, and pursued their enemies, and they fed the fowls of the air with Philistine on toast for forty days, and David became solid with the king, and made money, and wore his good clothes every day. Wherever he went he was regarded as a great success, and all the giants were perfectly friendly toward him.

Books and Pamphlets.

"Jonah's Excursion to Nineveh," by G. W. Foote, is a little record of a remarkable voyage which everyone should read. It is numerously illustrated, and sells for ten cents.

A "Cambridge Graduate" has collocated "Twenty-four Proofs that the Bible is not the Word of God." Ramsey & Foote, London, hav printed them in a tract for 5 cents.

"Gospel Lies" is the plain way J. M. Wheeler has of designating some of the anecdotes contained in the New Testament. A five-cent tract contains eight pages of them.

One of the signs of the times is the publication of a pamphlet on "The Industrial Question in the United States," by the Hon. S. B. Elkins, being an address before the Alumni Association of the University of Missouri, June 3, 1885. Mr. Elkins is better known as "Steve" Elkins. He is first of all a politician, and it is a little surprising to find him dealing with social questions. He leans toward co-operation as a way out of our industrial troubles.

For 25 cents anyone can buy "Comic Bible Sketches," Part I., edited by G. W. Foote. These are the sketches for printing which in the Freethinker Mr. Foote went to "gaol" on a charge of blasphemy.

"Geology and the Bible" is a pamphlet by W. W. Collins, written in reply to one Dr. Lambart, who had evidently been endeavoring to pass the Bible off upon the community as a work of fact instead of fiction. Price 5 cents.

"God in Reason and Intuition," by James S. Laidlaw, is described by the author as "a philosophical poem." It may be philosophical, but it is putting a great stress on language to call it a poem. The pamphlet is published at 769 Broadway.

"Life and Death"—herein W. W. Collins asks the question, "Does man survive death?" He concludes that the person who has passed through the change called death has to all intents and purposes ceased to liv. Published by the Progressiv Publishing Company, London. Price 10 cents.

"Saladin," editor of the London Secular Review, sends three small pamphlets, two of which are entitled, "Agnosticism: an Exposition and Defense, Being a Reply to his Grace the Lord Archbishop of York," and, "Hell: Where is It?" being also a letter to the Archbishop of York. The third pamphlet is a misfortune.

John Stuart Mill once wrote an "Essay on Theism," in which were contained some complimentary remarks on the character of Jesus Christ. Under the title, "An Examination and Exposure of John Stuart Mill's Panegyric on Christ," G. W. Foote, editor of the London Freethinker, has taken Mr. Mill to task in his usual vigorous style, and shows that the great economist's theories of Christ do not harmonize with his views on liberty. Price 10 cents.

A handsome book of poems is Scott R. Sherwood's "Lays of a Bohemian" (published by Brentano Bros., New York, price $1.25). It has received many complimentary, not to say flattering, notices from the newspapers of the country, as indicated by a circular accompanying the volume—which shows how good a thing it is to be "solid" with the press. Mr. Sherwood is himself a newspaper man, and probably to that fact more than to the merit of his verses is due the favorable reception his book has met with. It is not bad poetry, however, and might help waste a weary hour for somebody tired of mental exercise.

"The Prodigal Daughter; or, The Price of 'Virtue,'" by Rachel Campbell, Grass Valley, Cal., is an able plea for the restitution of the misled daughter to her place in the economy and affections of society. It is written "with all a woman's feeling," as the novelists say, but it is well ballasted with hard facts and weighty reasoning. It is astonishing how heartless the world is in its treatment of those who go or are led astray. Yet,

"When lovely woman stoops to folly,
And finds too late that men betray,
What art can soothe her melancholy?
What charm can drive her guilt away?"

"Monkeys, Apes, and Men," a handsome pamphlet of 47 pages, price 25 cents. is by Edward Aveling, D.Sc., of London. Its design is to giv an account, at once popular and accurate, of the principal generalizations bearing upon the theories of Darwin in general, and upon their application to the human race in particular; and of the chief facts upon which the generalization is based. Dr. Aveling is a deep student of the doctrin of evolution, and this book is a valuable addition to the literature bearing on that doctrin. "The Darwinian Theory," and "The Origin of Man," are works by the same author of the same size and price, and treat upon the same subject.

"The Protestant Faith," Dwight Hinckley Olmstead author, is a severe criticism of the doctrins of Martin Luther. The justification by faith theory is especially attacked. The writer makes it clear that if belief in some creed is essential to salvation, the majority of Christians will not be saved, because but a small number are united upon any vital point; they hav, in fact, no basis of union. He mentions, in an appendix, some four hundred different religious sects in the United States and Great Britain, each one of which believes itself to be the only truth and way to heaven. He denies that he is an iconoclast, yet he has run his ploughshare through some deeply-planted errors, and turned their tangled roots up to the light. The book is thoroughly interesting, and worthy of careful thought. The copy sent us by G. P. Putnam's Sons, publishers, is marked 50 cents, for which sum the book will be sent from this office post-paid to any address.

"The Statue of Liberty Enlightening the World. Described by the Sculptor Bartholdi. Published for the Benefit of the Pedestal Fund by the North American Review, 30 Lafayette Place, New York." Such is the title-page of a handsome crown-octavo pamphlet containing a picture of the statue, a fac-simile autograph letter from Victor Hugo, a likeness of M. Bartholdi, and a history of the work; together with "The Principal Examples of this Class," and numerous illustrativ cuts. The work on the pamphlet is mechanically and artistically superb. The proceeds of its sales go to help put the statue in place on Bedloe's Island in New York Harbor. The statue itself is symbolical and expressiv and could hardly be excelled unless some special inspiration had impelled M. Bartholdi to represent our contemporaries Tucker and Appleton, combatant, calling upon the president of the United States to lay down his arms and disperse.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.
By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Octavo, 458 pp. PRICE, $3.50.

ELEMENTS
OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY.
FOR
HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.
By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

Freethinkers will find this, for an outline, history the best for their use, as Professor Cottinger is a Freethinker, and in his reports of the church's actions has stated facts with a truthful freedom not found in ordinary histories. He dates his work from the beginning of historical certainty and not from the mythical Eden, as do most "universal" historians, and brings it down to 1883, with a brief mention of subsequent important inventions and discoveries.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, prepaid, for $1, or either one for 25 cents.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for, and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Gems of Thought.

IF I were God, I think I would do something with my infinit power to make the world a trifle happier and better or I would resign and start a peanut-stand.—D. M. Bennett.

TEACH me to feel another's woe,
To hide the fault I see;
That mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me.—Pope.

MARTYRS and persecutors resemble one another; their minds are composed of the same materials. The man who will suffer death for his religious faith will endeavor to enforce it even unto death. In fact, if Christianity were true, religious persecution would become a pious and charitable duty; if God designs to punish men for their opinions, it would be an act of mercy to mankind to extinguish such opinions. By burning the bodies of those who diffuse them, many souls would be saved that would otherwise be lost, and so there would be an economy of torment in the long run. It is, therefore, not surprising that enthusiasts should be intolerant.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

NOT by deeds that win the world's applauses,
Not by works that giv the world renown,
Not by martyrdom of vaunted crosses,
Canst thou win and wear the immortal crown.

Daily struggling, though unloved and lonely,
Every day a rich reward will giv;
Thou wilt find, by hearty striving only,
And truly loving, thou canst truly liv.
—Miss Winslow.

WITH the discovery of every principle heretofore unknown to man has come an increase of human happiness, a lessening of human pains. Fearlessly, therefore, can we inquire into the world outside us and into the workings of our own consciousness, proclaiming no infallibility in ourselvs, and not having to bolster up the pretended infallibility of a book, or a man, or a church, we can honestly confess when we hav been wrong in our thought. Thus we are able to graft new ideas onto old ways of thinking in a way beyond the reach of those who hav resolved to pin their faith, lifelong, to one special form of thought and one stereotyped form of words.—Dr. Aveling's Science and Secularism.

AGE cannot, from the very law of its nature, conceive itself endowed with the bounding energy of youth, and without that vigor, both of exertion and desire, renewed existence can offer no inspiring charms, but being upon earth has been enriched by vivid interests and precious joys, and we are deeply grateful for the gift; but we are wearied with one life, and feel scarcely qu lified to enter on the claims, even though balanced by the felicities and glories, of another. It may be the fatigue which comes from age—fatigue of the fancy as well as of the frame; but, somehow, what we yearn for most instinctivly at last is rest, and the peace which we can imagin the easiest, because we know it best, is that of sleep.—W. R. Greg.

MAN that is born of a woman is of few days and full of trouble. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down: he fleeth also as a shadow and continueth not. . . There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again and that the tender branch will not cease. . . But man dieth and wasteth away: yea, man giveth up the ghost and where is he? As the waters fail from the sea and the flood decayeth and drieth up; so man lieth down and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep.—Job xiv, 1-12.

DEATH is better than life! Ah yes! to thousands
Death plays upon a dulcimer and sings
That song of consolation, till the air
Rings with it, and they cannot choose but follow
Whither he leads. And not the old alone,
But the young also hear it and are still.
—Longfellow.

THOU art not dissatisfied, I suppose, because thou weighest so many pounds and not three hundred. Be not dissatisfied, then, that thou must liv only so many years and not more. For, as thou art satisfied with the amount of salvation which has been assigned to thee, so be content with the time.—Antoninus.

YET be it less or more, or soon or slow,
It shall be still in strictest measure even
To that same lot, however mean or high,
Toward which Time leads me, and the will of heaven;
All is, if I hav grace to use it so,
As ever in my great task-master's eye.
—Milton.

TO sound every question to the bottom, never to allow our convictions to outstrip our evidence, to throw aside all prejudice and all interests in the pursuit of truth, but to hold the truth, when found, in all charity and with all consideration toward those who hav been less fortunate than we—these are the lessons which, faithfully transmitted through two centuries, by those who had eyes to see and ears to hear, Locke has bequeathed to us and our posterity.—T. Fowler.

"BUT Atheism has no hope of immortality." Is this a loss? It would be so if immortality meant a life for all of happiness, or of continually improving conditions of happiness; but the immortality the Christian boasts of is nothing of the kind. Christian immortality is an eternity of unimaginable torture for the many, and of a low-class felicity for the few. Christian immortality makes death a terror, lest the dear ones we hav lost may be writhing in hell, instead of sleeping in the grave.—Annie Besant.

WAR will, for long years yet to come, be required to pave the way for freedom and progress in the East; and in Europe itself, it is not probable that war will ever absolutely cease until science discovers some destroying force so simple in its administration, so horrible in its effects, that all art, all gallantry, will be at an end, and battles will be massacres which the feelings of mankind will be unable to endure.—Winwood Reade.

TAKE no thought for to-morrow; for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.—Jesus.

TRAVELS IN FAITH,
From Tradition to Reason.
BY ROBERT C. ADAMS.
Cloth, $1.25. For Sale at this Office.

Odds and Ends.

WHEN a butcher gambles he should play for large steaks.

A LEWISTON seamstress carelessly left a needle in the back of a young lady customer's dress, and now a particular friend of the family has his arm done up in arnica.

A CUCUMBER is bad for food
It breeds internal strife;
Who eats it never comes to good,
It cuts up like a wife.
—George Francis Train.

"Do you ever sweep under the bed?" inquired a fond mother of her eldest, whose room at college she was looking over. "Oh, yes, often. It's so much easier than a dust pan, you know," replied the hopeful.

"BELMONT, N. H., boasts of a woman who goes out and chops wood with her husband." It is quite a common thing for women to mop the floor with their husbands, but we never heard of one chopping wood with them.

BOBBY laboriously lugged a pail into the parlor where the family was assembled, says the New York Times, and asked his maternal grandmother to kick it. "Why should I kick it, Bobby?" grandma inquired in amazement. "Just to amuse pa," said Bobby. "He said he would giv ten dollars any time to see you kick the bucket."

SUNDAY observance: "Come here to me, you good-for-nothing thing," exclaimed a pious farmer, addressing his son. "You ought to be ashamed of yourself, going fishing on Sunday." "I didn't go fishin', pap, I only went down the lane to throw rocks at them nigger boys." "Oh, well, that's all right, then. Recollect, my son, you must never violate the Sabbath."

"THERE is a great deal of true religion in nature," solemnly remarked a young clergyman while calling upon a lady of his congregation the other evening. "There is, indeed," was the quiet reply. "We should never forget that there is a sermon in every blade of grass." "Quite true. We should also remember while we are about it that grass is cut very short at this season of the year."

THE DAWN OF REFORM.

Must the gambler go? Must the milkman cease
To pump at break of day?
Must the Mother Hubbard be less obese;
Must the tardy debtor pay?

Must the meter for gas be taken out?
Must the small boy cease to be?
Must the strawberry man good measure shout?
Must our navy go to sea?

"JOURNALISM must be a healthy profession," said old Mrs. Squaggs, as she laid the paper on her knee and rubbed her eye-glasses with her apron. "What makes you think so?" said old Mr. Squaggs. "Because I see the writers who used to hav pieces in the papers when I was a girl are still living, and writing away the same as ever; they must be very old." "Who are they?" asked Mr. Squaggs. "Well, there is 'Veritas' for one, and 'Anon,' and 'Vox Populi,' and 'Pro Bono Publico,' and many others. I see some of their names every day, and I declare if the sight of 'em don't bring back the old school-days." Then the old lady gazed meditativly into the fire, and old Mr. Squaggs went out on the back stoop to indulge in a quiet laugh to himself.

EACH TO HIS CALLING.

Jim Webster was brought up before an Austin justice of the peace. It was the same old charge that used to bother him in Galveston. After the evidence was all in, the judge, with a perplexed look, said: "But I do not comprehend, Webster, how it was possible for you to steal those chickens when they were roosting right under the owner's window, and there were two vicious dogs in the yard." "Hit wouldn't do you a bit of good, jedge, for me to splain how I cotched dem chickens, fer yer couldn't do hit yerself, if yer tried hit forty times, and yer might git yer hide full ob buckshot de berry fust time yer put yer leg ober de fence. De bes' way for you to do, jedge, is fer yer to buy your chickens in de market, and when yer wants to commit any rascality, do hit on de bench, whar yer am at home."

THE young ladies in many parts of the state are forming "Anti-drinking-young-men societies." The parlor walls of the members will, no doubt, in place of the old-time mottoes, be adorned with the following:

"The man who takes the red, red wine,
Shall never glue his lips to mine.

"The man who chews the navy plug
Will in this parlor get no hug.

"Who drinks, or smokes, or 'cuts a deck,'
Shall never, never bite my neck.

"Drink nothing stronger than red 'pop,'
Or in your lap I'll never flop.

"If aught but water e'er you taste
Just keep your arm from around my waist.

"The man who smokes the cigaret, Shall never squeeze ME, you can bet."

HE ALWAYS TOOK SALT.

The Lewiston Journal tells this story of the late Hon. Robert Martin, of Auburn: Once during one of his visits to the legislature, Mr. Martin sat at table at the hotel, where before him upon the table were individual salt-cellars, the first which he had ever seen. When his tea was brought to him, mistaking the salt for sugar, he took the salt-cellar up and poured its contents into his cup of tea. The whole table looked at him. He stirred it up and tasted of it. If an expression of distaste was on his placid countenance, no one saw it, for he was imperturbable. He drank it all and asked for a second cup. In the meantime the waiter-girl had filled his salt-cellar again, and it was beside his plate when his tea was brought in. Squire Martin lifted the salt-cellar again, and was just turning it into his tea when the waiter-girl said: "I beg pardon, sir, but that is salt. Do you use salt?" Mr. Martin looked up, and with a gleam of satisfaction in his eye at his own ready tact, he replied with decision, intended for the entire table: "Always, madam; I always use salt."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 12. No. 35. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, August 29, 1885. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Salvation Army is threatened with prosecution in Boston for profanity, because it givs "three cheers for Jesus."

THE Chicago Mail remarks sarcastically: "We are pleased to notice that religious subjects are once more becoming popular with Chicago ministers."

THE orthodox Independent holds that "the teachings of church, as well as the best interests of all concerned, do forbid women to preach."

A GENTLEMAN said to a minister, "When do you expect to see Deacon S—— again?" "Never," said the reverend gentleman, solemnly; "the deacon is in heaven."

THE coarseness of Sam Jones, the Southern revivalist, prompts the Livingston, Ga., Journal to say: "If we were to print the Journal in the style in which Sam Jones preaches, using the same language, we wouldn't hav a single respectable subscriber in six weeks."

"LITTLE girl, do you know whose house this is?" asked a solemn-looking man of a bright child seated on the church steps. "Yes, sir; it is God's. But he ain't in," she added, as the old gentleman was about to walk up the steps; "and his agent's gone to Europe on a vacation."

THIS little paragraph hidden away in an obscure corner of a daily paper of Aug. 22d tells a mournful story. "LONDON, Aug. 21st.—The German corvet Augusta has been wrecked. Her crew of 238 men were lost. The ship was valued at $1,750,000. The vessel was lost in a cyclone in the Red Sea."

AT Lawrence, Kan., a game of base-ball, in aid of the Grant monument fund, was played between nine county officials and nine business men. The register of deeds fell in running bases, and broke his arm, and the county clerk sprained his shoulder. Of the Merchants' nine, one suffered dislocation of a knee, and another had two fingers broken. The receipts amounted to $150.

IOWA prohibits the sale of liquor except for medicinal uses, and though her sanitary conditions are good, the inhabitants require a good deal of doctoring. The druggists must make a monthly report. A small dealer at the town of Muscatine finds that it takes 51 feet of paper to enumerate his sales for a month. He sold as medicin 152 barrels of beer, 89 gallons of whisky, 19 of gin, 7 of alcohol, and 3 of brandy.

AN article in the Scientific American sets forth that the use of beer is found to produce a species of degeneration of all the organs; profound and deceptiv fatty deposits, diminished circulation, conditions of congestion and perversion of functional activities, local inflammations of both the liver and kidneys are constantly present. A slight injury, a severe cold, or a shock to the body or mind, will commonly provoke acute disease ending fatally in a beer drinker. In addition the temper is soured and the nerves shattered. The conclusion is that beer is more dangerous than whisky.

THE management of the Mexican Band, which is now playing at the Exposition Garden in Allegheny, Pa., consented to the giving of a sacred concert on Sunday for the benefit of a charitable institution of Pittsburgh. The call for the concert was signed by a dozen of the leading men of Pittsburgh and Allegheny. Great indignation was expressed by the ministers at the idea of a Sunday concert, and a meeting was held at which legal steps were taken to prevent the band from playing on Sunday afternoon. The action of the gentlemen who signed the petition requesting the concert was severely criticised. George O. Starr, the manager, has declared the concert off at the Exposition Garden, but promised to hold it up the river on a boat engaged for that purpose. He said: "I think that the objectors hav been over-zealous. They might devote their time to stopping the sale of Sunday papers, the running of street cars, and even the paid church choir singers."

SAYS F. W. Newman, author of "Religion Not History:" "It is hard to point to anything in the teaching of Jesus at once new to Hebrew and Greek sages, and likewise in general estimate true." Historian Buckle clinches Professor Newman's remark with the following: "Whoever asserts that Christianity revealed to the world truths with which it was previously unacquainted is guilty either of gross ignorance or of wilful fraud."

THE Sunday Gazetteer draws this conclusion as to General Grant's religious views: "Some noted writer has said that the person who has made himself familiar with all the religions of the world believes in none of them. Grant's extensiv travels gave him an opportunity to learn a great deal in this direction, and he no doubt profited by his experience. He seemed to look upon all men, sincere in their religious professions, however diversified, as good men, and probably was himself an Agnostic."

EX-JUDGE TURNER shot himself dead in the closet of a hotel at San Francisco, Cal., Aug. 12th. In a letter which he left he said: "We will all be soon together. Believe me this is best. I am so very, very sick. Christ died for us, and must love and deal gently with his own children. God is love. He givs light, food, and will be kind." It would hav evinced more courage on Judge Turner's part if he had forborne to end his existence and had continued the struggle to provide his family with "light and food." There was a considerable insurance upon his life.

THE mayor of Waltham, Mass., is trying to enforce the Sunday law in his city. The Sunday law of the state is a very old one, prohibiting all work or travel, except for charity, mercy, necessity, or worship. It also applies to Saturday evening. In letter and spirit, if observed to-day, it would stop the running of horse-cars, Sunday papers, most of the work of drug stores on Sunday, the riding, driving, and walking that are general, all the work done Saturday evenings of a secular sort, and a hundred and one things that churches and clergymen indulge in.

THIS item is from the Evening News, published at Sydney, New South Wales, where Dr. J. L. York has been laboring for the good cause: "After paying a high encomium on the labors of Garrison and Wendell Phillips in the cause of abolition, Dr. York remarked last Sunday evening: 'The noble flag of the stars and stripes and bars now floats proudly over the broad lands of the union. Black slavery has vanished from the land, but the white slaves are left—slavery to monopoly, slavery to capital; and that man or that woman who lessens the pain of this slavery is doing the work of the great eternal. In this respect Thomas Paine was indeed an apostle of the most high.'"

WM. GARNER, an old settler of Downs, was killed last Saturday at that place by a switch engin backing over him. The Downs Times contains some poetry on his death, of which the following is one of the verses:

> "Dearest father, thou hast left us,
> And thy loss we deeply feel;
> Yet 'tis God that has bereft us,
> He can all our sorrows heal."

Miss Alice G., the writer of the verses, makes a customary mistake as to the author of Mr. G.'s death. It was the engin and the engineer that "bereft" her of her father. She will please pardon us for pointing out the error.—Kansas Blade.

CONCERNING Mr. Squire's suppressed poem on Grant, the Banner of Light observes: "Mr. J. Rollin M. Squire, commissioner of public works, New York city, says that that the verses which he displayed at city hall, week before last, were taken from a poem entitled 'War and Freedom,' written about twenty years ago, when Sherman was making his famous march to the sea. So the bigots, who are opposed to Mr. Squire on account of his gift of mediumship, supposing the lines were the production of the commissioner, hav been obliged to take a back seat. When will people become liberal enough to be just? Probably not until creedism becomes a thing of the past."

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE says, in his monthly, the Present Day, for August: "If the Pall Mall Gazette is to go unprosecuted, Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant were badly judged in the trial to which they were subjected; and Mr. Truelove, who was imprisoned, was still more unjustly treated. The plea of the public good put forth by the Pall Mall was common to all who were indicted. The aims of the books prosecuted were certainly as high as those of the Pall Mall, and far less offensiv in terms. The books prosecuted might hav been re-written with advantage, but they were entirely free from the gushing sensationalism of the Pall Mall story, and their doctrin would prevent the evils about which the Pall Mall screams so unpleasantly."

GEORGE PADDINGTON, of Fresno, Cal., givs the clergymen of that city no peace of mind. His last attempt to make them unhappy we find in the Fresno Republican. Writing to the editor of that paper, he says: "In a recent issue you tell your readers that the late cold rains in the Northwestern states hav done much damage to grain and potatoes. You refer also to the light rainfall in California and the grasshopper pest, and say that notwithstanding California is more fortunate than some other sections, Californians will complain. I think we may justly complain of the want of rain when it is needed, and also of the rain when it is a damage. The divine scripture says that God sends the rains. Whom, then, should we hold responsible for damage by flood and by drouth? The same book says that God created all things, visible and invisible, and that not so much as a sparrow falls without his notice. The visitation of the grasshoppers must then be accorded to the divine will. There are many evils which man is powerless to avoid, such as destruction by insects and by the elements. Of whom shall we complain if not of the being who sends the devastating locusts upon their mission of destruction, and controls the flood and drouth? I would ask some of the numerous clergymen of this city to answer these questions for the enlightenment of myself and others who may not be able to find a satisfactory answer for them. If I find that I am mistaken in the opinions I hold, I will stand converted when I am convinced."

THE people of Japan are a progressiv people. They are ahead of many other nations in their readiness to adopt reforms which they recognize to be beneficial. Some of the leading scholars of Japan and many progressiv young nativs who had completed their education in Europe became convinced, a while ago, says the Sun, that it would greatly facilitate the study of their language, and also of foreign literature and science, if the Roman alphabet could be substituted for the Japanese characters in their written and printed language. A society was organized last winter under the auspices of the University of Tokio to promote this reform. It was announced at the first meeting that the government would support the movement if the society suggested a practicable scheme. The society has increasd until it includes many of the leading scholars of the empire, and numbers nearly three thousand members. It has adopted rules of orthography, and has perfected its scheme for making the momentous change it proposes. It began in June the publication of a newspaper at Tokio, in which the Japanese can read their own language in Roman characters. The Japan Gazette says that the day when this newspaper appeared will be a memorable date in the annals of Japanese civilization. In the written language of Japan there are, as in Chinese, many arbitrary characters, representing ideas rather than sounds. It is very difficult for nativ students to learn to read, and it is said that it takes a foreigner several years to get a fair acquaintance with the written language, while if it were written in Roman characters it would require only a few months. This innovation, which in its inception is meeting with marked favor, more emphatically than any other recent event, stamps the Japanese as a progressiv people, who are ambitious to utilize all the facilities that hav helped to develop the Western nations.

THE committee having the Grant Memorial fund in charge estimate that a proper monument will cost a million dollars. Something more than sixty thousand has been subscribed. Various other cities besides New York will erect monuments to Grant. Chicago will spend $40,000 or $50,000 for that purpose. The necessary sum has already been subscribed by the people of that city.

ON Thursday evening, last week, Dr. J. M. Rand, of Newark, N. J., was called to see a sick child and found it dying of diphtheria. He wrote a prescription and handed it to the father. On the following morning the father informed him that the child was dead. When asked if he had given it the prescribed medicin he said he had not, and that he had depended upon God to save his child, as he believed implicitly in the faith cure. The doctor told him that the death of the child might hav been prevented but for his neglect in not calling in medical aid promptly.

Communications.

Social and Economic Studies.

At the investigation of the committee of the United States Senate on labor and education, a number of side issues were introduced in respect to health and sanitary means for the improvement of the condition of labor; plans for the education of persons dependent upon their labor for support, especially women, in specific industries and arts, some of which, indeed, seemed to suggest almost the escape from useful labor; and measures for reforming and guarding the industrious from the evil of intemperance. All of these looked mainly to the law to apply positiv interference in behalf of these special measures.

Of course, health and the maintenance of sanitary conditions are of the first importance for any community to consider. But the invocation of legislation to promote them assumes at the outset the right to control the occupation of the land by the power to determin what kind of dwellings conform to sanitary conditions and how they are to be occupied and used.

Now, the exercise of such a power would involve a control of the land by society far more arbitrary than any ever proposed by the advocates of "limitation of estates." It is also well known that it is in tenement houses, and in houses built on speculation, in close proximity to each other, and where the price of land reduces the house-lot to its minimum, that the greatest disregard of sanitary conditions prevails. The evil is fundamental, not incidental to landlordism. To attempt to reform it is to make war upon an intrenched adversary, who can only be dislodged by direct assault. Those who occupy their own house hav every inducement to make the surroundings healthful, and the health-board will find little difficulty in effecting any necessary change; while with the landlord and tenant they hav two to consult or direct instead of one, both of whom are averse to any change. The one because he fears expense, the other because he fears an additional excuse to raise the rent.

Now, the most important of conditions for health are room, sunlight, and air, but these are impossible of attainment where three or four houses are crowded upon a single city lot, and a family or two on every floor of each. With all our attempts at sanitary reform, the condition of the tenement house grows worse and worse, and the death rate, especially among children, increases in a ratio corresponding to the overcrowded condition.

My purpose is, by no means, to disparage sanitary measures, but simply to show how every consideration urged for it points to a control of the land wholly different from our present tenure, which places it in the irresponsible ownership of one other than the occupier, and with whom he has no interest or sentiment in common.

EDUCATION.

Popular education is a most important subject, and one which cannot be too urgently advocated. But education in what? To increase the number of mere scholars will only increase the number of competitors for scholarly employments, which are already overcrowded. To promote technical and professional knowledge would hav the same effect. To educate in trades and handicrafts would hav a similar result, and already the trades unions seek to restrict the learning of trades except under their regulations—an unreasonable attempt to be sure, but fully justified from the standpoint of the economy which makes demand and supply the ruling power in trade and then seeks to regulate them by manipulations of the market and class schemes to evade free competition.

But the all-important thing in education, which teaches to liv rightly and in obedience to natural laws, is impossible under the private control of nature in her fields and forests. To provide for the wants of life is the primary duty of everyone. To be educated in one's life pursuit is one's first need; but under our unequal system of division, children of the poor are either kept in drudgery, or sent to school to learn the, to them, worse than useless lessons, wholly removed as they are from any applications to their industrial life, while practically, and by example, they are taught to despise honest labor, and to believe that riches and enjoyment spring from anything rather than from industry and faithful effort. The child is, in the necessity of the case, the very prince of economists. From the cradle his wants are supplied without forethought or effort on his part. To get something for nothing is instinctiv with him, and which he reduces to a science as he grows in years; so that if he cannot continue to hav all his wants supplied at others' expense, as usually falls to the richly born, he will giv the least possible service for the greatest amount of service or goods he may obtain from others. If by some shrewd device or subtle pretense he can wholly escape work, and saddle the expense of his life upon others, he knows that under the teachings of our "exact economics" and "reformed theology" he will be entitled to social respect, and that his course will be gratuitously defended by the learned professor and titled dignitary, both secular and religious. So, while the natural wants of men are few and could readily be supplied by a moderate application to productiv labor, the desire to obtain artificial gratifications is without end, and caprice takes the place of nature where the labor of production no longer serves as a check upon inordinate desire; and so unremitting toil is thrown upon others. "Thus by the treachery of one part of society in avoiding their share of the work; by their tyranny in increasing the burthen of the world, an evil is produced quite unknown in a simple state of life, and a man of but common capacities, not born to wealth, in order to secure a subsistence for himself and family must work with his hands so large a part of his time that nothing is left for intellectual, moral, esthetic, and religious improvement" (Theodore Parker, "Thoughts on Labor").

Thus the first requisit of education is to teach the child theoretically and practically that the supplies of human wants are derived from human toil; that labor is to be honored, and followed as a means of enjoyment; and that to shirk our proper share of it is so childish and mean that it is the first weakness we should seek to correct in ourselvs or discourage in others. Even supposing labor were a curse, to be avoided as much as possible, instead of being, as it is under natural conditions, a source of enjoyment in itself, still what unmanly and uncultured desire is that which seeks to escape it for oneself and leave the curse to fall on those more feeble and already overburdened! No reason but the most childish one can be given why any child should be secured in his exemption through youth and manhood from the exercise of his energies in the production of the things necessary to his support. And no teaching, it seems to me, has ever been so well calculated to perpetuate the mental imbecilities of childish selfishness and appetite for unearned sweets as this same theory of getting the largest return for the least outlay, as a substitute for equitable exchange.

If, then, we could hav an education of the least value in its social and industrial bearing, it would be such as would prepare all to take their proportional share of the work of the world, and inform them completely of their natural right to land and opportunity, and to the duty as well as the right to use the elements from which all prosperity and enjoyment are derived. While, therefore, not intending to antagonize any plan of education and human enlightenment, it is plain to me that education, as it is popularly conceived, can do little to remedy the wrongs under which mankind are suffering, emasculated as are the text-books of our schools and colleges of all manly thought upon or even allusion to the great questions of work and its awards. Not reference to the "peculiar institution" in the days of chattel slavery was more studiously ignored or systematically misrepresented in our school-books and homilies than is now practiced in our institutions of learning, our pulpits, and public press upon this question of labor and the normal right to earth and the products it yields.

Education in the learning of books will help men little in solving the problem of life and labor. Only the exercise of thought can effect this; thought upon their relation to earth and to each other; careful observation and classification of all the phenomena attending their work and its results; the adaptation of effort to result, and the relativ proportion of those efforts which are put forth in concert. In short, exactness and honesty, without both of which no certain result of scientific inquiry is so much as possible, are the main things in which men need education, before they can achieve personal security and enjoyment, or the advancement and elevation of society.

TEMPERANCE.

Intemperance is a social vice of the most deplorable nature, and social effort for its eradication can not be too highly recommended. To attempt to suppress it by legal forms and penalties is another and different matter, involving the whole subject of the nature and power of government, whether of a monarchical or of a popular kind. How far coerciv laws may be employed to prevent vice, or prohibit the manufacture, sale, and use of noxious or poisonous drugs, it is foreign to our subject to inquire. It seems quite plain that the agitation for prohibitory laws and the use of moral influence in discouraging the use of intoxicating drinks are incompatible with each other. Familiar with the history of this reform for half a century, I hav observed that the greater the degree of reliance placed upon moral and social influences by its friends the greater the success it has attained in combatting the evil. It is especially a social habit, springing from what may be termed good nature and social feeling. When not an inherited appetite, it is usually formed in convivial circles, not in isolation. Fashion is responsible for its existence in a great degree. To be social and jovial is the tendency of the young. To treat and be treated becomes the test of good fellowship. It is hence through appeals to the social principle, and the setting of proper examples, only that we can ever hope to remove habits so deeply rooted in the social life of a people. But no sooner had a social effort been made to reform the evil, and obtained a certain degree of importance, that it was destined to be encumbered with the advocacy of persons who thought that they saw a vantage for the gratification of some political ambition or increase of some sectarian prestige, encouraged by that popular frenzy which deems a statute law the chief means of accomplishing any desired end. Taking this direction, the success of the earlier movement was greatly retarded by the acrimonious discussions which party strife engendered. The retrograde movement was emphasized by the "hard cider and log cabin" presidential campaign of 1840, which left the temperance cause at the lowest ebb.

It was at this crisis that the "Washingtonian" movement was inaugurated by some self-reformed men in the city of Baltimore. They dropped all question of applying law, or of appealing to the superstitious fears of mankind, but placed the reform upon its social and humanitary basis. Their progress was unprecedented, but it soon became encumbered by the old leaven of lawmaking and of partisan and sectarian feeling. A number of times these forces hav nearly overwhelmed the temperance movement, but it has emerged again under the leadership of men with truer impulses, if not broader conceptions.

It is proper in this connection to refer to the effect of such legislation as has been adopted. Being a professed evil, it has from the start been thought necessary to regulate the traffic in liquor. Of course, this could only be done by licensing it. If it were not wrong to sell it, none could be justly prevented from dealing in it. The advocates of prohibitory laws are not responsible for the license laws, but, failing to obtain their object, they hav favored "high license," "local option," etc., all involving the principle of licensing that which is claimed to be wrong.

From all this controversy the cause of temperance has gained little and lost much in the distraction of the moral and social influence which would hav greatly aided the reform. Though some may not, perhaps, relax their moral efforts while striving to forward political action, the many certainly do, and the two "suasions," as they are called, remind one of a badly broken or balky team, which take turns in pulling well and holding back simultaneously. During the last presidental contest I heard the candidate of the Prohibition party, at Lake Keuka, ridicule the "moral suasionists," and declare that moral means could not reform the world.

But certainly the application of law is a still more doubtful force. License laws hav done little but make the sale of liquor a business more respectable and select. The high license law can hardly do more than put the enormous profits of the business into the hands of a few. The tax which the general government has imposed, four times—at one time about ten times—the cost of the liquor, in no way has reduced the amount consumed. The prohibitory laws do not prohibit, its advocates being witnesses; some of the cities in states where the laws are supposed to be in operation showing proportionally a larger number of arrests for intoxication than the city of New York, where they hav not a "high license," or a carefully enforced one of any kind. Under prohibitory law temperance would depend upon the careful enforcement of the law, and be liable to show decline whenever the vigilance of police and detectivs was relaxed.

The "Ohio" law, which holds the dealer responsible for the drunken acts and their consequences of the customer, to whose appetite he has ministered, is more effectiv and more readily enforced, being more in conformity to the general purposes of law, whatever may be said of its intrinsic merits. It could be hoped, however, that the friends of temperance would turn their attention to repeal rather than enactment of laws, and to change the economic forces, which are so perverted as to make the liquor traffic a curse to the race. Strip from the traffic that public sanction which enables a dealer to boast a charter or license for his trade. This alone, while it might possibly temporarily increase the amount consumed in many localities, would deprive it of all artificial respectability, and dispel the illusion which a young man often entertains, that to treat a friend or associate to something which is costly and respectably exclusiv, is the proper thing to command regard. This would react on those who were socially below him and ambitious to imitate his conduct, and so the social and fashionable impulse to indulgence would be withdrawn.

But the foundation of intemperance lies in the economic and industrial misrule, a part of which the liquor traffic is. Men who are not the victims of the inherited malady begin and continue to drink for the reason that they are denied the social and intellectual enjoyments which their nature requires. The rich youth whose time hangs heavily on his hands resorts to it to kill ennui. The worker seeks it to revive his exhausted vitality, and to add to his restricted social pleasures. Drunkenness affects most the two extremes of society, finding its easiest conquests among the idle and the overworked. A reform which would throw upon each the necessity of supplying his own wants, and upon no one burdensome toil, could not fail to hav a powerful effect to make men temperate and provident.

If the question merely of the traffic is taken into account, we shall find that men sell liquor because there is a demand for it. Stop the demand and the traffic will cease. In other words, stop the profits of the trade and it will disappear. This can be done effectually by reduction of the demand. It is also possible by withdrawing the protection of the law from the trade to cut off the profits, and by what might be called unfriendly legislation in lieu of a fostering license, to so discourage the traffic as to effectually suppress the traffic without exercising any of the expensiv and exceptional powers or arbitrary interference of coerciv legislation. Something has already been done in this direction, and with good result so far as it has been allowed to operate. If Alcohol is the great enemy of mankind, as represented, outlaw him. Make not only any debt which is wholly for liquor uncollectable by law, but any debt for liquor whatever. Go farther, and make all the money paid for liquor reclaimable by the man, or any member of his family, or by his creditor if he is insolvent, or by the parish if he become a pauper. If alcohol is, however, required for medicin, or mechanical purposes, let manufactories be established, and depots at convenient points where it can be had at cost of manufacture and transportation. No private dealer could compete with that, and there would be an end of the liquor traffic.

It is because there is "money in it" that the dealer engages in such a business; often, no doubt, because other means and opportunities of employment are not to be had. Thus our social and economic systems strongly tempt him to pursue a calling against which his manhood rebels. It is worthy of remark, too, that liquor saloons, or other dens of vice, are seldom kept by the owners of the houses or buildings where they are established, but usually are a feature of the landlord system, and aid, while they are sustained by, that institution. The enormous profits of the business enable them to occupy the most conspicuous locations on the street, and so crowd the worker into the rear or obscure and dilapidated tenement.

To accomplish any moral or social reform it is requisit that the family and home should be secure from becoming the prey of the spoiler, and the sport of trade and unequal traffic, whether in lands or goods, or in the means of satisfying unnatural appetites and inherited thirsts. Not that the proper distribution of the soil would work moral miracles, but that it would open the way for every attainable improvement in human character and conditions.

Politics and Theology.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: An Anarchistic friend in a neighboring state was kind enough forward me the article from Mr. Tucker's Liberty on "Liberal Artful Dodgers," with the remark that it fitted my case "like a Jouvin kid glove," and that I should "paste it in my hat," etc. This, of course, because I approve, or hav determined to stand by, the League's present attitude. My reply so nearly resembles the editorial in The Truth Seeker, with a few additional points, that I thought it might not be amiss. Here it is:

THE REPLY.

If logic depends on an anonymous writer's ability to berate as hypocrits those who may not agree with him, then Mr. "X." is eminently logical. Usually such logic discloses the egotist of one idea. In some things "X." is, to my notion, correct, particularly in his first sentence: "Despotism has its beginning in theology."

Then that settles the whole thing, accepting even his own words, for, according to this clumsy Anarchistic dodger, if you wish to destroy despotism you must kill theology. Liberals, therefore, must be the standard-bearers in the vanguard of liberty; the leading and only real radical reformers doing the boldest and most necessary work to destroy theology, the origin and cause of despotism.

"X." speaks glibly about "those religious instincts which are integral in the constitution of man." The constitution is generally understood to embody those functions and powers common to all the genus homo, not any particular condition of mentality, which alone can be defined as religion. Waiving words, however, where can be found in the constitution of man "those integral religious instincts?" Nowhere.

"Theology and politics are born in one womb. The origin and nature of one are the origin and nature of the other. The argument which condemns the one condemns the other." What bosh! Theology is an organized system of so-called religion, with a pretended patent-right on a future and everlasting existence. Politics—the science of government—has been evolved by the growing intelligence for mutual protection in the present.

Hav not all, or nearly all, founders of republican institutions and fighters for enlarged political liberty been noted Freethinkers? This you know to be the case. Now, if pronounced Freethinkers—the intellectual leaders—hav always worked and fought for the enlargement of the people's political rights, how can this be tortured into the pretense that politics and theology are allies, or are the same in effect? Everywhere enlarged political liberty has been the death-knell of theology. For a verification of this look at Rome now, and compare it with the palmy days of the papal state, or even under Pious IX.; look at Spain under Isabella, and the manly defiance of the people of Catalonia a few weeks since, to both spiritual and temporal authority; look at the shaky Church of England to-day, and contrast it with the domineering of the "Lord's spiritual" even fifty years ago; and, finally, look at France, which furnishes the most striking picture of theological decadence from a position of absolute domination. What is the cause of all this decay of theological power? Enlarged political rights, the consequence of increased intelligence. Republics and theology are necessarily antithetical; but, if a majority of the people in a republic are fools enough to be swayed by theology, the political institutions may be made to serve evil purposes. There must be something left for the popular intelligence to preserve, and that should be their political rights, unhampered by theology. This is, and has been, the tendency, and the fact is proven by the bitter opposition with which an extension of political rights has invariably been met from friends of theology.

The "purely republican forms" by which a Protestant Episcopal bishop is elected, does not change the fact that Episcopalianism is, in its very essence, a violation of republicanism. Beyond that, the bishop is agent of a mere sect, the president of all the people, selected by nearly all the (male) population.

I am not partial to the presidency nor the United States Senate, and hope to aid in wiping out many useless forms which still hamper us, but that can only be when the world gets wiser. For the present I wish rather to maintain the good we hav than "fly to other (follies) that we know not of," and gradually promote, extend, and perpetuate the good in politics which our Freethinking forerunners hav fought so hard for.

"It costs something to stand out as a thoroughbred Anarchist." I am sick of those fellows who are everlastingly reminding us of their martyrdom. When this "thoroughbred" "X." discloses his identity we can better determin how much it has cost him. "I am braver than thou" sounds as silly as the pharisaical cant of, "I am holier than thou." The trouble is that these scholarly Anarchists hav got too far beyond "the plainest laws of common sense." They insist upon *un*common sense. "Experience is the great schoolmaster," and as experience has shown that theology has little power where political rights are understood and properly exercised, there is little danger of people relinquishing them for a theory that never has passed the ordeal of experience even among its friends.

Yours for the downfall of despotism,

E. A. Stevens.

A Sermon Too Literally Interpreted.

It is said that doctors do not always like to take their own medicin; and the same might be stated figurativly of ministers. The Rev. W. S. Downey's experience is quite demonstrativ on this point. Writing to an editor, Mr. Downey discourses thus: "A naughty boy ought to be sent to bed suppperless, but to inflict penance on a preacher for teaching the whole truth may lead him to complain. More than thirty years hav passed away since I visited the 'Land o' Cakes,' Scotland, where I preached sundry sermons for the good of souls. It may interest you, kind friend, to know that while I preached my last sermon in Glasgow, I fared hard. My subject was the 'Rich Man and Lazarus.' The weather was salubrious, and my congregation very large. I warned my hearers against fashionable dresses and costly apparel: 'The rich man was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day.' Again, I directed their attention to high living, and tried to prove that too many Christians made gods of their stomachs, as did the rich man in the parable. I particularly impressed on the minds of my hearers the essentiality of praying more than they eat.

"After service I was the guest of one of the leading officers of the church, a truly pious elder. Having preached twice and attended a private meeting, I was inclined for supper. I needed a 'square meal.' But alas! I had a crooked one offered to me. My host approached me before my supper, and the good soul expressed his approval of all I preached concerning man's care for his body, his fine suits of clothes and rich dinners. 'For the truths I advanced and advocated he would not offend me with sumptuous fare. Knowing I would turn from a nice supper,' he laid out before me a pot of ale, a stale loaf, and some old cheese. Both edibles had doubtless seen better days. Because I try to be Christian I am thankful for all I receive, but my charity forsook me on that evening, and I murmured a little.

"Do me the justice, if you please, to believe I never preached the aforesaid sermon again in England, Ireland, or Scotland, and indulge no little spite agaist Brother McDonald."

Doubts in Dialog.

A CHURCH OF ENGLAND CURATE AND A DOUBTER.

Curate. God so loved the world that he gave his only son to die for it.

Doubter. When?

C. Jesus died somewhere about 1850 years ago.

D. For what did Jesus die?

C. To redeem the world from the consequences of Adam's sin.

D. When did Adam sin?

C. About four thousand years before the birth of Jesus.

D. If God so loved the world, why did he delay the redemption for four thousand years?

C. That is not for finite minds to judge.

D. You teach that finite minds must believe without judgment. But was Adam punished for his sin?

C. Yes.

D. Is it just to punish one who is not guilty for a sin for which Adam suffered?

C. But the penalty was a curse which passed on Adam's descendants, and it is from this curse that the sacrifice of Jesus redeemed the world.

D. Does the redemption extend to the whole world?

C. Yes, if they believe, and are baptized.

D. What was Adam's sin?

C. He disobeyed God.

D. Is God all-powerful?

C. Yes.

D. Did he create and control Adam?

C. Yes.

D. Can the creature disobey the omnipotent controler?

C. God gave man liberty.

D. Liberty to fall?

C. If Adam had chosen, he might hav stood upright; God gave him the noblest gifts. Through Adam's own fault he fell.

D. Before Adam's fall, could he distinguish good from evil?

C. No.

D. How then could he choose between them?

C. He had God's command to guide him.

D. Do the commands of the omnipotent guide or compel? Can the irresistible be resisted?

C. You forget man had free will.

D. Do you mean that God being infinit, his will was everywhere omnipotent, but that in some places, and under some circumstances, Adam's will was stronger than that of God?

C. No. I mean that omnipotent God allowed man to be free.

D. That is, that God, being able to prevent sin, would not. But in human morals, is not one who knows of a crime about to be committed, and who might prevent it and does not, is not such a one treated as accessory before the fact? and in legal jargon is not an accessory before the fact treated as if a principal in the crime?

C. God's ways are not as man's ways.

D. But is not acquiescence in crime criminal?

C. God did not acquiesce in Adam's crime.

D. He did more than acquiesce, he contrived the crime.

C. That is blasphemy.

D. Is God omniscient?

C. Yes.

D. Did he, before he created Adam, know that Adam would sin?

C. Yes.

D. Hav any of the millions of millions, who hav peopled the world since Adam, died unredeemed by Jesus?

C. Yes, the large majority die unredeemed. The holy scriptures say, "Few are chosen."

D. And did God know this before he created any?

C. Yes.

D. And did he then so love the world that he created them to suffer by unnumbered millions.

C. That is a difficulty a finite mind cannot grasp.

D. And yet you teach that the finite mind is to suffer if it cannot believe. Was there any existence beside God before creation?

C. Certainly not.

D. Is God infinitly good?

C. Most certainly yes.

D. Then before creation there was no evil?

C. No.

D. Is it compatible with God's infinit goodness that he should hav created evil?

C. This again is beyond the sphere of finite reason, and you Materialists hav equal difficulty. You hav evil in nature; how do you account for that?

D. Which evil? or which evils? Some, science does account for; others she is examining. Take, for instance, the Lisbon or Java earthquake. Science notes the shocks, marks the range, warns the inhabitants, and, though knowing but little, adds daily to her knowledge. Take the evils of poverty, crime, disease. Science has studied a thousand theories, connoted the experience of generations, and, at least, does not kneel blindly before disaster, but grapples in earnest effort for amelioration. But the Materialist's inability to explain the whole of nature does not justify your inability to explain the creed to which you ask my adhesion.—Charles Bradlaugh.

Our London Letter.

The disclosures lately made by the Pall Mall Gazette hav caused some little stir and excitement throughout the country, and it is difficult to understand why this question of the day is so carefully ignored by the London daily papers. Although meetings are being held in all parts for the purpose of discussing the matter and endeavoring to find a remedy for the social cancer now so fully exposed, no notice is taken by the chief organs of the press. It has been suggested that the subject is of so gross a nature that it is an insult to such delicate-minded people as the majority of the English profess to be to mention it, but this can scarcely be the reason, as these very papers hav extensiv reports of sensational divorce cases. Probably the real reason is trade jealousy, as the circulation of the Gazette has been considerably augmented in consequence of the recent reports.

There seems but little doubt but that these disclosures are in the main perfectly true, and this has been confirmed is several quarters, but how the traffic in young girls is to be prevented in the future is a point somewhat difficult of solution. It is well known that the chief offenders are men in high places, and the general opinien appears to be that the Gazette is to blame for not giving a list of the names of the guilty parties, and it is only known to those in possession of the information why it is withheld. There is not the slightest doubt that the Criminal Law Amendment Act would never hav become law had it not been for the recent excitement. Leaders of the present government say it was fully intended to carry the measure before this question was made public, but no one believes this statement to be anything else than a political lie.

It remains to be seen whether the provisions of the act will be applied to the real offenders, who appear to be chiefly members of the aristocracy, or influential in some other way.

The Jefferies case is constantly brought up before the House, but nothing definit is gained, the object being to shield the judge and put off doing anything in the matter till Parliament rises.

It is somewhat unfortunate for the Pall Mall that it has allowed the Salvation Army to be mixed up in the matter, as this organization is somewhat unclean, and the members are not noted for their chastity. The consequence is that many are holding back, being suspicious of Booth and his party, and not caring to credit anything that they hav anything to do with, and this is not at all surprising.

The fact is pretty well known that members of the clergy are good patrons of brothel-keepers, and although many of them are creating a great clamor, and declaring that they hav done an immense deal in the way of rescuing the youthful victims and preventing many from being ruined, it is extremely doubtful if they hav done anything of the sort. Of course, if there is any glory to be obtained from making such a statement, they will endeavor to get as much as possible, but if what they say is true, why did not they make the outcry instead of leaving it to a secular newspaper to show the plague spot? The real state of the case is that these evangelists hav been far too much taken up in enslaving the minds of people to trouble as to what became of their bodies. As usual, the church is ready to follow when the way is made easy and something is to be made out of it, and many people are hoodwinked into the belief that it is the religious party who hav done all the work. After eighteen centuries of Christianizing influence we see the result. What a satire on Christianity and its profession of conferring universal good! I do not mean to infer that Christianity has caused this particular crime, but it has certainly done nothing to prevent it, and surely the eyes of all thinking people should be opened to the fact of the utter failure of any supernatural theory being of the slightest benefit to humanity. Mr. Downes's Unbosoming.

Rev. W. W. Downes, the popular pastor of Bowdoin Square Baptist church, Boston—a church noted for its superior culture and exclusivness, permitting none but sinners of the most refined manners to be clutched from Satan's grasp—is at present under a cloud.

The quarrel does not extend outside the Baptist church, no one else seeming to care a copper how Brother Downes comports himself.

Two Sundays since he uttered the following malediction on his enemies in a morning prayer, in which he demands of God all sorts of confusion for them and sweet sleep for himself, and givs God some information about them and himself which must hav astonished that gentleman, he doubtless being too busy counting sparrows and numbering hairs to know what was going on in Bowdoin Square Baptist church, Boston, Massachusetts.

O Lord, thou knowest that not one of these men has been the means of bringing a single soul across the threshold of this church. But thy servant has done better than that, for which we thank thee. We pray thee, O Lord, that confusion, shame, contempt, mildew, and the blackness of darkness and all manner of evil may come upon them, and if any of their number hav been hoodwinked by the arch villain, wilt thou open their eyes? And we further pray thee, O Lord, that thou wilt giv thy servant sweet sleep this night in spite of the machinations of these wicked men.

Comment on such buffoonery would be useless in a dime museum. Last Sunday he preached a sermon for the benefit of his cultured parishioners that shows Parsons Talmage and Newman must look to their laurels. We quote the following extracts:

The great strain she [Mrs. Downes] has borne very nobly, but this morning as I was leaving the house she was suddenly taken unconscious, and I had to leave her there to come to church. I cannot say now whether she be dead or alive.

In speaking of the lady who seems to be the contention in the church, he says:

I would speak most delicately of the lady who has been my companion in this. She has borne it very well. A nervous wreck before this happened, as her doctor tells me, for reasons which I need not mention, she still livs.

Again:

I hav no hesitancy in saying that there are probably a thousand things which I hav done in the fear of God for which I could giv no satisfactory explanation.

He then referred to an opinion regarding Paul held by Henry Ward Beecher, "with whom," he said, "I hav a friendly feeling."

In expressing the love his church had for him, he says, "One of the hard things when this came about was the extreme pleasure which some men and women belonging to the church felt at my supposed downfall." Again he expresses his opinion of his church thusly, "Whose turn may not come next?" He thinks ignorance is bliss to the minister:

There are things which for a minister it were better if he never knew or never heard. We are restrained within the church and by what others may say outside the church, and so we are not natural. The love we hav within the church should be unsuspicious love. The other night, at about 11 o'clock, as I returned home to my wife's bedroom, a large front alcove room, I saw that the gas was turned very low, for the evening was very warm. I saw a center table in the floor, and on the side a lounge. At the foot of the lounge, in a willow rocking-chair, sat my wife. On the lounge, stretched at full length, lay a man. [Laughter.] He had no coat on. [Laughter.] He had on a vest—unbuttoned. At first I thought he had none on. He had on no shoes. He lay at ease, with a pillow under his head. That was Tuesday night. The thought has since occurred, that if I had had a grudge against that man and my wife, and if I had brought some friends with me and had burst open the door, and, as my wife and the man sprung to their feet, nabbed him, exclaiming, "Now we've got you!" [laughter] and then had rushed for a police officer, and put the man in a cell, and should make a very silly charge against that man and that woman, don't you think a good many silly people would hav believed it? Well, that man was a deacon in my church, and he is on the platform now. He is in my house more than I, for I don't hav time to be there.

In reference to his brother clergymen, he says:

Within three years certainly there used to come into this church a lady seemingly of good education and prepossessing. I hasten to say not especially to me. That woman had an infirmity; she had a predisposition to tell untruths. She told me in my study one day of the great affection existing between herself and a very prominent minister in this city. She said that she would often go to him in her trouble, and he would take her in his arms and kiss away her tears. How much trouble I might make by telling such a tale around! It was an infirmity in her to tell these things, but what an infirmity it would hav been for me to mention them! She told me the same tale regarding another minister.

He closes with an evident knowledge of the shortcoming of Bowdoin Square Baptist church in this style: "If almighty God should speak here and tell all he knows about each one of us, who would dare look the other in the face?" PAXTON.

Prohibitory Laws.

If there is anything we really need, it is more prohibitory laws, and if the world is ever reformed and men made better, it will be in that way, of course. The prohibition of liquor was so successful in Maine and Kansas that New York thought she needed a prohibitory law, and accordingly attached one to suicide. Note the result: In three months from the 1st of last December there were only forty-two suicides in the state, whereas had this law not been in force, the number might hav run into thousands. The foresight of those legislators is truly commendable, and other states would do well to follow their example, and thus prevent our great country from being depopulated. During these three months there were 380 suicides in the United States, and many of them were attributable to "love troubles." It will next be in order to prohibit love, and thus remove one great incentiv to self-murder; for if no one is allowed to love, there can be no disappointment to depress the mind and create a desire for a home in the New Jerusalem. I hope every lawmaker will realize the importance of such a law, and act accordingly.

Another evil which the law must prohibit, if it is ever stopped, is the hypodermic injection of morphia to exalt the mind and produce fictitious happiness. This is rapidly on the increase, and a man and his wife in San Francisco were lately found in a crazed and demented condition from its excessiv use, twenty-nine empty morphia vials being found under their bed. Three thousand slaves to the opium vice are said on good authority to reside in that city, and no prohibitory law in force. When that would surely put an end to its use, and free the state from its presence, as Maine and Kansas are from liquor, it seems like culpable negligence not to enact such a law.

That our prohibitory lawmakers may wake up and do something, I will quote a few words from an opium fiend, hoping their minds will be diverted from the ruinous effects of light wines and beer long enough to consider this other evil. "Yes, I don't deny I am an opium smoker for several reasons, the main one being that my looks, the color of my skin, and my wasted form, would tell anyone different. It is a terrible thing, and will kill me in a few years. It is ruin to the man or woman who once gets the habit. When the craving to smoke comes upon me, the perspiration stands out in great drops on my face and forehead. If I do not obey the summons of my master, my bones begin to ache until I am forced to. A half-dozen pills bring relief, and a half-dozen more charge my system full enough to last six hours, when the same performance must be gone through with again; and here I am, an opium smoker, a person who livs for nothing else in the world but to smoke opium." It is said we hav in these United States 500,000 female prostitutes, the average life of which is five years, so 100,000 step promptly into their graves every twelve months. All that is wanted to put an end to this disgraceful business and wholesale slaughter is a strong prohibitory law. A secret vice among the young of both sexes fills thousands of graves yearly, and makes life to those who survive a curse and a burden. To remove this evil, the child of ignorance, it is not knowledge that is wanted, but a cast-iron prohibitory law, and I hope the Prohibitionists will giv it their attention. Arsenic eaters are more numerous than some imagin, for a milky whiteness of complexion is much desired by vain females. Says a physician, alluding to its growing use among ladies: "The inevitable results of the habit are hideous and incurable cutaneous eruptions, and loathsome diseases of the scalp, falling out of the hair, dropsy, and oftentimes insanity." We must hav a law to prohibit this.

It is now a settled fact that tea is a poison, and stimulates just to the extent it irritates. The nerves, having a strong aversion to it, attempt to eject it when it comes in contact with them, and this exertion is called stimulation. We must hav it prohibited, and coffee also, for that makes some bilious. Corsets compress the duodenum and disarrange the internal functions of foolish females; tight shoes produce corns and bunions on the weak-minded of both sexes, and as such don't hav the sense to avoid physical pain, the law must prevent it by that panacea for every ill—prohibition. A few more prevalent evils might be specified, but enough has been said to show how sadly in need we are of more legislation, and, if our 60,000 lawyers are to find employment, we must hav more laws to keep them busy. Learning to Spell.

Learning to read the English language is one of the worst mind-stunting processes that has formed a part of the general education of any people. Its evil influence arises from the partly phonetic, partly lawless, character of English spelling. Although each letter represents some sound oftener than any other, there is hardly a letter in the alphabet that does not represent more than one sound, and hardly a sound in the language that is not represented in several ways, while many words are written with as many silent letters as significant ones. There is nothing in any word to indicate in which of these ways its component sounds are represented, nothing in the written group of letters to show which sounds they stand for, and which of them, if any, are silent, so that a learner can never be sure of pronouncing rightly an English word that he has not heard spoken, nor of spelling correctly one that he has never seen written. The spelling of each word must be learned by sheer force of memory. In this work the pupil's reasoning powers cannot be utilized, but must be subdued, while his memory is sadly overworked. In the affairs of the child's daily life the logical following out of rules is rewarded; in learning to spell, it brings him only discomfort and bewilderment. He is taught that b-o-n-e stands for bōn (not bo-ne), and t-o-n-e for tōn, but that d-o-n-e stands for dun, that g-o-n-e spells gŏn, m-o-v-e spells moov, and b-r-o-n-z-e bronz. Now, when he comes in reading to another similar word, as none, he has no means of telling whether to call it nōn, nun, nŏn, noon, or non; he can only look up at his teacher and wait to be told. The influence of the spelling class quickly drives him to repress any inclination to reason, and he givs himself up to a blind following of authority. No child learns English spelling without getting the pernicious notion that cram is better than thinking, and that common sense is a treacherous guide.—Popular Science Monthly for September.

FORM OF THE CROSS.—The popular form of the cross differs in one important feature from that described by the early fathers. Justin (Dial. Try., xci), Ireneus (Agt. Her. ii, 24), and Tertullian (Ad. Nat. xii) all concur in affixing midway on the upright stake a "horn" or saddle, on which the culprit sits astride with his legs bound below. The whipping-post is a dwarfed descendant of the primitiv cross, and the pillory is a differentiated species.—Antichrist.

The Eighth Annual Convention of the New York Freethinkers' Association.

TO BE HELD AT

ALBANY, N. Y., SEPTEMBER 11, 12, AND 13, 1885.

This Association has, at the present time, about twenty-six hundred members. It was organized at the town of Huron, near the village of Wolcott, on the 18th day of August, 1877, with Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, as president; E. M. Sellon, of Buffalo, recording secretary; Amy Post, of Rochester, treasurer; and H. L. Green, of Salamanca, corresponding secretary.

The basis of this Association is Universal Mental Liberty, and its platform the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Its object is to stimulate Freethought and investigation among the people in relation to their civil, religious, and political rights, and to encourage the investigation of questions relating to religion, science, and reform, and to that end to sustain Freethought speakers, hold Liberal meetings, and circulate Liberal, scientific, and reform papers and periodicals.

There hav been seven Annual Conventions held at the following places, viz.: first, Watkins; second, Chautauqua Lake; third, Hornellsville; fourth, Hornellsville; fifth, Watkins; sixth, Rochester; seventh, Cassadaga Lake.

The Conventions hav come to be national institutions, attracting the attention of the press and public everywhere.

The peculiarity of this Association is that it includes, under the name "Freethinker," all the various branches of the Liberal party—Materialists, Spiritualists, Free Religionists, Agnostics, and all others who indorse the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Its catholic Liberality is the secret of its wonderful success.

The Eighth Annual Convention of this Association will be held at Leland's Opera House, Albany, N. Y., September 11th, 12th, and 13th. This, and the National Congress of the National Liberal League, to be held at Cleveland, Ohio, October 9th, 10th, and 11th, promis to be the most important Conventions of the Liberal party ever held in this country. The National Liberal League, of which Robert G. Ingersoll is president, has about three hundred auxiliary societies, and membership of thirty thousand in the United States and Canada. New organizations are being rapidly formed, and vigorous measures will be adopted for the total separation of church and state, and the complete secularization of the government in all its departments and institutions, thus securing to every citizen the full enjoyment of his opinions on religion, whatever they may be, without molestation, disability, or deprivation of any civil or political right.

The Convention at Albany will be addressed by the ablest and most distinguished Freethinkers and Reformers in the country, by those who hav already won brilliant distinction in politics, in literature, and upon the platform. Among those who will be present are the following:

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, well known for her years of faithful service in behalf of woman's emancipation. Her reputation is world-wide for eloquence, earnest purpose, and unflinching courage. She is foremost among the reformers of the age. She will speak on "Religious Liberty for Woman."

JAMES PARTON, the famous biographer, whose books hav delighted thousands of readers. His "Life of Voltaire" is one of the most remarkable literary productions of the time. Mr. Parton has enormous industry and artistic skill, and no author has a greater facility in weaving a multitude of facts into a harmonious revealing of character. His subject will be "Victor Hugo," and we may expect a rare discourse on this phenomenal genius, the greatest literary power, perhaps, of the last half of the nineteenth century.

COURTLANDT PALMER, president of the Nineteenth Century Club, one of the brightest and most famous clubs in the world, unique in character. Its success has been quite extraordinary, and scholars, thinkers, poets, clergymen of all denominations, and representativs of all religions hav met in its parlors, and exchanged the utmost diversities of thought with frank and manly sympathy. Mr. Palmer, though born of wealth, is preeminently a man of the people, and in various ways his philanthropic and reform efforts hav borne much fruit in his own home, the city of New York, and throughout the country. His subject will be "The Aristocracy of Freethought."

T. B. WAKEMAN, of the New York bar, formerly president of the National Liberal League, and now president of the Manhattan Club, whose weekly meetings in New York hav been the source of most important educational and reform influences. Mr. Wakeman is the author of various publications which hav attracted wide attention. His interpretations of Goethe and Comte are of especial value, and demonstrate the author to be one of the deepest religious thinkers of the day. Mr. Wakeman was educated for the Presbyterian ministry, and graduated from Princeton College, but his intellectual conviction forbade the adoption of the clerical profession. His subject will be "The Outlook of Liberalism."

CHARLES WATTS, of London, England, formerly editor of London Secular Review, and one of the most famous debaters among the English Liberals. He has held over fifty debates with the leading clergymen of England. He was for years a co-worker with Bradlaugh. He now purposes to make America his home and labor in the interest of the National Liberal League. He ranks next to Colonel Ingersoll as one of the best platform orators of the day. His subject will be "Our Policy: Destructiv and Constructiv."

HELEN H. GARDENER, who was introduced to the Liberal public by Colonel Ingersoll at Chickering Hall, New York, and whose subsequent efforts upon the platform hav met with unqualified success. Her forthcoming book of lectures is a brilliant exposition of the conviction to which all cultivated women are arriving, that the Bible and theology founded upon the Bible are opposed to the equality and freedom of women. As St. Paul puts it, man is the head of the woman, and this involves inevitable servitude for the latter. Helen Gardener expresses the indignation of woman at this lofty assumption. Her subject will be "Historical Facts and Theological Fictions," of which Colonel Ingersoll writes, "The clergy will not answer it, because they cannot."

MRS. MATTIE P. KREKEL, who for years has been an ardent and influential advocate of Freethought in the West, who has made a specialty of the legal and philosophical aspects of reform, and whose practical work in vindication of the rights of her sex has been of a most important character. Dignity, enthusiasm, and thoughtfulness are the characteristics of her platform oratory. Her subject will be "The Demands of Liberalism."

JUDGE ARNOLD KREKEL, of Missouri, of the United States Circuit Court, whose lectures and books upon law and constitutional history are among the most valuable additions to the legal and political literature of the times. Some of his rulings, based on natural justice rather than precedent, has given him a transatlantic reputation as a judge of exceptional sagacity.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT, over eighty years of age, one of the few remaining veterans of the great antislavery struggle, who was earliest in the combat and is still one of the most activ soldiers in the field. Foremost in the battle for political rights, he is foremost in the battle for intellectual freedom. His subject will be "The New Version."

And, to conclude and crown this array of Liberal talent,

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, the greatest living orator, the manifest genius of Freethought. The proper study of mankind is man, and of man in his essential being Ingersoll is one of the noblest revealers. His generosity makes him an iconoclast; his benevolence makes him an Infidel; his purity of feeling a skeptic. He is truly representativ of the mighty age in which we liv. He speaks its choicest hope; he voices its loftiest aspirations; he expresses its wisest judgment; he asserts its sublimity and joy.

With the unequaled wealth of intellectual and moral power to be gathered at this Convention, it promises to be of surpassing importance to the growth and organization of Freethought. Let the friends of liberty come to this splendid gathering to emphasize its demands for justice, its plea for human rights, its vindication of science, and its assertion of the dignity of man, the glory of his intelligence, and the worth of his labor.

HOTELS.

The Delavan will be the headquarters of the Convention. Terms, $3.00 per day single; $2.50 double. The Dunlop House, $1.50 single, $1.25 double. Those desiring board at $1.00 per day will please write to J. J. McCabe, 35 Van Woert street, Albany, N. Y.

RAILROADS.

As the state fair occurs at the same time, no doubt excursion tickets can be procured from all parts of the states and many points in New England. The Boston and Albany railroad makes the following rates: Boston, round trip, $6.80; Worcester, $5.35; Springfield, $3.75. The Delaware & Hudson Canal Company will sell return tickets at one-third of the regular rate to those who pay full fare in going to the Convention.

MUSIC.

The best music will be furnished for all sessions of the Convention by the most talented local organizations.

The following petition for the just rights of all citizens will be activly circulated and pressed upon the attention of the legislature during the coming winter:

To the Senate and Assembly of the state of New York:

The constitution of our state guarantees that "the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be allowed in this state to all mankind." The general principle of American government is equality of all men before the law. This, as your honorable body is aware, involves the principle, already acknowledged in theory, of the total separation of church and state. But church and state are now practically united by the following statutes:

1. The law exempting church property from taxation.

2. The laws appropriating money from the public treasury for the support of institutions founded and managed chiefly by sectarian denominations.

3. The law compelling the observance of Sunday as a religious holy day.

The undersigned, citizens of the state of New York, do therefore respectfully but earnestly petition your honorable body to repeal all the laws or parts of laws of this state which are violations of the above principles. Our reasons for asking this are:

1. The churches are voluntary associations properly to be supported by the voluntary contributions of their members. 2. The state is compulsory. Every citizen must pay taxes. And we submit that it is unjust to a large and growing body of voters to be compelled to pay for the support of churches which they cannot conscientiously attend; for the hire of ministers in our legislature and public institutions, in whose doctrins they are unable to believe; and to observe as holy a day to them no more sacred than any other. We also submit that the exemption of churches from taxation, the appropriation of money for the hire of ministers and the support of sectarian institutions, and the legal observance of Sunday as a holy day, are discriminations in favor of one form of religion, are abridgments of the free exercise of religious preferences, and are therefore unconstitutional.

Address all inquiries and communications to

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Chairman Executiv Committee,
33 Clinton Place, New York.

TO ALL LIBERAL FRIENDS.

As will be seen by the above, we hav just turned $800.00 for the Albany Convention toward the $1,000 which it is proposed to raise in order that all expenses may be guaranteed in advance. Let the following stirring letter from a generous Liberal influence others to do the same with like ardor, and, whether they come or not, help to make this Convention rich with instrumentalities for aggressiv action. If one has to stay at home let him not think he must do nothing. He can send a golden messenger of hope:

"DOYLESTOWN, PA., Aug. 22, 1885.

"FRIEND PUTNAM: Inclosed find $5, to assist in defraying expenses of the coming Convention at Albany. You will, no doubt, hav a grand meeting, which ought to giv the Secular movement a good send-off, in your state, at least. Should like to be with you, but will hav to be among the stay-at-homes this time. Yours, etc., FRANK HART."

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG will giv a course of lectures in Waterloo, N. Y., the home of Rev. Father Lambert, in September.

E. C. WALKER lectured at Alexandria, Minn., Aug. 8th; at Willmar, Minn., Aug. 14th and 16th, afternoon and evening. For the remainder of August and for September he is desirous of engagements in Minnesota and Iowa, and during October wishes to work in Wisconsin and Illinois. Address him at Minneapolis, Minn., during August, and until September 15th.

THE Wisconsin State Association of Spiritualists will hold its First Annual Meeting in Spiritualist Hall, Omro, on Sept. 11, 12, and 13, 1885. Speakers: Jay Chaapell, of Rochester, N. Y., Mattie E. Hull, of Maquoketa, Iowa. Mrs. Isa Wilson Porter, of Chicago, will giv two public seances. Mrs. L. M. Spencer, of Milwaukee, and Mrs. A. B. Severance, of Whitewater, will be present and giv sittings. A. F. Ackerly, the materializing and slate-test medium, is expected. The Cross Concert Troupe will furnish the music. In going to the meeting pay full fare on all railroads, and you will be returned for one-fifth fare. Officers will be elected for ensuing year. Hotel rates one dollar per day. The meeting will be called to order on Friday, at 10 A.M. sharp.

The Tent.

CARBON, IND., Aug, 16th.—The wild threats, caused by the wilder ravings of the Rev. Oliver, resulted in wonderful increase of interest and attendance at Henderson, Mich. Monday and Tuesday evenings, the last nights of our stay, we had larger attendance than at any other time or place.

Thanks to D. A. Blodgett, of Grand Rapids; M. P. Thurston, of Burr Oak; M. Babcock, of St. John, and other kind friends who accompanied their words of cheer and sympathy with supplies of small tracts and copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for gratuitous distribution, we were enabled to respond to the great demand, and an immense quantity of our very best Liberal literature was circulated among those desiring to investigate, who would not alone read and talk about what they read, but loan it to others. For a circle of eight miles from our Tent there are few houses but some one of the family carries round leaflet, pamphlet, or copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Among the many additions to the ranks of Secularism—all of whom we welcome with gladness—we take especial pleasure in introducing to the TRUTH SEEKER family Mr. J. B. Barker, a most intelligent, practical man, and successful farmer, universally respected; a man of brains, means, and influence. He came boldly to the front, and gave us most efficient aid, joining in the labors of those true, brave, genuin Liberals, Wm. Kohlmeyer and LeRoy Cushing, who spared no effort, but worked night and day to advance the cause, and insure our success. They did the work, met every expense, paid our board bill at the hotel, and raised for us twenty dollars, and handed it to us as we parted with them. They are not able financially, but hard workers with large families dependent on them, yet by their self-sacrifice they made everything free.

The orthodox are staggered; they rack what brains they hav in vain endeavor to comprehend how we can carry round our beautiful Tent and easy chairs, distribute such large amounts of valuable Liberal literature, make no charge of admission, and yet take up no collection. No begging, no appeals for money. They decide either that we are immensely wealthy, or we are paid enormous salaries by a very wealthy society. Tilney says the only bad thing about that is that it is not true.

We left many warm friends in Henderson, some of whom we hope to meet at the National Liberal League Congress at Cleveland, Ohio, in October.

Wednesday, Aug. 11th, we shipped the Tent for Carbon, Ind., and bade farewell to Michigan; stopped en route at Owosso just long enough to shake the hand of our genial friend Geo. Bedford, who proved to us a friend in need, and loaned us $10 to help pay expenses to Carbon. We paid freight of Tent to Indianapolis in advance, $13.60, tickets to Carbon, $21.38, which, with expenses on road and having to stay over night at Indianapolis, made cost of getting here over $48, and $6.40 yet to pay, freight from Indianapolis to Carbon.

We advertised to commence lectures here on Saturday evening, August 15th, but the Tent did not arrive. We telegraphed to freight agents and railroad superintendents. Saturday afternoon, no Tent. Mr. White, agent here, used every possible effort to expedite its arrival.

No hope of Tent; so with the aid of the energetic and zealous Wm. Oldham and friends we selected a grove near where the Tent is to be pitched; erected platform; arranged seats for about two hundred; borrowed a number of large, brilliant street lamps, and held an out-door meeting. Every seat was full—half as many more standing.

Our book-trunk is with the Tent. We had with us about one hundred leaflets, a portion of friend M. P. Thurston's package of TRUTH SEEKERS. Then the ever-thoughtful and most devoted friend of the Tent enterprise, Mr. C. P. Somerby, business manager of THE TRUTH SEEKER, had, with his usual care and forethought, sent us fifty copies in advance of regular issue, so we were able in part to meet the eager demand for Liberal literature.

We held meeting again Sunday at 3 o'clock, and again at 7:30, with very large attendance and good interest; but the cold and heavy dew rather dampens and chills the enthusiasm. We felt the need of our Tent very much; but being advertised, and having come so far, we were not to be defeated by such a little difficulty as a miserable, dilatory railroad failing to bring our things, so we delivered our lectures in open air, and shall continue to do so till the Tent arrives.

We go from here to Logansport, which will be our last stand before going to Albany. We shall ship the Tent from Logansport to Knightstown, and commence lectures there on our return from Albany; thence to Alliance, Ohio, during the last week in September, and hope to arrange to go to Cleveland the first week in October, and hold on till the Congress meets —October 9th. The cold weather will then compel us to fold our Tent till next season. CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

The Curse of Ireland.

A county Cork Irishman, who says that he is neither Protestant nor Orange, writes to the papers expressing the opinion that "what the youth of Ireland need more than anything else under heaven is the common school of New England." He is opposed to schools conducted on a theological basis, and observes that "wherever, the wide world over, we see the youth of a country dependent on the clergy or on semi-clerical agents for its chief education, we see stagnation, if not retrogression, in everything that makes a people great and free." This Irishman is perfectly right. If the youth of a country are to be imbued with a sentiment of democratic equality, a love of liberty, and a sound sense of justice, keep them out from under the influence of the priests and parsons. These fellows are the greatest corruptors of youth in the world. They poison the minds of children, and set before them ideals which are debasing. Make theologians mind their own business, if they hav any. Religion of the papal Christian sort is the curse of Ireland.—Winsted Press.

Concerning the Definition of "Infidel."

Until I renounced orthodoxy, all my relativs held me in the highest estimation; but since I stopped offering petitions to the Christian's God and discontinued my loyalty to the church, they can scarcely show me even neighborly respect. I went recently to visit an orthodox sister, who has always (hitherto) thought that whatever I said or did was about as near right as the actions and course of conduct of mortals could be! Hear her lamentations: "O my dear brother. I don't know whether to shake hands with you or not, and to welcome you. I hav been so distressed for you for a long time that I could not sleep. I must say that I am not only shocked, but deeply, grieved to hear that you hav renounced everything that is good and are just ready to lie down in the grave as a lost sinner, without hope and without a savior! Oh, what would our sainted mother say [as my sister cried and sobbed like a child] if she knew that you had given up all religion?" "Don't judge me too hastily, sister," said I. "I hav not given up my religion." "But you hav given up the Bible! What is that but renouncing religion? I can hardly speak peaceably to you when I think what you hav been and what you hav come to! Why, I meet good people who once loved and honored you, who say, 'How astonishing it is that your brother has got to be an Infidel!'" "Sister," said I, smilingly, "do you know what an Infidel is?" "Yes, I guess I do. I think we hav heard enough about Infidels to know what Infidel means." "Tell me, then, what are your ideas as to the character of an Infidel?" "Well, I don't know as I can giv a dictionary definition, but we all know that an Infidel is the meanest and most contemptible rascal in the world. He is a man that you can't trust your money nor your life with. Everybody is afraid of him. An Infidel is a man that—well, as Shakspere says—'He is fit only for treason, stratagem, and spoils.' If he is not a real murderer, he has murder in his heart, and would kill his best friend for a few dollars, and——" "Ah!" I interrupted; "that is why all my relativs are so much afraid of me, is it? They are afraid I will murder them, and get their money? That is a very correct Presbyterian definition of an Infidel. Now, let us see what science has to say about an Infidel. The correct definition, in the Anglo-Saxon language, is simply an unbeliever in the divine authenticity of the Bible. It is said that the Mohammedans call all Christians Infidels, because they will not believe the Koran, or the Mohammedan's Bible." "Well, the old Mohammedans needn't call us Infidels," said she, "for we are not." "Christians are Infidels," I said, "in the estimation of those people, simply because they do not believe the Koran. Are you not aware," said I, "that the Chinese call Christians heathen?" "Well, we're not heathen. They are the heathen," said she. "Now just refer to Dr. Webster. I think you are not aware what he says about heathen." She reads, as follows: "In the scriptures the word seems to comprehend all nations but the Jews and Israelites." "Well, I never knew that before," said she; "I shall hav to correct my notions in regard to Infidel and heathen."

"Sister," said I, "did you ever think that I feel as deeply grieved for yourself and other relativs as they do for me?" "Why, no! that can't be; for you are in darkness, while we hav the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Are we to renounce our Bible and all the good instruction we hav received from it? Why, it seems like a sailor on the ocean casting away chart, compass, and anchor when he is out of sight of land. Now, I would like to know why you hav renounced the Bible?" "I hav not. I think that the Bible is full of excellent instruction." "You once believed that God came down from heaven and dictated what is written, and holy men of old wrote it down; now I would like to know why you don't believe the same great truth today," said she. "My sister, when a man makes a statement, is it always truth?" "No, I am certain that there are a great many statements in the world that are absolutely false." "We were taught," I remarked, "to believe that the God who wrote this Bible is a perfect being." "Yes," said she, "perfect and holy in all his works and ways." "Very good. You and I think very much alike, after all. Now, then, if a perfect and holy God were to write a book in which he were to giv a revelation of his holy will to man, hav we not a right to conclude that it would be a book above criticism by finite mortals? Would such a book be full of contradictions, impossibilities, palpable absurdities, unphilosophical statements, false teaching, and requirements which it is not possible for mortal man to obey?" "I would like to know," said she, "what there is unphilosophical about the Bible? I had always supposed that every statement in it was the pure truth, and strictly philosophical. Now, I want to ask you if you do not believe that God employed good men to write the Bible?" "No. Such teaching is all sacerdotal nonsense. The power or the being we call God had no more to do with writing the Bible than he had in editing Webster's dictionary." "Then," said she, "you don't believe the account of creation given by Moses in the Old Testament?" "I believe such an account was written; but no respectable geologist who has only a smattering of geological science will accept that account as scientifically and philosophically correct." "Oh, pshaw on your science and philosophy!" she replied. "The Bible is a true guide. If science don't agree with it, then I say science is wrong."

"Sister, what do you understand by science and philosophy?"

"Why, I don't know as I can explain it correctly, but I suppose it consists of a correct knowledge of certain facts, or the understanding of certain phenomena in the natural world. I suppose that the science of geology embraces a knowledge of the structure of the earth. Is that the reason why you renounced the Bible?" "Sister, I hav not renounced the Bible." "Well, if you do not believe in its divine authenticity, what do you think about it?" "Well," said I, "like all the great thinkers of the present age, and like all the profound philosophers of ages upon æons ago, and like most of the orthodox clergy of the present day, I believe, with them, that the Bible is simply an allegory." "Don't you believe," said she, "that the world was created in six days?" "No; and there is not a man in the country, who has ever paid any attention to the science of geology, who will accept, for a moment, such a ridiculous statement." "Well, if I had any such belief," said she, "I would keep it to myself. It is a great injury to you, and to us all, to let it get out that you don't believe the Bible." "Then you would hav me act the part of a hypocrit, would you, by living in such a manner that people would think I believe the Bible to be divinely inspired, when it is nothing but the writings of common men? There is too much of that sort of living both among the clergy and laity. I believe in showing the colors under which one sails. Throw open the books, I say, and let the world read your record. Oh, how I do wish my brothers and sisters would step beyond the pale of orthodoxy, and read scientific works! So long as I was kept within the pale of the church, I thought that the Bible and orthodox literature embraced all there ever was, or ever could be, in the world. But as soon as I cast off that tyrannical yoke of priestcraft, light broke in upon my vision, and I was amazed to contemplate the vast and boundless fields of scientific thought and investigation that lay open before me." "But, brother, allow me to ask, in sisterly gentleness, will that save your soul in the great day of final account?" "Save my soul! As you employ that language with such familiarity, you ought to understand what it signifies. What do you know about the soul, anyway?" "I know," said she, "it is my immortal part."

"Do you recollect good old Deacon Waters?" I inquired. "Yes, I remember him well," she replied. "Well, after a long life of studying and preaching, he came to my Bible class one Sunday—an old man, nearly four score years of age—lively and sparkling with wisdom, and said to me: 'I want to come into your class as a pupil.' 'Pray, do not ridicule me,' I replied. 'Come and be my teacher, and I will be your pupil,' I said. He took a seat in my class and said: 'I am an old man. I hav one foot in the grave, and one on the green grass, where I stand shivering on the brink. I want to ask just one question, as an honest inquirer after truth, which I want you to answer. Tell me,' said he, looking up to me as if his everlasting destiny hung on the answer, 'what the soul is, for I don't know! I thought I knew. I hav preached a great many years about the salvation of precious souls. Now, tell me what the soul is, so that I may put my finger on it. I hav read,' said he, 'all the writings of great men, and not one of them has been able to tell me what my soul is.'

"Our father," said I to my sister, "who, you know, was a man of earnest prayer and a firm believer in all the doctrins of the Bible, said to me, a few years before his death: 'We hav been taught that we hav souls to save or to be lost. I hav always believed, as the ministers told me, that I hav a soul. But I don't know anything about it. I wish you knew enough to tell me. The future looks dark.' The greatest thinkers and most profound reasoners of the present age keep it to themselvs (as you suggest) except when, together in private, they disclose their real convictions or opinions. They hav no positiv knowledge about the soul, except that it is a function of matter. Tell me, sister, what you know about the soul. If you were brought up as a witness before a court, and required to giv testimony concerning your positiv knowledge of the soul, of God, of heaven, of hell, of a future state of existence, tell me, now, what would you say?" "Why, I would state most emphatically what the Bible says about the soul and what the belief of the church is, and what great and renowned men hav written on the subject." "Ah! that would never be accepted in a court. The judge would say, in a very decided manner: 'Tell the court what you know positivly, and not what some one else pretended to know. Now, what do you know about the soul?'" "Well, I must confess that I hav no positiv knowledge concerning the soul." "What do you know about God?" "Why, I know he made me, and sustains my life, and givs me all the comforts of life." "How do you know that? How do you know whether God made you, or the devil made you, or whether you came from some other source? Don't the Bible declare that no man has ever seen God?" "Yes, it does." "Then in another place doesn't it state that Moses saw God's back parts?" "Oh, I can't explain," said she, "any of these questions. If you require me to state what I know, I must admit at once that I don't know anything," said she. "Why, sister," I remarked, with affected surprise, "You are a real Agnostic. That is as bad as to be an Infidel. An Agnostic is one who don't know whether he has any soul or not; don't know anything about God, the devil, heaven, or hell." "But I do know there is a God, for I hav prayed to him; and he answered my prayer. That I know," said she. "Well, sister, that is just what I want you to tell me all about. You know that I commenced praying to God when I was a little boy." "Yes," she interrupted, "and I felt shocked, and grieved, and sorrowful, and I can't tell you how I did feel, when I learned that you had stopped praying." "Well, my case is like this. If you were poor and needy and wanted food and clothing and you had been told that a wealthy neighbor had an abundance of everything that you needed, and he would giv you all you wanted if you would go and ask for it, and you had gone to him every day for fifty years and asked him in a respectful manner for food and the comforts of life, and you had never received any indication that he ever heard a single request of yours, would you not giv up asking? Now, I look back through my whole life, over a period of over fifty years, when I prayed earnestly not less than twice every day, and I cannot recall a single instance when I received any of the blessings and comforts of life which would not hav been received, all the same, if I had not prayed. Now, tell me when your petitions were answered."

"Well," said she, "I don't think of any particular instance just now. But I know I hav prayed a great many times for this and that, and I got it." "Suppose you had not prayed. Would you not hav been the recipient of the same thing?" "Well, I don't know about that?" "There you are again," I replied, "an out and out Agnostic." "Well," said she, "there is one thing we do know. Good old Job wrote: 'I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand on the earth, in the latter day; and though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh I shall see God.' Now, is not that position positiv and direct?" she inquired.

"Well, I replied, "in the first place no two expositors of the Bible agree as to the meaning of 'my redeemer living,' and, in the next place, even the most zealous leaders and theologians in the Christian church agree that the book of Job is simply a novel, a story, or allegory. More than thirty years ago, in conversation with a student in theology there at that time, he told me how shocked he was at the irreverent suggestion of the oldest professor in the theological department of the seminary, 'that there never was any such character as Job!' The book, he said, was simply a fable, similar to Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress.' If we admit that the book of Job is divinely inspired, and we read it, and understand it according to the language, we do not get any positiv knowledge of God, or heaven, hell, or a future state."

"Well," sighed my sister, "We are poor ignorant mortals. We don't know much, after all. One expositor of the Bible affirms that a certain word has such a meaning, while another professor, who knows more than the other, states that such is not the proper meaning at all. I sometimes think there don't any of us know anything about God or anything else."

"Why, sister," I replied, facetiously, "I am almost amazed at such an acknowledgment! Why, that is downright Agnosticism, and Agnosticism is the very essence of Infidelity!" "Well, well," she said, "I don't know what to think. But I want to ask you how you can reconcile all your former life, your profession of religion, and your positiv declarations concerning God and the hereafter, with your present belief?"

"Well, to be brief, I must say that I never had any belief about those things. I entertained certain opinions, such as are promulgated at the present time in the church. But as soon as I found out that I had been wofully deceived, I gave up those opinions. I searched the Bible through and through for one positiv idea on which I could predicate a belief concerning the creation of the world and a future life, but I could find nothing reliable. As soon as I renounced the contemptible priesthood, and commenced reading the writings of great men outside the pale of the church, I saw that I was deceived. Then, as soon as I perceived that I was embracing error and delusions, the most absurd superstitions, and downright falsehoods, I turned right about in my course of life. Now I am in the light. Everything is clear to me. I see in the universe all that any other mortal being ever perceived—namely, the operation of material things and force. Our bodies are formed by matter out of the dust of the earth and force. When that force ceases to operate, our bodies return to dust. That is all any mortal can make out of life, and all that the wisest savants that ever lived hav ever been able to discover." "Brother," said she, "let us waive further consideration of this subject until after dinner." S. E. T.

The Decay of Ecclesiasticism.

Extracts from an article by R. Heber Newton in the North American Review.

The political and social revolution that has been progressing through Western civilization is sweeping away caste and privilege. The divine right of priests is following the divine right of kings to the lumber-loft of superstitions. A king may indeed well hav a divine right to rule a society, as a priest to guide men's souls, but in each case that right divine is now seen to lie in his personality, and not in his office—in the man, and not in his clothes. The industrial revolution is accelerating this decay of ecclesiasticism. When labor had no voice in the voting of supplies, the budget of a priesthood might pass unchallenged. As the serf becomes the freeman, economically, the good Jew of whom Boccaccio tells could no longer thus report of the sacred city: "He saw all men so covetous and greedy of coin that everything was bought and sold for ready money. And more brokers were there to be found than in Paris, attending upon all trades of manifest simony."

The gold of honest toil will do something better than buy masses for the dead, and build jeweled shrines for sacred dolls, and salary a primate of England with the income of nearly four hundred workingmen.

The opening of new spheres for human activity drains off the energies that formerly went to the building up of ecclesiasticism. Gossip prevails at "tea-fights" in a back-country village until the railroad connects it with the great world and women learn to survey larger grounds than their neighbors' backyards. While the church was the chief political institution, its offices the highest spoils of placemen, its dogmas the only knowledge open to the intellect, its vast and venerable life the one current upon which men could throw themselvs to be borne out beyond the stagnating shallows of the earth, ecclesiasticism naturally flourished. Its decay began in Western civilization when Gutenberg drew the first sheets from his rude block-type, when the guilds of the free towns of Germany came into civic power, when the Vittoria sailed proudly into port from her three-and-a-half years' cruise around the globe, when Galileo affirmed "e pour si mouve," and opened a new universe upon the human mind. That decay has progressed as the forces that once fed the imposing body of Catholicism hav been drawn off into public affairs, industry, the sciences, the arts, and the varied spheres of our now rich human life.

The growth of knowledge has intensified the decay of ecclesiasticism. Ignorance creates the climate in which this ism flourishes. In every land the oxygenating of the mental atmosphere with knowledge has caused a rapid shrinkage in its portly priesthood. The temple has crumbled as the free school has risen. The priest has lost his grip of the lad that held a primer in his hand. Rome's instinct has proven true. Her one deadly foe is science. Each new bit of knowledge now makes man more independent of the tutor that dealt with him as with a babe. Every error proven upon the infallible dry-nurse has weakened her authority over him, and Reason gains his fuller trust with each new victory to which she leads him. No man can be an unquestioning child of the church who once finds out for himself any knowledge, and discerns in it a segment of the universal law that is sweeping through nature. Henceforth he will bother his priest with troublesome questions, will insist on testing that which he is bidden receive in faith, and will find himself growing daily further off from his spiritual pedagog.

The supreme folly of every ecclesiasticism is to cherish the disease of omniscience. Attempting to speak oracularly upon all mysteries, it has spread the legs of the cathedra out over the whole globe, and thus it has come to pass that no discovery can be made without undermining some prop of an infallible church. Astronomy, geology, anthropology, history, criticism, all, in affirming their several truths, hav denied, of necessity, some error of the church, which knew everything in the heavens above, and the earth beneath, and the waters under the earth. In particular, the spread of knowledge has taught man the origin, and history, and nature of ecclesiastical institutions themselvs, in such a manner as renders it impossible for most educated people longer to regard them with the superstitious awe that is essential to a priesthood's continued power? What a silent revolution such a book as Dean Stanley's "Christian Institutions" must work in the mind of the average churchman, who is open to light, and has hitherto regarded surplice, and crosier, and baptismal font, with their kindred symbols, as the sacred mysteries of a supernatural priesthood, to be discussed with bated breath! Yet this book of the brave dean is but mildly iconoclastic in comparison with the revelations made to the good churchman in other modern works. There is, in fact, as we now see, nothing in the externals of the Christian church that is not a survival from the churches of paganism. Tonsured head and silvery bells and swinging censer, Christmas and Easter festivals, holy Madonna with her child, the sacramental use of water, and bread, and wine, the very sign of the cross—all are ancient human institutions, rights, and symbols. Scratch a Christian, and you come upon a pagan. Christianity is a re-baptized paganism.

A priesthood not only overtrains conscience, it mistrains it. It corrupts its simplicity, emasculates its energy, perverts its action. Staying away from confession, breaking the Sabbath, failing in due masses for the dead—these become the sins most dwelt upon. The Italian brigand rises from his knees beyond the madonna to plunge his stiletto gaily in the heart of the belated traveler. Clarendon tells us that when Charles II. was in Scotland, "the clergy reprehended him very sharply if he smiled on these days" (Sunday). Fancy good parsons rebuking that royal rake for smiling on Sundays! Ordinary offenses against the common law of morality can be atoned for in current coin, and crimes are scaled in the indulgence-market in thalers and groschen, Tetzel's table giving the exact pecuniary equivalent of a murder or a rape. Thus the church opens "the kingdom of heaven to all" cash-payers. The legend over a Quebec convent runs thus: "Alms will save your soul." It is said that after a late South American "unpleasantness" there were found on the bodies of some of the dead passports signed by the bishop of the diocese, and addressed to St. Peter, directing him to "admit the bearer as a true son of the church." The most cruel customs, the most tyrannous laws, the most beastly usages, hav existed undisturbed beneath the eyes of a fat and flourishing priesthood. The church that had a ritual of exorcism for poor old witches had no "use" for the dispossession of the infamous jus primæ noctis, that well-nigh inconceivable privilege of power which was once a recognized feature of the marriage ceremony in certain parts of Christendom. Ecclesiastics hav drawn the sacred sign of the cross upon the sword, the gibbet, and the yoke; hav countersigned with the approval of heaven the impoverishing taille, and hav baptized the Virgin whose steely arms opened in the embrace of death.

The influence of ecclesiasticism in the sphere of thought has been quite as mischievous as in the realm of action. It has assumed the function of the intellectual teacher of man, without the equipment of the scholar or the resources of the genius. It has fostered that worst of monopolies, an esoteric doctrin, for the initiate, which left the people to the follies of exoteric dogma. It has claimed for its deliverances an authority other than that of the self-evidencing truthfulness of the tenets taught, clothing its oracles with the awful majesty of a supernatural revelation, and announcing the majority vote of its councils as with the very voice of the Holy Ghost. It has arrogated to its pronouncements the infallibility of the eternal himself, and has treated suspicion thereof as a case for the Holy Inquisition. It has denied to the human reason its natural right of free inquiry and of honest thought, and has chained the mind in the most degrading of slaveries. It has arrested the progress of the intellect in the Western world for centuries. In lieu of the calm tolerance of opinion in imperial Rome, it has introduced a savage strife worse than that of arms, in which a difference of an iota in a description of the person of Jesus set bishops belaboring each other with "apostolic blows and knocks," and the shame of lectures upon the philosophy of Greece was zealously expiated by the pious monks of Alexandria; "Cyril's dogs" hounding down a Hypatia, and scraping her flesh from her bones with the shells of the Mediterranean strand. As early as the age of the Clementine Homilies, we find this warning: "Wherefore, above all, remember to shun apostle or teacher or prophet who does not first accurately compare his preaching with [that of] James." As late as the days of the evangelic Rutherford, we hear the old warning repeated: "If ye depart from what I taught you in a hair-breadth, . . . take heaven and earth to witness that ill shall come upon you in end." What he taught, how well do many of us remember, from the time when we tried to feed on him, and thought ourselvs carnal because we could not relish the diet!

He that levels his lance against ecclesiasticism is not as yet attacking a corpse. This world-old tyrant does not die with such happy dispatch as to make it superfluous to let a little blood occasionally. Giant Pope is old and toothless, but he sits before his den with the same unregenerate heart as of old; cunning where he used to be brutal, holding hosts still under the spell woven in his more masterful days. When last he seated himself in his cathedra to declare the oracles of God, these were the gracious words at which men wondered:

> Let him be anathema . . . who shall say that human sciences ought to be pursued in such a spirit of freedom that one may be allowed to hold as true their assertions, even when opposed to revealed doctrin; . . . who shall say that it may at any time come to pass, in the progress of science, that the doctrins set forth by the church must be taken in another sense than that in which the church has ever received and yet receives them.

A Letter from An Old-timer.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Dear Sir: Some months ago I received a copy of your excellent paper, full of interest to every friend of Freethought. I was especially delighted to read of the formation of the American Secular Union, which may exercise great and permanent influence over the progressiv movements of the present day. One thing you may count upon—an organized force in the moral world will giv much trouble to tyrants and priests; and it is essential to the freedom of individual men. I was engaged in England thirty years ago in helping to establish similar associations. Knowing their value, I wish to applaud your effort and assure you of its inestimable importance. Branches being established in various large centers, they will influence the growth of advanced ideas and prevent the manifestation of the persecuting spirit in its old unblushing fashion, if they do not exterminate it. One cannot help lamenting sometimes how slowly the world learns the lesson of religious freedom. It would be a source of great grief to see your new and great country fall into the iniquitous practices of our old one, and your Secular Union should secure your intellectual emancipation by uttering a timely warning. Your great battle will be with the Roman church, the last enemy to be destroyed. Given slavery and freedom, the Secular Union must in the nature of things win the fight, and triumph over the foes of enlightened progress.

I am pleased to see you hav my old friend Mr. Watts with you. His vast experience in connection with the practical working of our Secular associations in England specially qualifies him to act as your guide, philosopher, and friend. On my nomination he was appointed as our first authorized special lecturer. His genial disposition, perpetual good temper, and inexhaustible patience and industry render him a power to draw men together, and to work with them and for them, without assuming to be over them. After twenty years of activ organizing work here, he is just such an embassador as I should send you if you asked for one. Concerted action implies generous co-operation and the subjection of individual self-assertion to the common good. The best men will come to the top if every man seeks to do what he is best fitted for. You will find Mr. Watts is no featherbed soldier, but bold and fearless; if you send him to the front in defense of the cause, you need hav no anxiety as to its safety. After many years of Freethought advocacy, I naturally feel deeply interested in your new venture, and trust a cordial sympathy will grow up among your members, and that they will think mainly of the welfare of the Union, and the success that attends united effort.

Yours fraternally, Charles C. Cattell.

Not a Question of Preference.

Our good friend, C. R. Tewksbury, said some weeks ago that he had no quarrel with those "preferring to believe that death ends all," or words to that effect. It seems to me that too many Liberals are prone to lose sight of the all-important fact that it is not a question of preference, that each one of us believes as he has to believe, not as he chooses to believe, for he has no choice whatever, in the sense of choosing to believe that which does not appeal to his intellect as being true; he has no ability to choose against evidence.

A man hears of a railway accident involving the loss of several lives, and in the list of dead or wounded he reads the name of his child. All the circumstances lead him to believe that the report is correct, and he believes that it is, though it is farthest from his desire that it should be true.

Sometimes the desire may harmonize with the belief, and it may lead the individual to giv too ready credence to that which seems to confirm this pleasing belief, yet the evidence must be sufficient to convince the intellect of the truth of the theory or statement in support of which it is adduced or appears, else there is no belief, can be no belief. The Spiritualist is a Spiritualist because the evidence in support of that theory or fact has proven it to his mind, and the Materialist is a Materialist because he has not found the evidence necessary to convince him of the truth of this theory or of the existence of this fact.

This is the reason why Mr. Tewksbury is a Spiritualist, and why I am a Materialist. To speak of it as being in either case a "preference" is a very loose way of talking. Edwin C. Walker.

The Pre-Christian Christ.—Long before the Christian era Christs and Antichrists existed in name. In the Septuagint, translated 384–247 B.C., which was in common, if not almost exclusiv, use among the Jews two centuries before and three centuries after the Christian era, and was the only version known to the Fathers, the frequent word Messiah is translated Christos. Ancient false prophets warned their followers against other false prophets, and false Christs foretold other false Christs.—Antichrist.

The Freedom of Worship Bill.

For the last five years the Catholics of New York hav been before the legislature of this state with a so-called "Freedom of Worship" bill. Their ill-success for four years did not deter them from presenting it the fifth, and five failures will not discourage a sixth attempt next winter. Activ opposition and a general discussion of the subject are necessary as safeguards against the designs of the Catholic church, unless we would see another step taken in its encroachment upon republican liberties. The title and demands of this bill are as follows:

"An Act to provide for the better security of the freedom of religious worship in certain institutions.

"The people of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

"SECTION 1. All persons, including those who may hav been, or may hereafter be, committed or taken charge of by any of the institutions mentioned in this act, are hereby declared to be, and are, entitled to the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference.

"SEC. 2. This act shall be deemed to apply to every incorporated or unincorporated society for the reformation of its inmates, House of Refuge, Protectory, or other Reformatory or Penal Institution continuing to receive for its use either public moneys or a per capita sum from any municipality for the support of the inmates.

"SEC. 3. The rules and regulations established by the government of the institutions mentioned in this act shall recognize the right of the inmates to the free exercise of their religious belief, and to worship God according to the dictates of their consciences, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, and shall allow and provide for holding religious instruction and for private ministration to the inmates in such manner as may best carry into effect the spirit and intent of this Act, and be consistent with the proper disciplin and management of the institution; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize any additional expenditure on the part of the state; and the inmates of such institutions shall be allowed spiritual advice and spiritual ministration from some recognized clergyman of the denomination or church which said inmates may respectivly prefer, or to which they may hav belonged prior to their being confined in such institutions; such advice and ministration to be given within the buildings where the inmates are required by law to be confined, in such manner and at such hour as will be in harmony, as aforesaid, with the disciplin of the institution, and secure to such inmates the free exercise of their religious beliefs in accordance with the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 4. It shall not be lawful to compel any of such inmates to attend any religious exercise not conducted by a clergyman of the denomination to which such inmates may belong, or may hav belonged at the time of their reception; and in all matters pertaining to religion the rights of conscience of such inmates, and the free exercise thereof, shall be carefully respected.

"SEC. 5. The wilful violation of any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed a misdemeanor.

"SEC. 6. This act shall take effect immediately."

The first question that will be raised by Section 1 of this bill is whether a person whose conduct has made it necessary to the welfare of the community for him to be imprisoned, retains all the rights of the law-abiding citizen. Having forfeited his right to personal liberty by an abuse of it, can he still demand the right to worship, with all the paraphernalia necessary thereto, according to his own notions? That is a matter for a state to settle, but it would be better if the Catholic citizen who desires to conduct his devotional exercises without let or hindrance would so frame his course of conduct as to remain outside of the jail.

The provision in Section 3 that "nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize any additional expense on the part of the state," is a clause which makes the bill look innocent, but it is one which, when the bill shall hav been passed, it will be the first object of the Catholics to expunge. It is inconsistent with the rest of the bill and with the whole genius of religious institutions. Like Protestant ministers, with few exceptions, the Catholic priests, with still fewer exceptions, conduct religious worship for revenue only. Besides, if the clergymen who visit and teach their superstitions to the wards of the state are really doing the state a service, the state can afford to pay them for it, as it pays its prison officials. The state should not let its servants go unrewarded, and it is safe to prophesy that, following the passage of the bill under discussion, the Catholic church will not fail to present the matter to our legislators in that light.

The case stands like this: If the inmate of a prison is not a Catholic, the provisions of the bill will not place him under the ministration of the Catholic priest, and the priest has no right to demand his attention; and if he be a Catholic previously to entering the prison, why follow him there with the same teachings and religion under whose influence he committed the crime? Why continue a course that has resulted so disastrously? When a Catholic devotee enters a prison convicted of a felony, he is a living proof of the futility of Catholicism, in his case at least, as a moralizing agent. Then, if ever, it should be apparent that he needs a change.

There is but one way for the Catholic priests to lawfully secure the attendance of their congregations upon their religious worship. Let them cease attempting to spread their superstition, and devote their whole energies to keeping out of prison those who already accept their doctrin. A religion should not be too protuberant which must find access to so large a number of its adherents by knocking at the doors of a penitentiary.

Significant Statistics.

The Rev. Mr. Buckley, D.D., has been figuring on the young criminals in the Elmira Reformatory. He finds, among other interesting facts, that the 9,459 lawyers of this state hav furnished but six children as inmates for that institution; the 6,701 clergymen hav furnished four; while the physicians and surgeons, numbering 9,272, are responsible for eighteen. This puts lawyers and ministers on a par as producers of criminals, while the medical fraternity is three times as prolific of that class. "What," he inquires, "hav our medical friends to say to this?" The answer will probably be that the ministers and lawyers had better luck than the doctors in getting their boys out of the meshes of the law on the "respectable connections" plea.

Speaking of statistics, we published not long ago figures from the reports of prisons in seven states and Canada. In these prisons there were confined 44,034 persons, 41,337 of whom professed Christianity, and only one was an avowed Infidel. What hav our religious frfends to say to this?

What Secures Salvation?

When General Grant had recovered from what was thought at the time to be a fatal collapse, last April, Dr. Newman says he asked the general, "What was the supreme thought in your mind when eternity seemed so near?" The answer was this: "The comfort of the consciousness that I had tried to liv a good and honorable life." It appears that the general, in his ignorance of the real doctrins of the religion which he professed, believed there was salvation in good intentions. He made a great mistake. The New York Independent (orthodox Congregational) points out the futility of that idea. It says:

"The honest effort 'to liv a good and honorable life' may well be a source of comfort at any time, and especially so in the hour and article of death; and we see no impropriety in referring to it as such. But it would be a great mistake to make such an effort, or such a life, even though the best that any man ever lived, the basis on which sinners are to rest for their peace with God and their hope of salvation. Sinners are saved, if at all, through grace, and by the suffering and death of Christ, and upon the condition of their repentance toward God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. This is the gospel plan of salvation as Christ himself taught it and the apostles preached it. There is no other plan known to the Bible. Great men and small men, viewed simply as men, as subjects of the moral government of God, and as sinners, stand at a common level in respect to their wants and the method of their relief; and they must alike build their hopes on Christ and his work, accepting him by faith, or they will build in vain. 'A good and honorable life' is no substitute for Christ, and does not dispense with the necessity of looking to him for salvation."

That is to say, "he that believeth not shall be damned." All right. We accept the alternativ. But the editor of the Independent has avoided stating the true way to salvation as pointed out by Christ himself. We will present it for his consideration. In the nineteenth chapter of the gospel according to Matthew we find the following:

"And behold one came and said unto him, Good master, what good thing shall I do that I may hav eternal life? And he said unto him, Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is God: but if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. He saith unto him, Which? Jesus said, Thou shalt do no murder. Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt not bear false witness. Honor thy father and thy mother, and, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. . . . If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and giv to the poor, and thou shalt hav treasure in heaven."

There is the scheme so plain that no one need misunderstand it. General Grant did not accept it. He never sold anything in order to giv to the poor. Parson Newman has not accepted it. The editor of the Independent counts his possessions by the tens of thousands. Christ said, further, according to the same chapter, that "every one that hath forsaken brethren or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, for my name's sake, shall receive a hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life." Has the editor of the Independent fulfilled even these conditions? The Galilean orator adds that many that are first in following these instructions shall be last in the kingdom of heaven, and the last to follow them shall be first in the kingdom. Many Christians, it may be noted, evince a disposition to be first in the kingdom.

The question of General Grant's destination is, of course, one upon which it is idle to speculate. We can only trust that he is in the hands of his friends. But we would like to hav the editor of the Independent tell us whether the injunction to forsake one's parents looks to him consistent with the commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother;" and whether he believes that both sentiments were uttered by the same man on the same occasion.

The Orthodoxy of the Jews.

A correspondent at Spring Lake, Va., writes:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The way I understand it, the resurrection was a sign to all mankind, including the Jews. I hav frequently asked this of Jews, though they never answered me directly: How Jews can claim to be orthodox, and still reject the resurrection as a sign? I cannot understand. Do you?"

No. As we understand it, Jesus was sent to the Jews only. Our correspondent will read in the fifteenth chapter of Matthew that a certain gentile woman came to Jesus, "saying, Hav mercy on me, Lord, thou son of David." "But he answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to the dogs." That is what Christ said to a woman who was not a Jew; and it was only by neatly supplementing the figure of his heartless speech that she secured his services. It was claimed by his followers that his death and resurrection were a sign to all mankind; but as to his mission, his words to the Canaanite woman prove that he believed otherwise.

The Jews did not accept Christ, which is rather strange, seeing that they expected a messiah, and that his miracles, if performed at all, were performed in their sight. Jesus complained that he was without honor in his own country, and that such was the fate of prophets generally. This may be explained by remembering that the people immediately surrounding a prophet hav the best opportunity of judging whether or not he is a humbug.

The Jews hav no right to call themselvs orthodox. An orthodox person is one who is sound in the Christian faith—which the Jews are not.

The Albany Convention.

Mr. Putnam has prepared a circular—a portion of which appears on a previous page—to advertise the coming Convention. He will forward it to all the Liberals he can reach, and we hope everyone receiving it will see that his friends and neighbors are made acquainted with the contents. Everyone not receiving it should write to him for a bunch to distribute.

From assurances received from Liberals that we meet there is no doubt the attendance at this reunion will be large. These annual gatherings hav heretofore been the most enjoyable of occasions, and there seems to be no possible reason why this one shall not equal if not surpass them. Canada, it is to be hoped, will send her usual delegation; New York state, it is needless to say, will be largely represented; Ohio and Pennsylvania Freethinkers will find the trip not excessivly expensiv, and the ease with which New England people can reach Albany ought to bring out hundreds of Yankees.

It is a little unfortunate that the railroad rates hav just been raised, but the State Fair management, we understand, hav secured excursion prices from nearly all of the railroads in the state, and the friends can take advantage of this. The small attendance last year at Cassadaga made the Erie and Central roads indifferent to the Convention this fall. Next year, perhaps, their ticket agents will feel better-natured. Mr. McCabe will secure board for all who want at one dollar per day; the Dunlop House charges only $1.25 and $1.50, and the Delavan House will put two in a room for $2.50 each. The prices of accommodation, therefore, are made to suit everybody's purse, and it would seem that none need stay away on account of the expense.

Liberal business men, east and west, will find this an excellent opportunity to visit New York city, thus combining pleasure and profit. The fare from Albany to this city by boat is only $1.50, and the sail down the Hudson is through the finest scenery in the world. Toilers who hav not yet had a vacation can obtain one at the Convention. Albany has many attractions, chief of which is the finest state house in the country (built, we may say parenthetically, with the most reckless disregard of the value of money). A trip from Albany to this city will not cost a fortune, and around about here are attractions enough to entertain a person for weeks. It will be a good chance to make a pilgrimage to General Grant's last resting-place, and trips to the numerous seaside resorts on Long Island and the Jersey coast.

We are sure that the Freethinkers of Albany will do their best to entertain their visitors, and make their stay a pleasant memory. Let everybody go, and go prepared to hav a good and genial time, and become acquainted with their fellow-workers in Liberalism.

Persecuting a Pastor.

It is painfully apparent that there is a conspiracy on foot in Boston to make the Rev. Mr. Downes uncomfortable. Downes preaches at the Bowdoin Square Baptist church, of which Mr. and Mrs. Taber are members. Deacon Taber has been a good friend of the pastor, and, it appears, has stood by him in numerous tight places; but of late he has suspected that the relations between the Rev. Mr. Downes and Mrs. Taber were becoming rather too contiguous. Hence the persecution.

One evening last week Deacon Taber observed Parson Downes going into the house where Mrs. Taber lived, and it was then that the conspiracy to ruin the pastor's peace was carried out. Deacon Taber went to a hardware store and procured a dumb-bell weighing twenty pounds. Summoning also two other members of the church, he surreptitiously gained access to the house. He asserts that they waited—probably on the cellar stairs—until the Rev. Mr. Downes and Mrs. Taber went to an upper chamber and secured the door. A few minutes later the conspirators, after listening at the keyhole, swung the big dumb-bell against the door and burst it in. They then had the audacity to enter the room with a light. What followed let a witness relate:

"Elder Downes and Mrs. Taber were both on the bed. Mrs. Tabor had on a skirt and a sort of jacket, while Elder Downes was minus his boots, vest, and coat. As we entered the room Mrs. Taber screamed, while one of us turned up the light. Deacon Taber threw himself upon Elder Downes, saying, 'I've got you this time, you scoundrel.' Deacon Taber released his hold after a moment or two, and on the clergyman's arising from the bed he attempted to dissuade Deacon Taber from proceeding further. Deacon Taber accused Elder Downes of seducing several of the ladies of his congregation, and Elder Downes retaliated by accusing Deacon Taber of doing the same."

The witness adds that "he never did think much of ministers before, but he thinks a damned sight less of them now."

Deacon Taber, the account continues, then placed his twenty-pound dumb-bell on the floor and sat upon it, warning the couple not to stir. They were not even allowed to don their apparel, which had been temporarily removed on account of the excessiv warmth of the weather in Boston that day, but were kept on the bed until the police arrived. This act of persecution was crowned when the pastor was taken away to jail, one of the chief pillars of the Bowdoin Square church remarking that he would see Downes "gol-danged" before he would giv bail for him.

From these bare details it is true that the conduct of the Rev. Mr. Downes appears somewhat irregular. He is able, however, to explain it to the satisfaction of all but scoffers. It seems that Mrs Taber had domestic and other troubles, and her pastor sympathized with her deeply. She was on the point of going away from Boston, and he made a final pastoral call upon her. He found her packing a trunk for removal and he assisted her. The room was very warm, and for that reason he removed his coat and vest and also his shoes. To keep the musketoes away they put the lights out. Packing a trunk is known to be excessivly fatiguing work to a person unused to manual labor, and becoming exhausted they reclined upon the bed. Realizing that this might cause remark among the unthinking, the door was locked to secure immunity from intrusion. The garments which Mrs. Taber did not hav on were some she intended to pack. With this plain tale does Mr. Downes down his traducers. Of course there are those who will not believe it, but that is equivalent to saying that a minister of the gospel is capable of lying. From immemorial time it has been the privilege of clergymen to visit their female parishioners, and they hav often been discovered in more embarrassing situations than that in which the Rev. Mr. Downes had the misfortune to be caught. It is their prerogativ. The audacity of Deacon Taber, therefore, in entering his wife's room when he did should be severely rebuked. If pastoral rights are to be interfered with in that manner, and the perquisits of the preacher withdrawn from him, what will be left to induce young men to enter the sacred calling? If this persecution of Elder Downes is successful, it will deal a deadly blow at the dearest liberties of the American ministry. Husbands who support the church must learn that parsons hav rights which they are bound to respect. Unbelieving family men will, of course, continue to kick a minister through the door as promptly as possible if they find him becoming unduly familiar.

Editorial Notes.

THE Spiritualists are holding camp-meetings from Maine to California. Probably the largest one is at Lake Pleasant, Mass., where an attendance of twelve thousand in one day has been reported.

SEWARD MITCHELL'S latest publication is a journal entitled The World's Reformer and the People's Friend. It advocates reforms of various kinds, and is full of valuable articles and poems selected with good judgment. Anyone forwarding five or ten cents to Seward Mitchell, Newport, Me., would probably receive one or more copies of The World's Reformer in return.

AFTER acquiring enormous sums of money in the manufacture of whisky, and expending enormous sums repairing St. Thomas's Cathedral, Mr. Roe, of Dublin, Ireland, suddenly finds himself at the point of absolute bankruptcy. Remembering the way he got his wealth, in conjunction with the way he spent it, will serve somewhat to lift the general sadness of Mr. Roe's collapse.

ASTONISHING reports of the revival craze come from Madison county, Indiana. Vast crowds assemble and "pray, shout, cry, laugh, sing, faint, and go into trances. The most obdurate Infidel is converted in an instant, and becomes one of the most profound of professing Christians." So says the Indianapolis News. Superstition appears to be epidemic. So is cholera in Spain. It is a question which, on the whole, is the worse scourge.

MR. S. E. BROWN, of Chicago, sends us an account of an accident which overtook his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Sylvester Brown, on the 14th inst. They were thrown from their carriage and sustained severe injuries which threaten the lives of both. Mr. Sylvester Brown is a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and, besides the bond of common humanity, we feel assured this will make the accident a cause of deep regret to all our readers.

A DOCTOR of divinity writes an article in a religious paper on "Dissuasivs from Prayer," which he says are "prosperity, usual work, routine, duty, and pleasure of life." These may keep a man off his knees a part of the time, but the greatest "dissuasiv from prayer" we can think of is the fact that prayers are never answered. If they were, why not giv up "prosperity, usual work, routine, duty, and pleasure of life," and depend on prayer altogether? It is a great waste of effort to labor for that which can be had for the asking.

LAST week THE TRUTH SEEKER reprinted some dispatches from Paris about an alleged masssacre of Christians in China, The first dispatch reported ten thousand Christians massacred; the second recommended vengeance on the perpetrators of the outrage; and the third related that the number killed had been grossly exaggerated. Not more than three hundred at most were killed. It will be remembered we prophesied the opening of a subscription paper. Here we hav it. It seems that the ten thousand Christians who were killed are now hungry: "PARIS, Aug. 21st.—The bishop of Quinhon, in Annam, the scene of the recent massacres of Christians, implores liberal assistance. He reports that ten thousand Christian refugees are starving." The bishop of Quinhon is quite an enterprising theologian.

IN all the bright sayings of General Grant which I hav seen in print, his best has been omitted. After Mr. Sumner had criticised him so savagely, some one was talking to Grant about Atheism in New England, and remarked, "Even Sumner does not believe in the Bible." "Why should he?" quietly replied Grant, "he didn't write it."—Boston Globe.

We print the foregoing because we had never before heard it intimated that Sumner was a skeptic. If it is true, he committed a great oversight in not putting himself emphatically upon record as such.

THE citizens of Missouri hav good cause to complain of the management of their state university. According to an act of the Assembly which has been in operation for thirteen years, the annual tuition fees are twenty dollars, which must be paid by every student "except regularly ordained ministers of the gospel, belonging to any of the various religious denominations of the state, and indigent young men preparing for the ministry." The people hav the right to ask the legislators at Jefferson City whence they derive their authority for edu cating ministers wholly at the expense of the state.

THE Popular Science Monthly for September has the following contributors and articles: Dr. W. T. Barnard, "The Relations of Railway Managers and Employees;" Dr. W. G. Thompson, "The Present Aspect of Medical Education;" Behrens, "Insect Fertilization of Flowers;" Prof. E. D Cope, "Origin of Man and the other Vertebrates;" Dr. Mary Putnam-Jacobi, "An Experiment in Primary Education;" "The Fauna of the Seashore," by Moseley; Dr. Brehm's "Siberia and the Exiles;" "How Spelling Damages the Mind," by F. A. Fernald; Professor Langley, "Sunlight and the Earth's Atmosphere;" Dr. Ray Lankester, "The Recent Progress in Biology;" J. G. Frazer, "The Primitiv Ghost and His Relations;" Mascart, "The Physiology of Colors." A sketch and portrait are given of the celebrated African explorer, Dr. Gustav Nachtigal. Fifty cents a number, $5 a year. New York: D. Appleton & Company.

DAVID S. CINCOZE, who calls himself the negro Infidel, expresses the intention to enter the lecture field. He writes:

"I expect to be present at the Convention, if admitted, as the negro delegate, and take a part, and after the Convention will write and lecture and work among my people in the South. I can make but a poor living in the field, but I am willing to labor there as long as I liv, if it is a thousand years. One of Colonel Ingersoll's pamphlets is more to me than all the Bibles in this world, and a line of Paine's 'Age of Reason' is more than the Ten Commandments. I am an ex-slave, but I did not get my freedom from the church. The great truth that all men are by nature free was never told on Sinai's barren crags, nor by the lonely shores of Galilee."

It is uncertain what success Brother Cincoze would hav in propagating Freethought among the colored people of the South; but if their superstition could be exorcised, and a desire to be honest, moral, and enlightened implanted in its place, it is certain that the negro race would experience an elevation toward which their political emancipation was only a step.

"A WRITER in the New York TRUTH SEEKER, while advocating free trade with vigorous logic and historic research, drops the remark that there is no contraction of the currency now as in the last crisis. It will not do to be too sure about no contraction. Money cornered is practically a contraction of the supply. In some parts of the country there is a difficulty in raising money on good security. The mass of products are slaughtered in price. Does not this look like an unofficial contraction by private control over the bulk of money in a few hands? Supposing the amount of currency equal to that of more prosperous periods, is there not relativ contraction from increase of population since then?"—Galveston News.

The News must settle that question with our correspondent "Holt." As for the rest of us, we can only look on in silent admiration while the athletes of political economy wrestle with these mighty subjects.

THE latest news from London is not edifying. Patrician libertins ruin young girls; Sir Charles Dilke seduces the wife of a friend; the Prince of Wales renews his relations with Mrs. Langtry; Lord Coleridge is sued for breach of promis by an American woman whom he met on a steamer; Chetwynd and Lonsdale pummel each other in the streets on account of a married woman; the Hon. Mr. Pearce betrays a young girl and gets thrashed by the father, and the girl writes a letter to the press about it; General Booth of the Salvation Army steals a thirteen-year-old maiden; three hundred boys at Eton College hav been contaminated by contact with lewd women—all these scandals are mixed in with the dispatches from Europe. Yet London is full of churches and preachers. How would it work if the latter were to drop religion out of their sermons for a while and discourse more especially upon morality?

MR. WILLIAM SMITH, of Geneva, N. Y., sends us the following statement, cut from the Geneva Courier, with an inquiry as to whether it is true:

"In the year 1800 there were in the United States 3,030 evangelical churches; in 1850, 43,073; in 1870, 70,148; and in 1880, 97,090, a gain of 27,000 in ten years, ending in 1880. The number of communicants in evangelical churches in the United States in 1800 was 364,000; in 1850, 2,529,000; in 1870, 6,673,000, and in 1880, 10,065,000. Taking the whole country through, there was in 1800 one evangelical communicant to every 14 1 2 inhabitants; in 1850, one to every 6 1-2; in 1870, one to every 5 3-4, and in 1880, one to every 5."

We do not see any reason for doubting the general correctness of these figures, provided the compilers of the various church statistics are honest. The source of our information as to the number of church communicants in the country is derived from statements published by the churches themselvs, according to which we hav 17,000,000 or so of church communicants, nearly half of whom are Roman Catholics, who constitute the growing branch of the upas-tree. Protestants may look with satisfaction upon this spread of Christianity, but they are blind not to see that the Catholic church is as deadly an enemy of Protestantism as it is of Freethought. When the Romish Tiger gets a little bigger they may be able to perceive that fact.

Letters from Friends.

A LONG, LONG LETTER FROM MR. PERRY.

WILKESBARRE, PA., August 18, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. J. Burgess, of Zanesville, O., in THE TRUTH SEEKER, August 15, 1885, asks me a great many questions, and I will reply to some of them, by way of explanation, if nothing more.

He objects to my statement of his language used to illustrate his idea of the source of all power. I did so because the idea of a "fountain-head" is theological. It implies an original source, or first cause, and is opposed to the doctrin of the correlation of forces. But now he makes a worse mistake by attempting to explain it. He now says he means "all nature," except spirits, which he does not believe hav an existence. He says, "All nature, I deem, constitutes the fountain-head—all the living and the dead, as well as mineral and vegetable, earth, rocks, seas, air, and everything combined (except spirits)." Now, friend Burgess, if all nature, as you describe and deem, constitutes the "fountain-head," what becomes of your stream? There can be no fountain without a stream, so having included everything in your definition of fountain-head, you leave nothing for a stream except spirits, and in those you hav no belief. Do you not see that you hav chosen an old theological idea to describe your doctrin? A correlation of forces admits of no fountain-head in such a sense as you hav stated it.

Then, again, you say that the elements "separate and pass into other forms and things, and become a part of the fountain-head (nature) again." Well, if all nature is the fountain-head, they (the elements) never could hav been out of it. You assert also that electricity is an element of matter. Do you not know that your talk is very unscientific when you make such a statement? Electricity is no element; it is not matter of any kind. To hav an element we must hav matter in its simplest form. Gold is an element because it is a simple form or kind of matter, not made up of any combination of metals. Brass is not an element, because it is composed of copper, spelter, etc., but electricity is not either fluid or any other form of matter. You ask, "Can wood be made out of electricity alone?" I say, No, sir, nor anything else, because electricity is a force generated out of hundreds of other materials, but most woods will not even act as a conductor of it. We often hear speakers talking about electricity and magnetism as if they were a subtle fluid permeating nature, but it is all an error, which electrical science has of late corrected, just as the science of astronomy has dispelled the idea of the rising of the morning sun. The sun does not rise; we revolve toward it. There is no element like electricity, but it is a force determined by the rate of vibratory, molecular, and atomic motion. If Mr. Burgess will hold one end of a rope twenty feet long and I hold the other end, I can shake his arm with a sensible power by shaking the rope, and yet not a particle of any manner of substance except pure will force went from me to him. I simply exerted my mind upon the muscles of my arm, so as to giv the rope a vigorous, wave-like motion, and he feels every impulse as I giv it, except the slight loss which was spent against the air. I shake him about without sending a particle of matter into him. This is analogous to the atomic and molecular motions imparted to conducting wires from a battery. An electrical machine will generate, by means of the friction of oiled silk upon a moving glass cylinder, this vibratory motion, which must be drawn from the friction thus made through conducting-rods into another jar, and the air within it, every particle of which is set into an invisible, though exceedingly rapid, motion. It cannot escape from the glass jar, as glass is a non-conductor. It was generated by a non-conducting glass cylinder, and is held within the air of another glass non-conductor. The moment any conducting matter is held against the metal jar-stopper, it—the force within the jar—seeks an equilibrium, and in doing so produces the electrical shock. Yet not a particle of any form of matter will pass through the body in producing it. In my electro-magnetic machine, which I hav used for thirty odd years, a copper vessel contains sulphate of copper in solution, and it contains also a zinc hollow frame, upon which the copper fluid acts, and this chemical force, or chemical friction, is conveyed to a vibrating lever, attached to a coil of insulated wire, and the electro-magnet upon which the vibrating lever moves. By this means the friction is not stored up, but is broken into an infinit number of small shocks, so as to form a stream. This is not an electrical shock such as one would receive from a jar, but the force is broken into ten thousand fragments, and hence is called electro-magnetism. But, after all, it is but a chemical force, acting with a greater number of vibrations than the atoms of our bodies, and so we feel the different rate, just as Mr. Burgess would feel the waves of an agitated rope acted upon by some person.

All force of any form originates in mind. I will to shake Mr. Burgess by means of the rope or by means of a battery; neither the rope nor the battery would do so unless used by a mind. Hence mind is a force superior to and controling all matter, but is not matter.

Mr. Burgess wants to know, "Whence come two separate, distinct individualities—body and spirit?" They were inherited from the same source. The spirit was transmitted by the same means which bestowed a body.

Mr. Burgess says, "You hav only to remove the brain and mind ceases—it is annihilated." This I deny. There are many cases where portions of brains was removed and mind did not cease. I refer Mr. Burgess to the Annapolis soldier who was shot into the median line of the forehead, and from which the brain oozed out day by day for a long time. At last it healed up, and the man lived and followed his regular occupation and daily habits. No one could detect anything wrong. He was a remarkable billiard-player, and could make the nicest calculations. Those who knew him before he received the bullet could detect no difference in any way. But at last he sickened and died from exposure and other causes, and when the medical gentlemen made the post-mortem, they found, to their utter astonishment, that almost every particle of the cerebrum was missing. It had oozed out and healed up, and dried away, so that his head was filled with a watery fluid partly, but no front brains.

It is true that the cerebellum was not injured. In fact, had the motiv seat of organic life been injured, his animal economy could not hav survived such a shock. Vivisection proves also that very much brain material may be removed without causing death, and little or no other effects, provided the back brain remains intact. It is not true, therefore, that life or intelligence is destroyed by a loss of brain. The brain is an organ used to supply the mind with sensations, is constantly wasting away and changing, while the mind remains intact, and is by every brain loss, when gradual, a gainer—as much so as by every other change of the body. If no new brain matter were added, the man would soon die, but while the brain, and in fact the whole body, is completely changed about once in seven years, so that our bodies hav been absolutely changed several times during a lifetime, the mind is constantly augmented and benefited. And this points to a different theory about life from the "death ends all" idea.

I deny that matter, or any combination of elements, can produce a human being without, or independently of, a spirit, or germ, or in fact any form of animal. But it is very inconsistent for Materialists to argue that matter is the only something, and has the peculiar habit of constantly, by its motions, producing nothing.

The question is, How is it possible for something to be laboring so incessantly in producing nothing, as if the whole object of nature were to produce shadows?

Mr. Burgess and thousands of his class are quite reasonable men and women when regarding the affairs of this life, but the moment you attempt to prove the existence of a spirit by similar means they at once lose their fairness, and demand things that are outside of the question, and outside of all business methods. I will illustrate this in this way: Mr. Burgess I hav never had the pleasure of meeting, but it is not unreasonable for me to believe that he exists. I begin to know him from his thoughts. I am unacquainted with his handwriting, but if I were to write him a letter, intrust it to the mails, and should I in return receive one from him that was a reply to mine, I should not be thought a fool to believe that such a man existed. In the same way I hav been dealing for many years with a firm in Boston whom I hav never seen. I hav sent them thousands of dollars for materials which always came to hand. Now, if I were called upon to prove that such a party lived there, no court would accept my letters in evidence that such had been written; the goods which I take into court and swear that I received in response to my request would not prove it; and, in fact, that is just the case with every business trust and the whole commercial world. Nothing but an absolute personal knowledge and acquaintance with the parties would be accepted, or the bringing of the man into court would establish his existence; so that the business methods of the world are set aside and ignored on a mere legal quibble. I accept the intelligence of my business letters as evidence of their coming from the parties. But when I receive similar tests from spirits of which no person or medium could know, my Materialist friends say it is no evidence of the life of a spirit. We are asked to bring the spirit into court, and let Mr. Burgess feel and handle it. Such minds are so material, if I may be allowed to use the term without meaning anything offensiv, that they cannot, and will not, accept an intellectual test for fear that it is a fraud, while no such fear would trouble them in any worldly affairs, and yet I will venture to say that a thousand times more fraud has been practiced in such a worldly sense than by mediums.

A man who will expect us to bring him a spirit and allow him to touch and handle it is decidedly mistaken about the evidence that would satisfy him. In fact, such persons are mostly incapable of conviction, for as soon as a man is unable to believe an intellectual test, he has lost faith in himself, and he would as certainly deny the one as the other. He would hatch up a thousand foolish arguments to prove to himself that his senses had deceived him. LaRoy Sunderland arrived at that condition by his philosophy of ideology.

When a person starts out to investigate the subject of Spiritualism by denying the possibility of it on a material basis, he seldom can become a believer, simply because such persons are too nervous. They are so fidgety, and are so fearful that their pet ideas of materiality may become upset, that their nerves are in a constant tension, so that, even when the most convincing tests are given them, they will conclude, after all, there must hav been some fraud in the phenomena. I hav no particular desire to engage in the medium business to convince such persons against their will, nor for money. If such evidence as is produced by Mr. Walser, for Sister Elmina, at Liberal, will not satisfy her, or anybody else, that slate-writing is a possibility independent of a medium's hand, I can assure Mr. Burgess and Elmina, and the whole class of Materialist philosophers, that they cannot be convinced at all, and the spirits will soon lose all interest in making efforts, and will let them severely alone, until such time as Mother Nature forces conviction upon their consciousness after drawing them through the gates of death into the everlasting domain of her spiritual kingdom. The spirits can afford to wait until they are ready to approach the subject with candor, and a prayerful desire for light and truth.

As an offset against the indubitable evidence of slate-writing at Liberal, Elmina wants to send, for a three-cent stamp, a fac simile of slate-writing through Dr. Slade, published in the Sunday News, containing Mrs. E. A. Bennett's account of her sittings with him. She wanted, as a Spiritualist, to flaunt her slate-writing in the face of Mr. Truesdell, of Rochester, no doubt thinking she would be able to banter him out of countenance, but if she had spirit friends who were aware of her desires, Mr. Truesdell's spirit friends were on hand to do their part. Spiritualists are often much puzzled to account for such things, but they forget that the spirit world is full of opposing forces, and that a true medium, if brought under their control, would be compelled to do their bidding and cheating, as fully as a psychological subject would be compelled to obey the operator under whose influence and control he acted.

While everything done by Slade at the time referred to may hav been a complete fraud, the next person may, perhaps, get genuin spirit manifestations. The same medium may be influenced to deceive at one time, and act perfectly honest, because unconscious of what was done.

The more sensitiv the medium, the more liable to be made the means of deception by deceiving spirits, who are enemies of spirit communion. Of this I am as certain as that phenomena occur.

LUNENBURG, MASS., August 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say, as a prelude to the article inclosed, from "Toiler," in response to the inquiry of your correspondent of Poughkeepsie, Mr. Barker, that there is no fact clearer demonstrable than the systematic action of the church to crush every movement that did not bring multiplied grist to their hopper.

My own experience and observation confirm every word "Toiler" utters on the subject. I hav before me the records of one Washingtonian society, organized in 1842, with a membership of 550 in a town of 1200 inhabitants.

The popularity of the movement may be readily seen in the percentage of the members to the entire population. A reformed drunkard, in accordance with the purpose of the enterprise, was elected president, and the people were strengthened in the hope that a new social and moral dispensation was opening upon us—the land of New England rum and wooden nutmegs.

On the evening of August 23, 1847, I read in the entry of the clerk of the society this question for discussion: "Is it expedient, under existing circumstances, to continue the existence of this society?"

The meeting adjourned two weeks from date to the dwelling-house of one of the members, three miles from the center of the town, the society refusing to provide otherwise.

I hav said this temperance movement brought no additional grist to the church hopper. The effort to make a scoop-net of this great and glorious enterprise among the fallen sons of men failed—signally failed. Since then the church has assumed, in a feeble degree, to foster the temperance cause, with what success the census table and statistic bureau may giv the answer. The rum shops outnumber the churches by five to one, and will continue while we as a people patronize Comstockism instead of physiological instruction as the base of all moral and social development. When the law of nature, written on the constitution of every baby born into this world becomes understood, then, and not till then, do I look fo the new dispensation so ardently desired by all honest and good men.

A. H. WOOD.

SHOOTING DUCKS.

MR. EDITOR: The object of the Washingtonian movement was to rescue the drinking man from his cups. The only qualification for membership required was the drinking of strong drinks. I could not become a member, for I had joined the temperance folks in 1824, and had kept the pledge, but I did all I could to push on the work. Perhaps my Poughkeepsie friend does not remember the doings in that direction over forty years ago. The church folks did all they could to wedge themselvs into their meetings, and where they could not do it by consent, they forced themselvs to the front by appointing meetings at the same place and time, and assumed the control of the meeting. This procedure, and others like it, finally vexed the Washingtonian leaders, and they gave up.

On being remonstrated with, a divinity tinker told me that "the best time to shoot ducks was when they were in a flock," that is to say, when the Washingtonians gathered in goodly numbers, then was the time for them to operate, and they did it, as stated above. I could fill pages with such like doings, but the above is enough to satisfy an honest thinker.

Very truly, A TOILER.

THE PLANETARY SYSTEM.

BROOKLYN, Aug. 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: It being clearly evident that Mr. "W. H. B." is not prepared to giv us more reliable information than we hav on the subject of planetary formation, we should endeavor to evolve what light we can on the subject from positivly known facts. As a preliminary movement in that direction, I will offer the following facts and suggestions:

It being a scientific axiom that no effect in nature can be produced except by conjunction of the positiv and negativ agents that produce it, and, also, that planetary and lunar atmospheres, and that subtil fluid called solar rays, are the only known or reasonably supposable agents that produce solar light and heat by contact; and, also, that they cannot possibly come in contact, anywhere within the planetary system, except in planetary and lunar atmospheres; it should logically follow that solar light and heat cannot possibly exist anywhere within the planetary system, than in the planetary and lunar atmospheres that are lighted and heated.

Then, for all known practical purposes, the center of our planetary system had as well be black as a coal-pit and cold as an iceberg; and likely enough it is, for nothing can be, in nature, unless there is an absolute necessity for its being. There can be neither an absolute nor a possible necessity for there being anything at the center of our planetary system, than a dense mass of that subtil fluid called solar rays. I wish we could capture and analyze some of it with a view to finding a more appropriate name. The subtilty of this matter should make it intangible and invisible, however dense it may be. It being remote from any luminous body, it should be black as night and cold as ether can make it.

When we look toward our planetary center in day-time, we are looking at the focus of a highly illuminated atmosphere that is about thirty miles in depth; of course, we should see a luminous orb, of dazzling brightness, that imagination may place at any distance from the point of observation that fancy may desire; though, to my view, it never appeared to be so far away as the depth of our illuminated atmosphere. But we should not trust to appearances, unless corroborated by facts.

This illuminated atmosphere is known to be saturated with the vapor of everything on the surface of this planet that is susceptible of being dissolved and expanded to vapor by the action of solar heat, and is sufficiently near to be analyzed with the aid of the spectroscope. But that such vapor can be seen and analyzed at a distance of 95,000,000 miles from the point of observation, with instruments that do not enable us to determin with certainty what the surface of the moon is composed of, is an inconsistency of greater magnitude than my credulity can accept, after rejecting Jonah and his whale, and other comparativly insignificant absurdities that we read about.

Morever, the fact that openings frequently occur in this vapor, through which it is distinctly seen that there is nothing but blackness beyond, is anything but conclusiv evidence that the center of our planetary system is illuminated.

Then, every planet and satellite has its own sun, in its own illuminated atmosphere. The sun neither revolves around the planet, nor the planet around the sun. The planet simply turns over to be warmed on the other side.

The growth of planets by meteoric accretion is evidently but an imaginary growth.

It being evident that the center of our planetary system is not illuminated, it should logically follow that the centers of other planetary systems are not, and those "fixed stars" in the distant firmament are more likely to be within our own planetary system than at the centers of others.

It being demonstrated that comparativ density is the only known cause of the centripetal action of matter, called gravitation, and that planets should present the side to the center of gravity in which density predominates, it should logically follow that a body of dense matter at the center of a planet should intercept solar heat, and confine its action to the side of the planet next to the center of the planetary system, and giv a preponderance of density to the opposit side, and make the rotation of the planet a physical necessity. But a body of planetary atmosphere, in which there is no dense matter to intercept solar rays, will be acted upon uniformly, producing an equilibrium and a "fixed star."

It being a fundamental principle, and scientific axiom, that all matter becomes more attenuated as we recede from the center toward which it gravitates, we should expect that, far beyond the most distant revolving planet, ether should become so attenuated that it cannot support the weight of planetary bodies that hav solid matter at their centers to intercept the action of solar fluid, wherefore those "fixed stars." Far beyond them, ether should become so attenuated that it can not support the weight of any planetary matter, except globes of the most attenuated, invisible, planetary atmosphere. Therefore, instead of having discovered the centers of other planetary systems, with no planets revolving around them, it is more than doubtful if we hav discovered the extent of our own. It is, evidently, not such an insignificant affair as we hav imagined it to be. It is more than doubtful if the most distant revolving planet is half so far from the center of our own planetary system as from its circumference.

Those spherules that are seen between the orbits of the planets should be of considerable magnitude, or they would not be seen; and if composed of planetary matter, they should be subject to the law of gravitation when they enter a planet's atmosphere, and move in a straight line toward the center until assimilated, instead of flying about like feathers and snowflakes in a brisk wind. Therefore, those luminous sparks that periodically fly about in our atmosphere, like fire-flies in the country on a summer eve, are more likely to be sparks of phosphorescent or electric vapor, generated in our atmosphere, than spherules that hav entered it from outside; wherefore, the periodical display of it, like borealise. Anyhow, such jack-o'-the-lantern vapor can add but little substance to the growth of planets.

Revolving satellites, whose motion is caused by a force that is generated and operated within themselvs, the same as in planets, should necessarily revolve in a plane nearly perpendicular to the planet's ecliptic, for the simple reason that they cannot possibly revolve in any other. The fact of their revolving in such a plane is prima facie evidence that they are in no way influenced by the planet in whose atmosphere they revolve.

J. A. TUTTLE.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Aug. 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Our homes are the cradles of society; in them are rocked the principles of future generations. The young, as they go forth in the world, are imbued with the principles that hav been instilled into their minds in early childhood, and are the prototypes of their parents.

Christianity has dominated the civilized world for eighteen hundred years, and the demoralized condition of society in all our great cities cannot be traced to any other cause than the false and pernicious doctrin that is taught in the churches, viz.: that mankind can violate all natural and moral law, and escape the punishment.

> "'Tis education forms the common mind;
> As the twig is bent so the tree's inclined.
> The priest continues what the nurse began,
> And thus the child is father of the man."

Or, in other words, we build prisons and fill them with recruits from the churches.

Every Liberal and Spiritualist should repudiate the word "religion," for it has been the shield of every crime, the cloak of every vice, and the breastwork of every outrage that has been perpetrated on humanity since man has been able to record his acts; and nature, reason, and common sense hav set upon it the seal of their displeasure, and the fiat has gone forth, "Make room for higher and better things."

Its vital principles are too far removed from the ardor of Nature's laws to be of any practical benefit to humanity. It separates us from the universal and ever-present law of cause and effect, and sets us warring against nature and ourselvs, and hangs the destiny of the whole human race on the slender thread of "belief" without evidence; but a God that would make such a blunder is equaled only in stupidity by the stupid ministers and priests who still preach the stupid dogma. Such childish nonsense is refuted by every known law in nature; for if Christianity, or the vicarious atonement theory, were a fact in nature, it would find such an expression as to be revealed to all mankind without the necessity of priests to teach it.

A god, to command the respect and confidence of the people of this enlightened age, cannot be subject to the changing whims of human fancy, and experience and observation hav taught me that those who pray in these latter days hav more faith in their own eloquence than they hav in God's ability to hear or answer, otherwise they would not do so much themselvs to insure answers to their own prayers.

Liberals and Spiritualists, keep your children free from the demoralizing and soul-narrowing influence of this greatest of all delusions, and teach them the gospel of common sense.

JOAN AVERY SOMMERS.

PEOA, UTAH, Aug. 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In looking over the columns of your paper, I see many letters from friends all over the states, but very few from my part of this priest-ridden Utah. There is only one besides myself in Peoa honest enough to class himself with the Freethinkers. I liv amongst those who claim to be God's chosen people, who pray night and morning for God to protect them from harm, and who are deluded enough to say he does. But when the United States marshal is within twenty miles of them, you can't find a polygamist anywhere. They go up in the mountains, where God will protect them. I don't really know how many "polygs" there are in Peoa, but when the marshals are anywhere around about, one-half of the men can't be found at their homes. I am not a subscriber as yet, but think if I don't get killed for what the saints call me (a damned Infidel), I will soon be on the list. HEN WRIGHT.

MORRISON, IOWA, August 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find draft for $4.34. Pass one dollar to credit on Tent Fund, and apply rest as directed, I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much, and will try and get up a club for it. I hav loaned and given away all the books and tracts ordered before, and hope to get up an interest in Liberalism here. There are many Freethinkers in this county, but no organization or society for interchange of thought. Still, there is a perceptible change for the better for the last few years. Superstition and priestcraft are losing their grip, and the good time is coming when their baneful influence will be felt no more. What we need is more education and more Freethought literature. I will contribute my mite in this direction.

Yours, etc., C. D. CURTIS.

THE FUTURE HISTORIAN.

WHEELING, W. VA., Aug. 14, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I thought while reading the two celebrated historians, Draper and Gibbon, that I could detect unmistakable evidence that both of these writers (especially Draper) believed in the advent of Christianity as a foretold conclusion, and the coming of Christ as a divine necessity, but that, through the machination of priestcraft, the doctrins of early Christianity had been perverted to ulterior or baser purposes. Although Draper's profound learning and masterly researches hav immortalized his name among a great many Freethinking scholars, still, there is a void left which cannot altogether satisfy the craving of those who hav cast anchor on the shores of absolute Freethought, and to the future historian we will still look for that man or woman who, undaunted by popular opinion, will dare to clear the rubbish from the pages of history, even if that be the total denial of the truthfulness of a crucified savior or the apple of the Eden story. To a nineteenth-century Infidel, such trash as is dished out to him from the lids of both the Old and New Testaments is a disgrace to our modern historian and an insult to the intelligence of the modern skeptical reader. Surely some modern Freethinker could be found among the grand army of rostrum orators and page-writers who could scatter to the winds theological creeds and thus purge history of its shams. Why should not such a scholar as "Antichrist," or such an adept historian as James Parton, come to the front and write his name on the scroll of fame? Such a history as those men would write would in a few years challenge comparison with any and all of our modern writers. For as long as the historian leans toward a special revelation, or is even non-committal, he cannot satisfy the wants of the average intelligent reader. It is infinitly absurd for a historian in this day and age to try and smooth over the rough places of theological blockheads, and I assert right here that the future historian is morally bound to treat the tenets of religion with the same scrutiny as the chemist when he is separating the gross from the fine.

Hoping that these few thoughts may stir up the Liberal talent of the country and that we may be favored in the near future by a historian surpassing even the genius of Draper, I subscribe myself the eternal foe of special revelation, the bulwark of superstition. OCTAVIUS J. BROSIUS.

BRONSTON, KY., Aug. 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 8th, in a letter of Dr. Juliet H. Severance to Lucy Colman, occurs the following: "I am also a Spiritualist in the sense that I believe in the continuity of individual human life. This belief is based upon as substantial evidence as my belief in human existence in this earthly life of which you, as well as I, are cognizant. If I know of the one fact, I do of the other, and by the same means—my senses."

Now, I believe that it is a fact beyond controversy that when persons know anything, they do not believe it, and when they believe it, they do not know it. Dr. Severance undoubtedly knows that she exists in the earthly life. Does she know as well that we exist after death? If she does know it, it is so. Dr. Severance says, "I believe in the continuity of individual human life." That settles it. She knows one and believes the other. I am anxious to be convinced of the continuity of human life, if it is a fact. My father, who has been dead several years, if he could materialize and look just as he did in the flesh, and hav as much common sense as he had in the first life, could, in ten minutes, make me know that he lived again. There is scarcely anyone who would object to life after death. If it is a fact, it ought to be demonstrated like the operations of the telegraph and telephone.

J. N. BROWN.

HENDERSON, MICH., Aug. 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: We hav just closed a most successful Tent meeting of six days' duration. This being a hot-bed of orthodoxy, stupidity, and ignorance, we undertook the task with some misgiving; but Liberals and friends came to our assistance, and we more than realized our expectations. Brother Reynolds has the happy faculty of getting on the good side of the enemy, and then dealing their religion sledge-hammer blows. They fairly winced, but still kept there till the close, wishing for more. We met with all kinds of opposition—got them stirred up, and then let them do the advertising. The little fat Methodist preacher roared, ranted, lied, reviled, and slandered till I know he must hav a sore mouth by this time. The more he raved, the greater the Tent fame and better the attendance. He even threatened mob violence; but if they had come they would hav found your humble servant there, for we never left the Tent alone.

Now, brother Liberals, if possible get the Tent at your place; giv your time, talent, and money, and it is an assured success. If you cannot get this Tent, get out another one—hav one for every state. Now, I hav a plan which I believe would work, viz.: Giv five dollars yourself, and call on ninety-nine more in your state to go and do likewise, and in a few weeks, at most, you can hav it at work. I will head the list with a V. for one to work exclusivly in this state. Who next? We found Brothers Reynolds and Tilney gentlemanly, courteous, and obliging, and our only regrets were when the time came for parting. But they can rest assured they hav friends here by the score. You will hear from me again soon.

WM. KOHLMEYER.

ATLANTA, GA., Aug. 14, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: It is with sorrow that I write you of the death of my father, Dr. J. S. Lyon, which occurred at this place July 27th, after several months of failing health.

The immediate cause was hemorrhage, produced by cancer of the stomach, from which he suffered intensely. Scarcely a day, in the past two years, has he been free from pain. He bore his sufferings bravely, never giving up until relieved by the hand that spares no one. You hav, probably, become familiar with his writings, as he was a subscriber to your paper since the first number, and often contributed to its columns.

No man of any belief was more sincere and honest in it, or left this life with a clearer conscience of having done all the good to his fellow-man that he could. Almost his entire life was devoted to restoring the sick and suffering to health. He only ceased when his own health failed and he was obliged, in 1882, to come to the sunny South to recuperate, but, alas, too late to bring him back to health. His death was like his life, calm and peaceful. He seemed like one asleep. His remains now rest in West View Cemetery, near this city. His many friends, I know, will regret to learn of his death—not death, but a change to a higher, better life. This cannot, must not, be all there is to life. His place cannot be filled.

D. L. LYON.

SNOWVILLE, VA.

MR. EDITOR: In reading the last TRUTH SEEKER I noticed in a letter from Mr. Tilney that pictures of Paine, Ingersoll, and Bennett hang on the walls of the Tent.

Are there no noble women worthy to hang by the side of these men? Where are Mrs. Rose, Mrs. Martineau, Lucretia Mott, Susie Wixon, Ella Gibson, Susan B. Anthony, and a host of other good women who hav done good work? Will Liberals never cease following in the footsteps of the church and ignoring woman and her labors? Every time I see a list of male names standing all alone I think of the great wrong it is to their mothers, sisters, and wives; to all the grand and good of womankind; to the mothers of all who liv.

> "The wife, and she is not one jot less than the husband;
> The daughter, and she is just as good as the son;
> The mother, and she is every bit as much as the father."

ELMINA.

BEAVER FALLS, PA., Aug. 3, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: One of General Grant's just propositions that was rejected by the churches—in one of his messages he proposed the taxation of the $700,000,000 worth of church property. The noble general could not understand the justice of taxing the home of the widow, who was deprived the right to vote, and exempting the church property of millionaires. This grand proposition of the general should be heralded throughout the country, and the church made ashamed of the injustice of its opposition to so righteous a reform.

Truly yours, J. E. EMERSON.

ALEXANDRIA, CAN., July 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Papers received; thanks. I inclose $2. I will try to attend the Convention at Albany, where I hope to hav the pleasure of meeting a large number of Liberals. I am not sure of being able to get away, but will try hard, as I anticipate a grand time there and at Schenectady, where I shall visit my son, who livs at the latter place. He will probably go to the Convention, also, if he can get away. He is, like myself, a railroad man.

Hoping to see you in September, I remain, truly yours,

CHAS. LAPERCHE.

WHEATLAND, IA, July 28, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find two dollars; please place it to my credit on THE TRUTH SEEKER. Poverty is my excuse. I thought once I would stop the paper, but changed my mind. I cannot afford to part with an old friend. J. LEVY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Rain in July.

Here comes the rain at last,
In something more than a shower,
Millions of welcome drops
For "herb, tree, fruit, and flower."

The farmer longed for this,
As he looked on his fields with pain;
The churches prayed for this,
But clouds, not prayers, bring rain.

Geraniums blazed in the sun,
They may forget about rain,
But the berries, poor little things,
Thought, When shall we drink again?

"Did you hear it pour in the night?"
Said my little boys to me.
"How fresh our gardens will look,
And how grateful the grass will be!"

There isn't a butterfly out,
Nor a bee with his busy ways;
They all hav to stay at home,
Like us, upon rainy days.

But we hope it will pour and pour
Till the earth has had her fill,
Then let the summer sun
Shine down again, if it will. J. D.

"Say, Boss."

I hav read with pleasure the articles in the Children's Corner on the subject of correctness in speech. In our intercourse with others the greatest medium is language, and the more perfect our use of it the more satisfactorily and comprehensivly will such intellectual intercourse be carried on.

By using ungrammatically constructed sentences, or slovenly pronunciation, we draw upon ourselvs the contempt of those who endeavor to be correct in such matters, and we also lose the respect of those who are no more careful in speech than ourselvs. I hope Miss Wixon will, from time to time, giv you further guidance in this direction.

In the little space I shall occupy I hope to impress upon the minds of our little Freethinkers another matter of great importance, and closely allied to these matters of correctness in speech. It is quite common on stepping into a store or market, to be addressed in this style: "Good morning, Boss!" "What'll you hav, Cap?" "Fine day, Squire" (pronounced "square" and meaning esquire). To call anybody and everybody cap, major, esquire, general, boss, etc., is simply impertinence. Of course many who do these things think they are doing the correct thing. It is time they learned better.

The abbreviation, "Esq.," may very properly follow a name in the address of a letter, or in the publication of names, but it is not used in spoken language, except in some localities where Esquire is used as the official title of a justice of the peace, and may follow him in private life. In the state of New York a justice of the peace is, in accordance with its Code of Procedure, entitled judge, and should be so addressed.

I presume the term "boss" is properly applied to one who has charge of a gang of unskilled laborers, as shovelers on a railroad, the director of skilled labor being called the foreman. A minister of the gospel would very properly resent being addressed as "boss." It would be very impolite for any little Freethinker to call out to the Rev. D. L. Moody, "Hello, boss!"

It is also impolite to refuse to call people by their titles unless, of course, the speaker has some intellectual or moral conviction that is in opposition to the use of the title.

The Friends, or Quakers, are opposed to the use of titles at all. Even the commonplace "Mr." is offensiv to them. It does seem, however, to us somewhat out place for a lad or lass of ten or twelve to say in addressing an old, gray-haired gentleman or lady, "Good morning, Adrommelech," or "Glad to see you, Angelina," instead of Mr. or Mrs. Brown.

The peace reformers shudder at the titles, "Captain," "Major," and other appendages of the form militant, and perhaps some of them avoid using military titles, even in addressing military men. So, too, some of our Freethinkers object to the titles, "Rev.," "Bishop," "Deacon," "Holy Father," "Sister of Charity," etc. Some of these objections seem childish; others are necessary as an assertion of dignity. To address a letter, "Rev. ——," "Bishop ——," etc., would not imply anything more than the designation of a trade or calling. But in conversation, to say: "Most Holy Father, what is your opinion of the holy trinity?" is to imply that the speaker submits himself to the priest spoken to, to the same degree that the title claims for its possessor predominance over the lives of others. There is something of this claim of superior excellence by divine appointment in the title, "Rev.," and to that extent it is offensiv to Freethinkers.

I hav written this to the young Freethinkers, because I wished to hav them avoid the execrable language of a little boy whom I heard call out to a gentleman on the street: "Say, boss, won't ye hav some of them eer apples?"

Riddledom.

Riddles are as old as the hills. Hundreds of years ago, children and grown people amused themselvs by guessing enigmas and puzzled their brains over riddles and charades just the same as in our own time. Away back in the distant ages, as far as there is any history, we read of riddles, both hard and easy ones to guess. Poets, philosophers, and sages had interest in brain-racking puzzles.

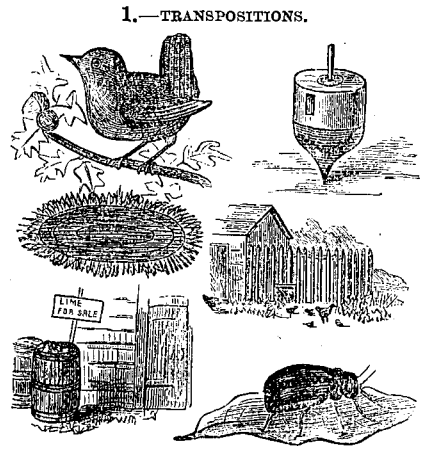
You hav read of the Sphinx, of course, many times. It is said that once upon a time this old Sphinx propounded a riddle that all the wise men of Greece could not guess. There is nothing very alarming about the riddle, either. Most anybody in our time, we think, might solve it. The riddle has been handed down to us in various forms. The most original, perhaps, is this:

"What is it that goes on four feet in the morning, on two feet at noon, and on three feet in the evening?"

It does not seem that it would require a very astute brain to see that the answer must be Man, who creeps in babyhood on hands and knees, in manhood walks erect on two feet, and in old age requires a staff to aid his tottering footsteps.

But in that other time the people thought it an "awful" hard nut to crack. Œdipus after awhile gave the correct solution, and the mysterious old Sphinx, it is said, was so mortified because of it that she committed suicide!

It is said, also, that Homer, the celebrated poet, died of mortification on account of his failure to guess a riddle. Although this is related by a no less distinguished historian than Plutarch, yet he may hav been mistaken as to the actual cause of his death.



Josephus in his history tells that Hiram, king of Tyre, had a contest once with the great king Solomon on the riddle question, in which Solomon was victor and won a large sum of money from Hiram, and after this he pronounced himself the champion puzzler of the world, but later in a contest with one of Hiram's retainers he failed to solve the riddle propounded and lost all the money he had won from Hiram. So it may be seen that riddle-making and riddle-guessing is not by any means of modern origin, but perhaps there hav never been brighter intellects engaged upon that subject than in the present time.

A Laughing Plant.

This is not a flower that laughs, but one that creates laughter, if the printed stories of travelers are to be believed. It grows in Arabia, and is called the laughing plant because its seeds produce effects like those produced by laughing gas. The flowers are a bright yellow, and the seed-pods are soft and woolly, while the seeds resemble small black beans, and only two or three grow in a pod. The nativs dry and pulverize them, and the powder, if taken in small doses, makes the soberest person behave like a circus clown or a madman, for he will dance, sing, or laugh most boisterously, and cut the most fantastic capers, and be in an uproariously ridiculous condition for about an hour. When the excitement ceases, the exhausted exhibitor falls asleep; and when he awakes he has not the slightest remembrance of his frisky doings.—Vick's Floral Magazine.

Correspondence.

Cynthiana, Ky., Aug. 16, 1885.

Dear Miss Wixon: Pa takes The Truth Seeker, and I am interested in the Children's Corner. I liv in the country, and attend the district school, which commenced the 1st of August. I hav a schoolmate, an Irish girl, who was confessed by the Catholic church last fall. She wears two badges, and two medals concealed under her dress near the neck. One of the badges has the picture of Jesus on it; the other has some stars. The medals represent Christ nailed to the cross, and the picture of Holy Virgin. The badges and medals are attached to a piece of wine-colored tape, and to cap the climax of superstition, there is a cord running through the tape that is said to hav been washed in the blood of Jesus. I learned from the girl that these emblems of ignorance were worn for the triple object to keep away diseases, to prevent sudden death, and for good luck! Hoping you are in good health, I remain your little friend, Allie Beamer.

Paris, Ga., August 8, 1885.

Dear Miss Wixon: A short while ago the Southern papers went into a perfect scene of admiration over some prosy palindromes clipped from the London Truth. So I concluded to try my hand at palindromic verse, which resulted in the following doggerel:

BRIGHT SIDE.

Bright and happy and gay is life,
Light children and smiling wife.
Plenty money, credit, and grub,
We are healthy, do not rub.

DARK SIDE.

Life is dark and gloomy and sad,
Wife scolding and children bad
Grub, no credit, no money, no
Rub here come death O me! O

I am the only outspoken Freethinker in this section. The papers here refuse to publish my articles. I dedicated a poem to Colonel Ingersoll in the spring, entitled "Freethinkers' Heaven; or, The Future Government of America." Is it true that a palindromic verse is a rare thing? How many did you ever see?

With great respect, I am yours to command,
R. Montmorenci Tench, M. D.

[We hav never seen a great deal of palindromic verse. We think this is the first that our Corner has been favored with. We thank our new friend for his contribution, and would be pleased to hear from him again.—Ed. C. C.]

The Missing Link
—IN—
MODERN SPIRITUALISM
By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. EVOLUTION:
A SUMMARY OF EVIDENCE.
By Robert C. Adams.
Paper, 25 cents. For Sale at this Office.

A SHORT LESSON IN HISTORY.

A double-page picture contrasting science and theology, showing how the one has labored for human advancement, and how the other has always opposed it. The German-American thus describes it in detail:

The palmy days of the church witness the burning at the stake of Bruno, the pope and priests witnessing the burning of the heretic with expressions of joy. Galileo is represented sitting in his study, the pope holding the sword of inquisition over his head, and to save his life being forced to recant his philosophy. Martin Luther is represented tacking up his "Right of Private Judgment." Behind him stands the pope with the bull of excommunication drawn, and beside him the headsman's block and ax of infallibility. In their study are Morse and Stephenson applying their inventions to practical tests, and in the rear of them the Presbyterian pulpits are filled by two of the broadcloth gentlemen denouncing the inventions as "Thwarting the will of God," and branding these men and their inventions as "Heralds of Antichrist." Ingersoll stands on a platform apparently delivering his lecture "Which Way?" which he holds in his hand. Talmage approaches the platform at the colonel's back, pulling after him, by the arm, the chief of police, who holds in his hand the warrant of arrest for blasphemy. The colonel seems to take no notice of the spleeny, cadaverous form ascending the platform at his rear. Then come the modern teachers of salvation, the Salvation Army, with their drums, bones, tambourines, and streamers, (and screamers, too), also a fac simile of our crazy army. A group of likenesses of the teachers of science, Haeckel, Humboldt, Darwin, Tyndall, and Huxley, is also shown. The likenesses throughout are remarkably correct. As a pictorial history the caricatures contain volumes.

Price, six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents; twenty-five copies for $1; one hundred copies for $3. We wish that the friends of Freethought would distribute thousands of these telling pictures.

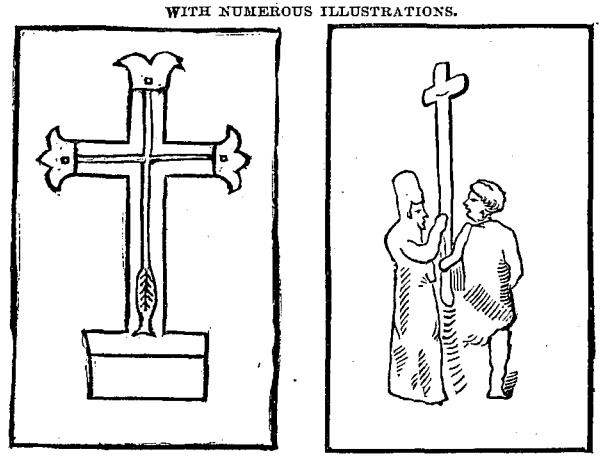
BIBLE MYTHS,



AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. BIBLE MYTHS shows this.

Poetry.

A Nature Prayer.

O birds that sing such thankful psalms,
Rebuking human fretting;
Teach us your secret of content,
Your science of forgetting.
For every life must hav its ills—
You, too, hav times of sorrow—
Teach us, like you, to lay them by,
And sing again to-morrow.
For gems of blackest jet may rest
Within a golden setting;
And he is wise who understands
The science of forgetting.

O palms, that bow before the gale
Until its peaceful ending,
Teach us your yielding, linked with strength,
Your graceful art of bending;
For every tree must meet the storm,
Each heart encounter sorrow;
Teach us, like you, to bow, that we
May stand erect to-morrow;
For there is strength in humble grace—
Its wise disciples shielding—
And he is strong who understands
The happy art of yielding.

O brook, which laughs all night, all day,
With voice of sweet seduction,
each us the art of laughing more
At every new obstruction;
For every life has eddies deep
And rapids fiercely dashing,
Sometimes through gloomy caverns forced,
Sometimes in sunlight flashing;
Yet there is wisdom in your way,
Your laughing waves and wimples;
Teach us your gospel built of smiles,
The secret of your dimples.

O oaks, that stand in forest ranks,
Tall, strong, erect, and sightly—
Your branches arched in noblest grace,
Your leaflets laughing lightly—
Teach us your firm and quiet strength,
Your secrets of extraction
From slimy darkness in the soil
The grace of life and action;
For they are rich who understand
The secret of combining
The good deep-hidden in the earth
With that where suns are shining.

How He Fell From Grace.

A green grocer on the North Side by the name of Swatters joined the church about six weeks ago, and a few days later bought a horse of the fire department which had reached the age at which these magnificent animals are retired from the service. There is no doubt but that Swatters was in downright earnest about wanting to be good, and that he sincerely repented having sanded his sugar and worked off stale vegetables at full market rates whenever he got a chance, but he made the great mistake of his lifetime in undertaking two very difficult things at the same time. It may be that with a longer and more extended experience as a Christian he might possibly hav been able to manage that horse without relapsing into the path of the backslider, but there is no absolute certainty that such a result could hav been depended upon.

He was casually overheard the other day explaining to a customer how he happened to giv him short weight the morning before on some damaged groceries and charged him double price for them.

"Well, sir, the very devil himself could not hold him when the fire-bells are ringing," he was saying. "It don't make any difference where I happen to be when an alarm goes in, he whips around and goes to the engin-house like a streak of wind, in spite of all I can do, and it don't matter how much of a hurry I may happen to be in, if an engin comes my way that old reprobate has to cut right in behind it, and I've got to go and see the fire, whether or no, and stay till the last hose is rolled up.

"Whenever an alarm is turned in at night that horse is in misery and so is everybody else within six or eight blocks. He wants to be hitched up without the loss of a minute, and if his halter strap won't break and he can't pull down the manger or one side of the barn, as he has done more times than one, he just stands there and kicks, paws, and snorts in the most outrageous manner that a sleepy person ever heard, till he concludes that the fire has been put out. One day I was driving him to the funeral of a lodge brother and had the preacher in the buggy with me, when them confounded fire-bells had to break loose, and the devil was to pay in a minute. The old fool whipped right around and knocked down a couple of pall-bearers and broke the glass in the hearse before the preacher could say, 'God bless us,' and away he went for the engin-house as tight as his old hoofs could rattle, and as you might swear, we got there just in time to go out with the second alarm, and got on the ground in season to enjoy the best end of the fire. Of course they had to manage to bury the brother some way or other without the preacher, and in an exciting time like that it ain't to be wondered at that I forgot who I had for a passenger and done some of the stoutest cussing I hav ever tried my hand at. But the preacher never opened his head to call me to time about it, and for all he'd say against it I reckon I might still be a church member at this minute. He sat there with a martyrized look around the mouth, holding fast with both hands and feet, and whenever I'd send a mouthful of sulphur at the old beast's head, as I'd fetch him a cut with the whip, I'll be hanged if he wouldn't giv a cheerful little groan and say 'Amen' with a good deal more meaning than I could crowd into the word if I'd practice on it for two years. Yes, sir, I damned that horse from his hair to his hoofs; but the preacher was so busy in thinking about his sermon or something that he never raised his finger against it, and whenever we'd bust a hub on a milk wagon and I'd spit out my opinion without taking time to varnish my words, he'd only tighten his grip, shut his eyes, and put a little more steam into his 'Amen.' Yes, sir, he's a devilish good horse, but no man who wants to get to glory has any business to drive him. I guess I'll advertise him for sale and say that the owner wants to go a short distance in the country."

Book Review.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF DISENCHANTMENT, by Edgar Evertson Saltus. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, & Co. Price $1.25. Order through the TRUTH SEEKER office.

It must be confessed that among the several distinguishing characteristics of the Freethinkers of the present day, not the least marked is a tendency toward uninformed and what may be termed too original investigation and theorizing; an exaggeration of a just impartiality toward former systems of thought into a complete indifference toward them and toward almost all the lessons to be learned from thinkers of former ages or opposing creeds. The results of this excess of radicalism, this undervaluation of the work of former thinkers and over-confidence in one's own uninformed and unassisted powers, may be seen in the curious diversity, and, it is to be admitted, frequent grotesqueness, of the myriad theories advanced by contributors to Liberal journals. One might find food for curiosity and humor in observing the identity of these methods with those of the newly-awakened minds of the English Renaissance, as we see them in their quaint old treatises—in particular, in the methods of Sir Thomas Browne, as described by M. Taine, is seen their precise counterpart:

"Among the productions of nature he abounds with conjectures, generalizations; he gropes about, proposing explanations, making trials, extending his guesses like so many flexible and vibrating tentacula into the four corners of the globe, into the most distant regions of fancy and truth. As he looks upon the tree-like and foliated crusts which are formed upon the surface of freezing liquids, he asks if this be not a regeneration of vegetable essences, dissolved in the liquid. At the sight of curdling blood or milk, he inquires whether there be not something analogous to the formation of the bird in the egg, or in that coagulation of chaos which gave birth to our world. In presence of that impalpable force which makes liquids freeze, he asks if apoplexies and cataracts are not the effects of a like power, and do not indicate the presence of a congealing agency."

But only partially can one participate in the critic's satisfaction with these methods:

"But this is enough; when the search is so eager, when the paths in which it proceeds are so numerous, when it is so scrupulous in making certain of its basis, the issue of the pursuit is sure; we are but a few steps from the truth."

Such methods served their turn in that age, and indeed were all that they could then hav, but since then conditions hav changed. Now learning is abundant and easily accessible; from many and varied paths seekers return, if not with full solutions, at least with information valuable and new, and let future explorers at least not disdain to profit by that information, rather than wander aimlessly in unrewarding jungles or in discoveries of that which has been discovered, and perhaps better known and described, many times before. In short, knowledge must come before conjecture, learning before hypothesis, instruction before construction; and Freethinkers must, before entering upon work in their respectiv fields, reap the benefit of former work therein by study, far deeper and more exhaustiv than is now practiced, of standard works on their specialties—on the marriage question, on the prohibition question, on history, religion, science, and philosophy.

On philosophy, among the many popular compendiums lately published, one of the most readable and fascinating is this "Philosophy of Disenchantment"—the history of pessimism. Not only is this unique book divested of the dryness of many philosophical works by the fact that its subject is one which lies nearest the heart and is, indeed, the paramount question to all—the question of happiness or unhappiness—but the doctrin presented is one that challenges especial attention from all Freethinkers, as being a rising belief diametrically antagonistic to all their views and relentlessly subversiv of all their ideals. The pessimists are the advocates of retrogression; the Freethinkers of progression; pessimism forebodes a future of constantly increasing woe, Freethought sees the dawn of a golden age. As the author observes:

"The most violent opposition that pessimism has had to face has come from the Socialists. For the Socialists, while pessimists as to the present, hav optimistic views for the future. Their cry is not against the misery of the world, but against the capital that produces it. . . .

"It will be readily understood that such a doctrin, which is chiefly concerned in disproving the value of every aspect of progress, was certain to call out many replies from those who see a vast area for the expansion of human comfort and happiness in the future developments of social life."

The simple necessity, the possibility, of such a work as this is in itself the excuse for the existence of the new reformers. It is precisely because of the things narrated herein—because, under intolerance, tyranny, and persecution so much suffering has been engendered, hope and aspiration hav become so deadened, and futurity has become wrapped in such gloom that it became possible for many of our ablest minds to be led into accepting misery as inevitable, formulating it into a creed, and asserting its permanence—that the reformers of to-day are raising their protest and gathering for their work. To Freethinkers such records are an appeal, a justification, and an impulse.

The author, himself a pessimist and disciple of Schopenhauer, opens with a chapter on "The Genesis of Disenchantment," giving the many expressions of individual discontent that hav reached us from the remotest times down to the present. "As a creed," he says, "the birthplace of pessimism is to be sought on the banks of the Ganges, or far back in the flowerlands of Nepaul, where the initiate, with every desire lulled, awaits Nirvana, and murmurs only, 'Life is evil.'" Among the gloomy philosophers of Greece and Rome, Sophocles, Æschylus, Euripides, Empedocles, Plato, Socrates, Seneca, and many others testify to the misery and futility of life. Among them one Hegesias, a disciple of Socrates, "argued that life was undesirable with such persuasiv eloquence that several of his listeners put his ideas into instant practice, and that the city might be preserved from the contagion of suicide, King Ptolemy felt himself obliged to prevent this seductiv misanthrope from delivering any further harangs." In English literature the gloomy German temperament has left melancholy sufficient to make happy any collaborateur less averse to being pleased than the present. In France, however, he finds that "pessimism cannot be said to hav been ever regarded otherwise than as an intellectual curiosity. The Frenchman, it is true, not infrequently lapses into a cynical indifference; yet the value of life is as a rule so evident to him that he seldom vouchsafes more than a passing shrug to any theory of disparagement." In Germany, he says, "during the eighteenth century the majority of the scholars who represented the culture of Germany were faithfully following the optimist theories of Leibnitz and Wolf." Kant was the first to change the current opinion of that country in favor of misanthropy. "Happiness," he says, "has never been attained by man. . . . No one has a right conception of life who would care to prolong it beyond its natural duration, for it would then be only the continuation of an already tiresome struggle." Fichte and Hegel, following, corroborated his views, and all traces of optimistic thought left by Leibnitz soon disappeared. Meanwhile Leopardi, the Italian poet, elaborated his pessimistic views and prepared the way for Schopenhauer's great work in 1818.

Next follows a sketch of the life of this "high priest of pessimism," and an exceedingly able and clear review of his doctrins. Among this great philosopher's many postulations, grand in their breadth and originality, and fascinating in the manner of their presentation, we can notice only one or two, which are so singular, and hav challenged so much attention and opposition as to deserve at least a few sentences. One of these is the doctrin of the negativity, the unreality, of happiness. Men had before been told, and many believed, that the table which was there was not there, but it was reserved for Schopenhauer to discover that when we are happy we are not happy:

"Pain, according to Schopenhauer, is positiv, the one thing that is felt; while on the other hand satisfaction, or, as it is termed, happiness, is a purely negativ condition. . . . To this conclusion the optimist will naturally object, but he does so in the face of history and experience."

This position Schopenhauer supported by an abundance of plausible arguments, presented in a style of incomparable clearness and grace. His code of ethics Mr. Saltus presents as follows:

"Schopenhauer reduces every human action to one, or sometimes to two, or at most three motivs: the first is selfishness, which seeks its own welfare; the second is the perversity or viciousness which attacks the welfare of others; and the third is compassion, which seeks their good. The egotist has but one sincere desire, and that is the greatest possible amount of personal well-being. Above him is the man who never violates the rights of others—unless he has a tempting opportunity, and can do so with every reasonable assurance of safety—the respectable citizen who pays his taxes and pew rent, and once in a while serves on the jury. On a higher level is he who, possessing a considerable income, uses but little of it for himself and givs the rest to the poor, the man who makes less distinction than is usually made between himself and others. Such a one is as little likely to let others starve while he himself has enough and to spare, as another would be to hunger one day that he might eat more the next. To a man of this description the veil of Maya, which may be taken to mean the veil of illusions, has become transparent. He recognizes himself in every being, and consequently in the sufferer. Let this veil of Maya be lifted from the eyes of a man to such an extent that he makes no distinction at all between himself and others, and is not only highly benevolent, but ready at all times to sacrifice himself for the common good; then he has in him the holiness of the saint and the germ that may flower into renunciation. The phenomenon, Schopenhauer says, by which this change is marked is the transition from virtue to asceticism. In other words, it then no longer suffices for him to love others as himself; there arises within him a horror of the kernel and essence of the world, which recognizably is full of misery, and of which his own existence is an expression, and thereupon denying the nature that is in him, and ceasing to will anything, he givs himself up to complete indifferentism to all things."

Here appears his remedy for the misery of mankind. He expects that in the far future the misery of the world, increasing proportionally with its civilization, will become so unbearable, and the consciousness of it so acknowledged, that, "when the appetite for death has been so highly cultivated, and compassion so generally practiced that a widespread and united pity is felt for all things, then, through universal and absolute chastity," the human race is to disappear and be no more. However, a difficulty arises. "The women," says Schopenhauer, "refuse to join in the enterprise, and that is why I hate them." He complains that "Love is the supreme will to liv, the genius of the species, and nature, being highly stragetic, covers itself, for the fulfilment of its aims, with a mask of objectiv admiration, and deludes the individual so cleverly therewith, that he takes that to be his own happiness which, in reality, is but the maintenance of the species. Lovers," he says, "mistakenly luxuriate in the idea that they are happy, whereas, in truth, they hav simply given themselvs up as a sacrifice to the preservation of the species. . . . But why do they seem so timid? Why are their actions so mysterious? It is because they are traitors who would perpetuate the pain which, without them, would soon come to that end which they would prevent, as others hav done before them." Which is truly a remarkable explanation of the nature of the modesty of chaste love.

In a chapter on "The Conduct of Life," Schopenhauer inconsistently admits that, "as a general rule, nine-tenths of happiness may be said to rest on the state of health; when this is perfect, anything and everything may be a source of pleasure." If, allowing this to be true, we then listen to the predictions made by many medical men and scientists of an approaching grand victory of scienceover disease, may we not expect a realization of all the hopes of optimism? M. Renan has suggested that, as a means of human deliverance from misery, and substitute for Schopenhauer's method of chastity, "in the advance of science some one might discover a force capable of blowing the planet to atoms, and which, if successfully handled, would, of course, annihilate pain." But, the wish being father to the thought, it seems never to hav occurred to any of these philosophers of disenchantment that a far less improbable discovery would be that of a force capable of preventing that ill-health which is confessedly the cause of nine-tenths of all suffering.

Next follows an account of a personal interview with Hartmann, Schopenhauer's successor, with a delightfully clear and readable examination of his doctrins. These, it seems, were much like those of his master, the principal difference being that between their proposed methods for the destruction of humanity. The plan of Hartmann is that of a gigantic suicide of the entire race, to be accomplished by a united effort of the will.

The book closes with the chapter, "Is Life an Affliction?" containing an ably written examination of the evils and blessings of life, and arguments pro and con. The author sums up his opinions thus:

"But in spite of its vagaries. pessimism, as expounded by Schopenhauer and Hartmann, possesses a real and enduring value which it is difficult to talk away; it is naturally most easy to laugh, in the heyday of youth and health, at its fantastic misanthropy; indeed, it is in no sense perfect; it has halted and tripped many times; it has points that even to the haphazard and indifferent spectator are weak and faulty, and yet what creed is logically perfect, and what creed is impregnable to criticism? That there is none such can be truly admitted. The reader, then, may well afford to be a little patient with pessimism; theoretically it is still in its infancy, but with increasing years its blunders will giv way to strength; and though many of the theories that it now holds may alter, the cardinal, uncontrovertible tenet that life is a burden will remain firm and changeless to the end of time."

On the whole, the work is an excellently written and instructiv treatis. Though containing views which will no doubt be repugnant to every Liberal reader, it will be none the less beneficial to him for that; and it is an admirable contribution toward the filling of a long-felt want—the need of philosophy in a popular and attractiv form.

UNIVERSAL HISTORY.
FOR
HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

Freethinkers will find this, for an outline, history the best for their use, as Professor Cottinger is a Freethinker, and in his reports of the church's actions has stated facts with a truthful freedom not found in ordinary histories. He dates his work from the beginning of historical certainty and not from the mythical Eden, as do most "universal" historians, and brings it down to 1883, with a brief mention of subsequent important inventions and discoveries.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Gems of Thought.

WHY, tell me, has not every person born the same natural right to the land of the world that he has to drink of the waters of springs and streams, to breathe the pure free air of heaven, and to bask in the glorious sunlight which shines for all?——D. M. Bennett.

IT is curious to note the back streams which always run against a great current of opinion. Against the great current of skepticism is now running a back stream of ecclesiastical apparition and miracle. While the existence of a deity is questioned in the Conservativ press of highly enlightened countries, the Virgin appears in Knock in Ireland, and an old woman is cured of her rheumatism by a pill of cement sent her by a priest from the favored church. Of course the vision was seen, and the cure was really experienced. . . . The Holy Coat of Traver, thirty years ago, performed temporary cures in rheumatic and nervous cases; to giv a man who had lost a leg or arm a new limb was beyond its power. Vision and miracle hav not ventured to display themselvs much on this side of the Atlantic; instead of choosing countries in which their influence might be useful in combatting skepticism, they unaccountably waste themselvs on those in which nobody needs to be converted.—Toronto Bystander (December).

THE idea that God is a being of virtue and of love has not been attained even in the present day except by a cultivated few. Such is the frailty of the human heart that men, even when they strive to imagin a perfect being, stain him with their passions, and raise up an idol which is defectiv as a moral form. The God of the Christians is called a God of love; but it is said that he punishes the crimes and even the errors of a short and troubled life with tortures which will hav no end. It is not even a man which theologians create; for no man is quite without pity; no man, however cruel he might be, could bear to gaze forever on the horrors of the fire and the rack; no man could listen forever to voices shrieking with pain and ever crying out for mercy and forgivness. If such is the character of the Christian God, if such is the idea that is worshiped by compassionate and cultivated men, what are we to expect in a barbarous age?—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

We look before and after,
And pine for what is not;
Our sincerest laughter
With some pain is fraught;
Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought. —Shelley.

Do not despise death, but be well content with it, since this, too, is one of those things which nature wills. For such as it is to be young and to grow old, and to increase and to reach maturity, and to hav teeth and a beard and gray hairs, and to beget and to be pregnant and to bring forth, and all other natural operations which the seasons of thy life bring, such also is dissolution. This, then, is consistent with the character of a reflecting man, to be neither careless nor impatient nor contemptuous with respect to death, but to wait for it as one of the operations of nature. —Antoninus.

MEN fear death as children fear to go into the dark; and as that natural fear in children is increased with tales, so is the other. , . . The fear of death, as the tribute due unto nature, is weak. . . Certainly the Stoics [of which sect Antoninus is one of the greates, if not the greatest, ornaments] bestowed too much cost upon death, and by their great preparations made it appear more fearful. Bet er saith the poet Juvenal, "who places death among the gifts of nature." It is as natural to die as to be born, and to a little infant, perhaps, the one is as painful as the other.—Bacon's Essays.

'Tis a long, 'tis a last, 'tis a beautiful rest,
When all sorrow is passed from the brow and the breast,
And the lone spirit truly and wisely may crave
The sleep that is dreamless, the sleep of the grave.
—Eliza Cook.

CHRISTIANITY is pernicious to the intellect; it demands that the reason shall be sacrificed upon the altar; it orders civilized men to believe in the legends of a savage race. It places a hideous image, covered with dirt and blood, in the Holy of Holies; it rends the sacred Vail of Truth in twain. It teaches that the creator of the universe, that sublime, that insembable power, exhibited his back to Moses and ordered Hosea to commit adultery and Ezekiel to eat dung. There is no need to say anything more. Such a religion is blasphemous and foul. Let those who are able to do so admire it. I, for my part, feel it my duty to set free from its claims as many as I can.—Winwood Reade.

LET not future things disturb thee, for thou wilt come to them, if it shall be necessary, having with thee the same reason which now thou usest for present things.—Antoninus.

IF evils come not, then our fears are vain.
And if they do, fear but augments the pain.
—Sir Thomas More.

RACE, temperament, mental capacity, habit, education, produce such differences between man and man that a proposition which to one man appears self-evident and unquestionable will by another be admitted only after considerable hesitation, while a third will regard it as doubtful or even false. Especially is this the case, as Locke does not fail to point out, with many of the principles of religion and morals, which hav now been received by so constant a tradition in most civilized nations that they hav come to be regarded as indepsndent of reason, and, if not "engraven on the mind" from its birth, at least exempt from discussion and criticism. The circumstance, however, that they are not universally acknowledged shows that to mankind in general, at any rate, they are not axiomatic, and that, however clear and convincing the reasons for them may be, at all events those reasons require to be stated. It was this vigorous and determined protest against multiplying assumptions and attempting to withdraw a vast mass of propositions, both speculativ and practical, from the control and revision of reason, that, perhaps, constituted the most distinctiv and valuable part of Locke's teaching.—Fowler's Locke.

"I wouldn't marry the best man living," she said,
And she kept her vow from the first;
But she did not liv to die an old maid,
For she married one of the worst.

EMPLOYER to clerk: "I don't object to your going to a funeral once in a while, but I think you might bring me home a fish or two." Sun blush on the end of the clerk's nose extends rapidly to his eyes.

AN insane judge in California retained his seat and made decisions for six months after he became crazy. It is astonishing how it was ever found out. He probably acted strangely when he was off the bench.

A MISCHIEVOUS boy of Port Jackson
His grandfather's cushion put tacks on;
Then feigned great surprise
At seeing him rise,
And hearing his fierce Anglo-Saxon.

A LADY of experience observes that a good way to pick out a husband is to see how patiently he waits for his dinner when it is behind time. Her husband remarks that a good way to pick out a wife is to see whether the woman has dinner ready in time.

"MY dear, what makes you always yawn?"
The wife exclaimed, her temper gone.
"Is home so dull and dreary?"
"Not so my love," he said, "not so;
But man and wife are one, you know,
And when I'm alone I'm weary."

A METHODIST conference in Georgia has forbidden church-members in its jurisdiction to attend baseball matches. It is supposed the members lose their money by betting on the games, and hav just that much less to invest in the wheel of fortune and other games of chance at church fairs.

"DRIED tongue" was the laconic answer made by a minister to the question, "What hav you in that package?" The contents were two old sermons. The New York Times figures that seven thousand "barreled sermons" will be made useless by the change of one text in the revised Old Testament.

A PHYSICIAN says: "The reason a man staggere when he is drunk" is owing to the fact "that th nervous system, which has its seat in the brain and spinal cord, divides its responsibility among its several parts—the cerebellum presiding over the coordination of the moyement, the cerebrum over volitional life, and the medulla oblongata over respiration." This shows how easy it is to be mistaken We always attributed it to the whisky.—Puck.

THE general superintendent of a Michigan railroad was on the train the other day when the conductor stopped it to put a man off because he had no money to pay his fare. When the train started on again the superintendent anxiously inquired: "Are you sure he wasn't a member of the legislature?" "Morally sure." "And that he didn't belong to the press?" "I don't think he did." "And that he wasn't a workingman's advocate?" "He didn't look like one." "Well, be very careful. The only people we can afford to offend in these ticklish times are local passengers, who hav got to ride on this road or take the highway."

THEY were singing the hymn, "I Hav a Father in the Promised Land," when a seedy-looking individual was seen weeping at the door. The usher walked up to him and asked him if he felt the spirit moving him. "No, not exactly," he snuffled. "Then, my dear sir," said the usher, "why do you feel so dejected?" "Well; I'll tell ye," said the man. "Them folks up in front are singin' about havin' a father in the promised land, and it makes me sad when I hear it, for I've got a father, but he's not in the promised land. He's in jail for stealing a horse, and it makes me sad to see how much better off they are than me. It's just my luck."—Evansville Argus.

OVERHEARD on the board-walk at Atlantic City: "It's perfectly scandalous—that girl's got neither shoes nor stockings on—I wouldn't make such a fright of myself for a million dollars—just look at that fat woman—that man away out there will surely get drowned—that girl in the sand had four times as much hair on at the dinner-table—well, I never—it's awfully shocking—girls don't seem to care a cent for modesty when in bathing—I wouldn't pity that girl out there if she'd get drowned—they ought to hav a rope around their waists when they go in the water, with one end tied to something on the shore—if I had such pipe-stem le—look at that Jumbo!"—and so forth.

WHY SHE WAS SALTED.

The Sunday-school was hushed and still
And the parson led in prayer,
Then said a speech would now be made
By a stranger who was there.

The lesson told, that day, the fate
Of the cities razed by fire;
And of the great reward of those
Who did the Lord's desire.

And then the stranger spoke of those
Who disobeyed God's law.
Said they the end of such as sinned
In the death of Lot's wife saw.

To impress the fact he asked a class,
Small eight-year urchins they,
Why God had turned Lot's wife to salt
On that ill-fated day.

One little rascal made response,
With grimy hand upheld;
His shrill voice sounded loud and clear:
"She was too fresh," he yelled.

A CAMP-MEETING held by Northern Methodists (colored) at Piney Hill, Rutherford county, N. C., was attacked on August 27th by an armed body of Zion Methodists and fired into. The Northern Methodists fled in disorder, seven of them being wounded. The invaders then collected the effects of the routed party, piled them up, and made a bonfire of them.

A LONDON journal, quoting statistics to back it up, presents as a moral paradox the statement that the most poorly paid working girls in the metropolis are those engaged in the work of sewing and binding Bibles. It adds that "for every heathen abroad who can be induced to use the sacred volume for anything else than gun wadding a dozen of these girls are driven to perdition at home."

THE Rev. J. H. Shay, Congregationalist, of Streator, Ill., announces that he will retire from the pulpit because he no longer believes in the positions of Congregational orthodoxy. Mr. Shay believes, among other things, that the ministerial office is not one of God's appointment; that Christ was "nearer to divinity than other mortals;" that there is a God, though all that may be predicated concerning him "lacks the essential element of proof," and that the Bible is a "record of God's thoughts and ways in so far as it is a record of the results of man's application of the powers under his control."

A UTICA paper reports the case of "a beautiful girl, unusually robust, who has become a raving maniac through over-indulgence in roller-skating." This is very sad. The telegraph on Monday reported the case of Rev. J. R. Speck, a preacher of Canton, Ga., who attempted to commit suicide while "deranged on the question of holiness." This is also very sad.—Norristown Herald.

A TORONTO newspaper tells of the late Lord Houghton that about 1877 he visited Toronto, and was taken about the city by a citizen in a carriage. Bidding the coachman pause as they reached a sacred edifice in the eastern division of the town, the merchant said, "And what do you think of that, my lord?" "A splendid building, so substantial and handsome; and, pray, sir, what denomination owns it—the Church of England, I suppose?" "No, my lord, the ——." "You don't say so! The arrogance of these dissenters!"

THE Merchant Traveler tells this: A pious young man had stopped at an Indiana hotel for a week, and when he came home he was investigated as to the customs of the town, and also of the house. "Did they ask you to ask the blessing?" inquired an old lady. "Yes, ma'm, they did." "And did you do it?" "No, ma'm, I didn't." "Goodness gracious, why didn't you?" "Because, ma'm, it didn't look to me, from the appearance of things, that the Lord was anywhere within hearing distance, so I didn't see any use in it."

IT is a singular anomaly that while Protestants denounce Catholics bitterly as opponents of the divorcement of church and state, there is a large Protestant organization in this country whose efforts are concentrated upon the work of securing an amendment to the United States Constitution, engrafting into that sacred and venerable document the recognition of the Christian God, the divinity of Jesus, the inspiration of the Bible, and the sanctity of the first day of the week; and yet the Catholics hav never asked for any such recognition of these religious dogmas by the government.—Sunday Gazetteer.

SOME person who must believe in an eternal future life, judging from the reckless way he wastes his time, has ascertained the following alleged facts: The Bible contains 3,586,489 letters, 773,692 words, 31,173 verses, 1,189 chapters, and 66 books. The word and occurs 46,277 times. The word Lord occurs 1,855 times. The word reverend occurs but once, which is in the 9th verse of the 111th Psalm. The middle verse is the 8th verse of the 118th Psalm. The 21st verse of the 7th chapter of Ezra contains all the letters of the alphabet except the letter F. The 19th chapter of 2 Kings and the 37th chapter of Isaiah are alike. The longest verse is the 9th verse of the 8th chapter of Esther. The shortest verse is the 35th verse of the 11th chapter of St. John. There are no words or names of more than six syllables.

THE Socialistic-Communistic-Anarchistic party, of which Herr Most has been the head, is badly disorganized. A dispatch from Philadelphia says that in that city their society is disrupted, and their organ, Die Zukunft, has just suspended publication, and is not likely to be resurrected. Die Zukunft means "the future," but it would seem that the organ of the Anarchists, despite its name, will hav no future whatever to speak of, after its press and types are sold to satisfy the clamorings of creditors. The last copy of the paper, just issued from the press, teems with bitter invectivs aimed at the New York Socialists. It openly charges Herr Most with having betrayed the organization; with being a spy in the pay of the German government, and with taking money intrusted to him for the cause of liberty and squandering it upon himself. It charges Most with having betrayed Leiska, who killed Police Commissioner Rumpff, of Frankfort, and with having affiliated, associated with, supported, and recognized "scab" workmen of Philadelphia, and that money intrusted to him for the purpose of agitation has been spent to the injury of all papers which are rivals of Freiheit.

THE recent church difficulty in Georgia is producing a great many laughs all over the country. The colored people who are religious are intensely so, and nothing stirs them up so much as the arrangements for going to glory. The trouble was about a colored girl belonging to a Baptist family, who attended a Methodist revival. She "took religion" the very first time she was exposed, and wanted to be baptized too quick. The Methodists baptized her by sprinkling, and when she got home there was trouble. Her family abused her for the disgrace she had brought upon them by joining the Methodists, and she said she was not to blame, as she did not know it was loaded, but that excuse would not work, so the Baptists were called in council to see what could be done. It was decided to hav the Methodist minister who sprinkled the girl arrested for assault and battery, and a warrant was served on him. What the result is going to be is not known, but the two denominations are by the ears, and will probably begin to kill each other by the last of the week. We may laugh at the poor, ignorant colored people, but how near they act like some white churches!—Peck's Sun.

THE manner in which Canadian priests use their parishioners may be inferred from the following note from the Toronto News: "It is not likely that the case of Rev. J. J. Egan, of Parkhill, charged with doing grievous bodily harm to Duncan McCaigue, will come to trial. It will be remembered that on Sunday, Nov. 16th, of last year, McCaigue, who is an old man of seventy years of age, and at that time a county road inspector, attended mass at the Catholic church at Thornhill, accompanied by his daughter. On reaching the pew they found the door closed, with a seat nailed across it. This was said to hav been done in consequence of McCaigue's refusal to make a certain contribution to the funds of the church. While they were sitting in the pew Father Egan, the pastor of the church, approached it and ordered McCaigue out, at the same time dragging him, so McCaigue alleged. The result was that on reaching the door McCaigue either fell or was thrown down the steps and sustained a severe fracture of the thigh. Father Egan was summoned before a magistrate and committed for trial. The case was traversed from the winter to the spring and from the spring to the summer assizes, owing to McCaigue being unable to attend court. Mr. Ritchie, of Ritchie & Leeming, was instructed to institute a civil suit for damages against Father Egan, but this had to be laid over until the criminal charge was disposed of. The civil suit, however, has been settled by Father Egan paying McCague $450 in cash."

A SAMPLE revival was that at Pitman Grove, thus described in the Philadelphia Press: Captain Kelso Carter, principal of higher mathematics in Hyatt's Chester Military Academy, took for a text from the book of Hosea the words, "Ephraim is a cake not turned," and preached from them a remarkable sermon. He said that many Christians of to-day were only half-turned cakes, done only on one side, and not baked through. We want to get turned over and done all the way through. He then preached the doctrin of sanctification, and, when through, asked all desiring this state of heart to come forward and bow at the altar. A score knelt at the altar rail, and some startling scenes followed. A middle-aged man, with black whiskers, jumped to his feet and exclaimed: "I've got it! I've got it! Glory, glory, glory!" He threw out both arms, moved his face heavenward, and shouted "Glory!" till he was hoarse. Then he clasped a brother about the neck and hugged him. Then he danced, and shouted, and jumped up and down; then climbed to the platform and exclaimed: "I'm turned over! Glory! I'm baked on both sides! Glory to God!" and he went all around, shaking hands with everybody. A woman, also, received the influence, and the dense crowd of people drew up closer, climbed on the seats, and pressed up around the altar. Several more made their way to the altar rail, and Father Stockton said: "We are going in for Pentecost. We are going twenty knots an hour, and if we keep on we shall hav Pentecost."

THE close of the fourth week in August shows the total deaths in Spain from cholera by tables to be 81,489, with the death-rate still much over 1,000 each day. The plague has diminished in Granada and in most provinces that were attacked before the middle of July, save in Cuenca, but it increases steadily in Almeira and Barcelona. From France, outside of Marseilles and Toulon, no news is to be had, though it is known that the pest is spreading daily. Cases of persons who die in two or three hours are very common. The victim is stricken down before even diarrhea or vomiting has begun, and dies in an extremity of cold on which violent friction has no effect.

THE Rev. J. L. Schultz preached a sermon at Winterstown, Pa., last Sunday, in which he eulogized General Grant. When he mentioned Grant's name, J. H. P. Fulton, who was in the congregation, sprang to his feet, brandished his arms, and cried to the minister, "Stop that!" The preacher continued his discourse and Fulton advanced up the aisle. Great confusion prevailed, which reached a crisis when the angry member sprang into the pulpit and violently assaulted the minister, knocking him down. A rush was made by the congregation to defend the pastor, and in the melee one man received a blow from Fulton's fist and another had his clothing badly torn. Order was finally restored and the sermon finished. Fulton will probably be prosecuted.

ON August 28th the sheriff of Lawrence, Kan., returned from Missouri with B. F. Talbott, who was placed in the county jail for horse-stealing committed over a year ago. Talbott was found in Calloway county, conducting a series of pronounced camp-meetings, being in charge of a circuit of two or three surrounding counties, in which work he had been for the past nine months. He is a mulatto, twenty-eight years of age, is very intelligent, and attended the Methodist Episcopal University at Baldwin City, Kan., for two years up to June, 1884, when he stole a pair of horses and sold them in Warrensburg, Mo. He stole two more horses there, and returning sold them in this county. The sheriff found Talbott holding forth in a colored church at Boydsville, and was obliged to tear him from his congregation in a fainting condition, the brothers and sisters tearfully beseeching the officer "not to take the brother away." Talbott will plead guilty.

The American Secular Union:

ITS NECESSITY AND THE JUSTICE OF ITS DEMANDS.

Among all questions there is None more important than this,
That man is born for justice.

—Cicero.

The American Secular Union is an Association which, in the estimation of many thoughtful men and women, has become a necessity of the time. It will be interesting, therefore, to ascertain wherein that necessity lies, what is the nature of the organization, and also to indicate the justice of its demands. Hitherto Freethought warfare has been largely desultory, its warriors hav lacked concerted action, and its forces hav been scattered over the field of advanced thought with less cohesion and definitness of plan than was desirable, or than its principles deserved. This, perhaps, is not altogether surprising, considering all the circumstances of the conflict in which Freethinkers hav been engaged. The old orthodox faith has gradually been crumbling to pieces, decaying to a great extent from its own inherent weakness, and the attacks upon it that hav come from numerous quarters, some interior and others exterior to its own organization. Many of the dissatisfied within its ranks hav gone outside, and ranged themselvs in different positions, since, although they were mostly agreed that the old attitude was no longer possible, there was no settled agreement between them as to the basis of their operations. The old motto, that union is strength, has been practically too much disregarded, not because it was deemed unimportant, but because no common ground of action presented itself. The principal bond of union recognized by a few of its popular leaders was a destructiv one, and a negation, however valuable it may be in its proper place, could hardly be made the basis of harmonious action in the construction of a system capable of developing the secular agencies of modern life. Hence, less organized results hav been achieved than might, no doubt, under different circumstances hav been accomplished. No one can question the usefulness of destructiv labor; but, serviceable as it has been, it could only prepare the way for something better. Each worker who thought of future results must hav foreseen that the time would arrive, sooner or later, when the conductors of these scattered forces would feel the necessity of uniting together, taking as a basis for their operations some point or points upon which they were all agreed, and thus presenting a bold front to the common enemy. Theology has gained much in the past through united action both in England and America, and, as a necessary consequence, Freethought has, to the like extent, been a loser. With the American Secular Union we seek to remedy this state of things. It is not, of course, the first time that such an attempt has been made; but in the past efforts there has too frequently been something present in the selected scheme which has marred its beauty and hindered its success. Usually the basis proposed has either been too narrow, or has been burdened with questions having no necessary connection with secular philosophy, hence many most valuable workers hav held aloof from the movement. It is not, however, my purpose to find fault with other workers on our side or their schemes, but rather to endeavor to point out what appears to me to be the necessity for a new plan, wider in the basis of its operations, broader in its views, larger in its objects, more strictly secular (as the word is understood in our philosophy) in its nature, and, therefore, more likely to be lasting and increasingly beneficial in its results.

I.—The necessity for the American Secular Union having principles upon which all can agree, including even advanced theologians.

The word Secularism has been in use in the old country for a little over a quarter of a century. Its introduction into America is much more recent. Had the use of the term been confined to the meaning originally attached to it by those who first adopted it, there can be little doubt that the constructiv aspect of the secular movement would hav met with more general success than it has done, and would hav been more widely recognized than it is at the present time. Secularism was intended to signify and to expound a system of daily life and its duties, irrespectiv entirely of all alleged supernatural beliefs and independent of all theological teachings. It was defined as purely this-worldism, without any compulsory association with views said to refer to some other-worldism.

While not in any way disapproving of destructiv efforts, the early exponents of Secularism did not make that their primary aim. Of course, every new truth taught must destroy the error which it seeks to supplant; but it is one thing to replace error with truth, and quite another to crush the error, and leave the spot which it occupied a blank. From a variety of causes, some of which possibly could not hav been avoided, secular advocacy in England has become identified principally with an Atheistic policy; consequently, the constructiv character of the movement, which its first teachings aimed at, has given place to a propagandism of a destructiv nature. To many it would be interesting to inquire into the causes of this departure from what was intended by the original advocates of Secularism. But such an inquiry would be foreign to my present purpose. One thing may be said, which is that, under the fierce and unfair antagonism which this new phase of thought had to contend with from theologians of every school or party, it is not much to be wondered at that a destructiv course should be more popular with the Freethought masses than a constructiv advocacy. The time, however, has, we believe, arrived when the conditions are more favorable for the existence of an organization more practical in its operations than was possible in the past. Moreover, in this land of free institutions and wide sympathies, it is wise of us to endeavor to avoid the rocks upon which previous workers became partially wrecked, and to keep clear of the shoals and quicksands which hav proved an impediment to others. He is a very poor Secularist indeed who does not value and attempt to profit by experience, whether it be his own or that of another. Therefore, it is our intention, with the experience of our predecessors in the same field before us, to shape our course in the future so as, if possible, to merit, and to meet with, more success than fell to their share. The ground that the American Secular Union intends to occupy is much more definit than, so far as my knowledge goes, any previous secular society in this country has covered.

We are Freethinkers—a broad and comprehensiv term; we are also Secularists, and there is certainly nothing narrow about that word or its true signification. It is, in fact, as wide as humanity itself, and exclusiv of nothing save that which is injurious to human progress. In Secularism there are certain general principles, far-reaching, comprehensiv, and calculated to effect great good if adopted, about which Freethinkers are all agreed, and in reference to which no difference of opinion can arise, except such as would be fatal to Freethought altogether; and these general principles, we submit, should be the basis of all our operations. Thus the Union teaches a philosophy of life based on personal integrity and general usefulness, believing that this life and this world in which we liv demand and will reward our utmost cultivation; that the instruments of this cultivation are reason and social effort; that the harvest to be reaped from it is happiness, general and individual. It seeks to advance the freedom of all honest members of society, irrespectiv of sex, country, or class distinctions, and to enhance the welfare of the nation at large. It demands the rights of the individual, and protests against the monopolies of the state. It claims intellectual liberty and condemns theological usurpation. It admits of no forced allegiance to any church, and persistently wars against all forms of priestcraft. It asserts that religion should be a question of individual opinion, and not of national injustice. It pleads for the emancipation of woman and the elevation of man. Secularism, as taught by the American Secular Union, avows that nobility of conduct and service to humanity can adorn our existence either with or without the belief in any continuity of consciousness after what is termed death. Upon the question of a future life each person must decide for himself or herself according to the evidence at their command; the Union strongly deprecates any dogmatism upon subjects in reference to which reason and experience teach that diversity of opinion must always obtain.

The philosophy of Secularism is to make the best in its highest sense—physically, morally, and mentally—of time, believing that rewards will follow such action, whether eternity awaits us, or "death ends all." It asserts that to establish and cement the brotherhood of man is the grandest work before us; and, to achieve this result, it advocates the claims of no one particular class, but those of all classes, affirming that the welfare of all is only to be found in the harmony of all. Thus our watchword is justice, for it is the profound belief in the equal rights of all which alone can inspire and impel us to seek the freedom and happiness of all. When equal rights are here spoken of it is intended to mean equal rights of citizenship, the training of the faculties of body and mind, and the free exercise and development of these so far as such exercise does not interfere with the rights of others. We hav been taught by the moral and social philosophies, which hav progressed so rapidly during the present century, that this life of ours is of supreme importance, that the meanest of men and women are of blood-royal, by the simple fact of their manhood and womanhood; that devotion to the elevation and ennobling of humanity furnishes an ideal whose grandeur and scope can satisfy the loftiest aspiration.

We must not overlook the fact that those who are called "advanced believers" constitute a very numerous class, and, if we do not utilize their efforts, we shall prove ourselvs guilty of a great want of wisdom. For, so far as all positiv work is concerned, most of them are at one with us, having similar aims, and differing but slightly, if at all, as to the methods by which the results sought for should be attained. With these we hope to find a common basis of action, and our united efforts will certainly do more to oust the general foe from his position than either they, or we, could accomplish single-handed. The churches are honeycombed with men who hav long ceased to believe in the traditions of their faith. They remain in the fold, not because the mental atmosphere is congenial to their taste, but because they are the victims either of custom, of fashion, or of necessity, or of the three combined. Let the American Secular Union become better known, its principles more thoroughly understood, and its exchequer well filled, and then such an exodus from the churches would in all probability be witnessed the equal of which has not been seen during the present generation. It is necessary, however, to distinguish between these "advanced believers" and the old orthodox theologians, with whom we can hav no part; they are our avowed enemies, and to coquet with them would be worse than a mistake—it would be a crime against the ancestral glories of our cause. The dauntless pioneers of Secular freedom were persecuted, tortured, imprisoned, and put to death by the orthodox devotees of theology; and it is a duty we owe to the dead to war against its creeds and dogmas with persistent energy. When we behold the strong front the orthodox party are now presenting against progressiv thought; the efforts they are making to counteract Secular influences; the powerful organizations they hav formed, backed by wealth and fashion; the elaborate machinery they hav called into existence to spread their doctrins—when we remember all this, if we are not stimulated to more united and determined action in the promulgation of our principles, we deserve to be charged with a deficiency of zeal fatal to the proper advancement of our views. To counteract these appalling evils, and to replace them with noble truths, is the primary object of the Secular Union, at the head of which is one of the noblest and most powerful exponents the cause has ever had, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

Upon the many social and political questions which confront us on every side, apart from the Nine Demands, the Secular Union urges the unrestricted right of freedom of opinion for every individual. The Union, as an organization, solicits agreement in the desire to secure a just and equally-balanced national taxation; to insist that those who require religious instruction shall be alone responsible for the expense of its teaching; to abolish all government patronage of any and all religious forms; to do away with the farce of fast and thanksgiving days; to substitute affirmation in our legal practice for the present absurd custom of swearing; to obtain the repeal of all laws that interfere with the free and intellectual use of Sunday; to show that high-toned morality is not confined to the Christian or to any other faith, but that it is allied with the humanity of man; and, finally, to protest against advantages being shown to a professor of religion that are denied to a Secularist. This is a platform sufficiently broad for good practical work. Of it we may speak in the words of Pope:

Friend, parent, neighbor, first it will embrace;
His country next, and next all human race;
Wide and more wide, the overflowing of the mind
Takes every creature in of every kind.

II.—The Twofold Nature of the Advocacy Adopted by the Union.

To avoid any misapprehension as to the nature of our advocacy, let it be distinctly understood that our work is not exclusivly constructiv. In the present condition of society that is impossible. As Charles Kingsley has said, "The mildest may find stern work to do." And unquestionably, in carrying out the program of the American Secular Union, its members will find much of such labor to be done; and the duty of doing it must not be ignored by the advocates of progress. A Sunday-school teacher is said once to hav asked a new pupil the very momentous question, "What must I do to be saved?" and the unsophisticated scholar replied, simply enough, "Get lost." And there seems to be a good deal of philosophy in this very unorthodox answer. One needs to "get lost" by the church before he can be saved by moral freedom and intellectual liberty. And the losing process is somewhat important. We must go first and destroy before we can build up. If the land were virgin soil and all the clearing done, we could at once put in our plow and bring the soil under cultivation, sow the seed, and wait hopefully for the harvest. But too much of the ground is already occupied, the theological lumber needs removing, and it would be useless to attempt to plow, let alone to sow the seed, until a clearance has been made. While, therefore, expounding those positiv principles which would raise the masses of the people from that low mental condition in which ecclesiasticism, priestcraft, and ignorance hav reduced them, we cannot ignore the fact that theological dogmas stand in the way of our enterprise; that the church does its best to deprive us of a fair opportunity of exercising our undoubted rights in the promulgation of our views; that priests are ever activ in misrepresenting our teachings; and that superstition, with its narrow creeds, its mental limitations, and its threatenings of cruel penalties, bars the path of progress. These are the agencies that hinder the recognition and acceptance by the public of the "Nine Demands;" and it is our duty to remove such impediments in order that we may hav a freer scope and a less trammeled course for constructiv action. Thus our Secular propaganda is twofold. The truth in religion, the useful in the church, the manhood of the priests, we respect and would conserve; but whatever inferferes with personal rights, intellectual liberty, and ethical culture we declare open and unflinching war against, and regard it as a service to mankind to persistently carry on the conflict to the bitter end. We proclaim the necessity of an activ, progressiv, and determined policy, uncontroled by the dogmas of theology, and undeterred by the customs of the past. Looking through society we behold poverty, ignorance, tyranny, in so far as the church is dominant; wealth, education, and freedom, in so far as the Secular power is supreme. The Protestant countries are far ahead of the truly papal ones; but why? Not because of their Christianity, but because of the Freethought and Secularism which leaven it, and are leavening it more and more. The United States do not recognize religion at all in their Constitution. Switzerland keeps the churches strictly subject to the state. Great Britain does the same, though, being the home of anomalies, it still has a state church. All the intelligence of France is Secularistic, the ignorant peasants and the legitimist gentry being about the only faithful left. Germany is the most profoundly and solidly irreligious country in Europe, and we see what a position it has taken. Italy has risen in every other way just in proportion as she has cast off the papal yoke. Spain has been reduced from the first rank among nations by the infernal Inquisition. Austria's rehabilitation came with the abolition of a papal concordat. From Australia, and even from India, we hear cheering news of the progress of Freethought. Considering the state of Christendom—how it is honeycombed with heresies, compared with its state in the Dark Ages, when the church was supreme; looking over the immense harvests which hav already been reaped from the growth of all the un-Christian and secular sciences and arts of life, and not forgetting the noble men and women whom the Christians imprisoned, and banished, and murdered for daring such unholy culture, it can well be said, in the words of the eloquent De Quincey, "These are the fields that, by the grandeur of their reaping, redeem the tears and blood in which they hav been sown."

A Workingman Talks to a Preacher.

I read in the Independent, of July 23d and 30th, two letters from Washington Gladden, D.D., of Columbus, O., under the heading, "The Working People and the Churches," and in the Boycotter, of August 15th, another short article taken from the Public Ledger, and headed with, "The Laborer and the Church."

The article in the Boycotter says the Christian Union was informed by a number of clergymen that only five per cent of the American artisans attend church in our cities. According to Rev. Gladden, in the Independent, who got all his information by writing letters to various individuals, the excuse for their not attending is chiefly through not being able to dress well, and various other reasons—all of which are wide of the truth.

It appears that Rev. Washington Gladden has taken a great deal of trouble, and got at the wrong end of the reasons for the non-attendance to church of the wage-workers in our cities. Rev. Gladden should attend about half a dozen labor meetings that are held in all our cities every Sunday evening, and he would be more likely to get at the kernel of truth. In case he would not think it right to attend a labor meeting lecture on the sun's day, I will giv a few reasons here, and he can read them on saturn's day, which is before the holy sun's day.

When a wage-worker rises in a meeting to speak to his fellow-men, he gets his text from the book of nature, and not from the Bible, which makes it right to lie, steal, or murder, and also holds labor as a disgraceful punishment. The wage-workers are not so blinded by theology to-day as they were twenty years ago, and few of them now, if any, believe the world is flat and rests on pillars; they take nature for their guide, and believe a man should hav all he produces. They hav little faith in non-producers, and they are not so blind as to be unable to see the vast army the church has of that stock; they always hav a volunteer preacher, and not one who gets ten to twenty thousand dollars a year to tell them every week how nice they will liv after they are dead by handing in a few shekels to him; they would be contented with this world if there were not so many drones in it who go in the country in hot weather to get a rest after their hard labors. When a preacher tells them the ruler of the universe is omnipresent, omniscient, and omnipotent, it is too much for them to swallow, when they look around and see the misery that ruler has thrown his children on earth in; and it is no wonder that only five per cent go to church and say, "Our father who art in heaven." Before long that five per cent will be able to see what an imperfect world a perfect God has made. The majority of wage-workers hav grown tired of your Bible God, and think he has been too long in office. They find him growing worse and worse with his earthly children—he shows too much partiality; and as he has made such a failure in this world business, don't you think it would be better if he assigned it over to some one else? Say the devil. He is not so bad as he is made out to be. He did nothing out of the way, except that little affair with Job—and that, you know, was done to please his majesty, the present ruler of the universe. The devil was our first educator, and gave Eve the first lesson in the garden of Eden—wherever that was; and your God cursed Adam and Eve and his posterity for having the audacity to do such a thing as to accept knowledge and wisdom. Why, Brother Gladden, we ought to thank the devil for that first lesson. Just think of it, and see what a fix we would be in if Eve never partook of that "tree of knowledge." We could not form any government, for we would not know the difference between right and wrong, and the smartest judge of to-day would not be able to form a code of laws. How ungrateful we are in not having a monument as large as that of George Washington erected in honor of the devil! The devil did not drown the whole world, nor did he stop the sun and moon that a sagacious monster might hav light a few minutes longer, in order to slay a few more innocent people.

When we examin the records of our penitentiaries, and find they were, and are, patronized chiefly by those who believe in faith, it is nothing to be wondered at when we find the book they hav been taught from sanctions lying, stealing, and murder. Your God, Brother Gladden, is also a warrior, an angry God, a jealous God; and I would like to know who are more so than those who follow him?

Come now, Brother Gladden, be fair! Giv the devil a chance, and let him change places with your God, and I will guarantee he will not rule this world any worse. There hav been enough prayers offered to the Bible God by different nations without any response, and people are beginning now to hav little faith in "Ask, and ye shall receive."

New York, Aug. 18, 1885. WM. E. SCOTT.

The Pseudo Poet Chatterton.

Some hav greatness thrust upon them.

How the boy Chatterton became at once a famous poet is told in the following note by the author of "Tacitus and Bracciolini:"

A bridge at Bristol was completed in 1768; thereupon a ballad of a friar crossing a Bristol bridge in the reign of Edward IV. (1461–1483) was inserted in a local journal as appropriate to the occasion. It was so sweet in its simplicity and rich in poetry, while so much judgment tempered the composition and such correctness was shown in every archæological detail, that it struck with amazement all persons of literary taste who read it. The author being inquired after was found to be an attorney's snub-nosed apprentice who copied precedents. The inquirer, becoming the victim of a thousand-fold multiplied admiration and wonder, was astounded that such a queer boy (of sixteen) turned out to be the author of such a fine ballad! The world marveled too, but became, and remains to this day, a believer that Chatterton composed all the fragments which he himself, in the first instance, truly and honestly ascribed to Rowley and other poets, who flourished in different centuries; the consequence of which is that their poems form a very curious and interesting medley of various archaic words belonging to several medieval periods.

From the poems ascribed to Lydgate (wrongly written by Chatterton, Ladgate) not being printed elsewhere, we must infer that those fragments of his, and, by induction, the fragments of the other poets, were not multiplied in copies. Consequently we must conclude that they were all so highly prized by their possessor in the 15th century, the rich Bristol merchant, Canynge, the founder of St. Mary Redcliffe, that in his last will he bequeathed the whole of these protographs, to be locked up in strong iron coffers, and deposited for safety in the church he had erected, believing, no doubt, with much propriety, that if he placed them in a sacred edifice, their preservation would be secured for the benefit of posterity. Unfortunately, if so, the stupidity of the town clerk and the mayor and aldermen of Bristol in 1727 frustrated the intention of the enlightened merchant; for when in that year those civic functionaries examined the papers in the muninent room over the north porch of St. Mary Redcliffe for the purpose of reserving only those that were valuable, they threw away as worthless all but the title deeds relating to the church.

They thus secured an immortal fame for Chatterton by enabling him (through the aid of his uncle, the sexton) to get at the contents of the chests, select what parchments he pleased, and place before the world poems which he candidly acknowledged were not his own, but which he seems to hav modernized, to hav smoothed the verse (his own commonplace rhymes showing that he had an exquisit ear for harmony, but nothing else); and here and there to hav interpolated (or supplied missing, erased, and undecipherable) words, which spoilt lines, but could not spoil the poems as masterpieces, from the classic form in which they are cast, their power of thought, brilliance, and vigor of imagination, happiness of invention, and extraordinary depth of sensibility.

One cannot help recalling Dogberry's saying that "good looks come by fortune and learning by nature," when contemplating the universal belief that Chatterton wrote the poems of Rowley.

Chatterton died before reaching the age of eighteen. His later verses of undoubted originality were very poor stuff, such as an ordinary student at college would be ashamed to produce. But those who maintain his authorship of the antique poems are compelled to believe that at the age of twelve and up to sixteen, he wrote poetry equal to any that had ever been produced in England.

ANTICHRIST, A.M.

Activ Mohammedans.

Secretary of State Bayard is in receipt of a dispatch from Sierra Leone giving accounts of the movements of an army of 100,000 men in the interior of Africa. The dispatch is dated July 14th last, and was sent by United States Consul Lewis. Mr. Lewis says:

I hav the honor to bring to the notice of the Department of State the fact of an extraordinary movement among the Mohammedans of the Nigritian regions, extending from Timbuctoo to the west coast. It appears that in 1880 a Mandingo, named Samudu, of extraordinary intelligence and energy, conceived the idea that he was called of God to wage a war for the suppression of paganism and the opening of the roads to the coast, which in certain districts hav been for generations subjected to excessiv blackmail and to the plundering of vagabond tribes. During the last five years he has collected an army, consisting of foot and horse, of about 100,000 men. Mohammedan youths, wherever he goes, flock to his standard, anxious not only to secure the reward in the hereafter promised to those who fight for their religion, but to carry off the rich spoils of time which these expeditions that battle for the faith are sure to win. It is said that Samudu's army is divided into three portions. One is operating near the headwaters of the Niger. This portion recently drove certain French troops from the gold regions of Boure, of which they had taken possession, and are now besieging Bammakoo, a large town on the Niger, occupied about three years ago by the French, who hav erected fortifications there. Another portion of the army is operating in the regions east of Liberia, and by suppressing the disturbing elements, unfettering trade, and introducing a knowledge of religion and letters, is in one sense opening the way for negro immigrants of intelligence and energy from America to push out from the Africo-American Republic to the healthy and fertil regions of the interior. In another sense, it is forestalling the whole region for Mohammedanism, and making it difficult, if not impossible—if indeed it is desirable—to convert that country to the faith imported from America by the immigrants.

The third portion of the army is approaching the coast a few miles northwest of Sierra Leone. It has secured the submission, by force or voluntary surrender, of all the tribes on the way for five hundred miles back. The largest and most important pagan kingdom on this side of the Niger was Soolima, of which Talaba, a large commercial city, was the capital. For the last sixty years the Fula Mohammedans hav been trying by diplomacy and by arms to subdue this city to the faith, but it has always successfully resisted both diplomat and warrior. Last year Samudu's army, in overwhelming numbers, surrounded it and called upon the king to surrender and profess Islam. This he refused to do. The town was then invested, and after a terrible siege of five months the king assembled the royal family and principal chiefs in his powder house and informed them that he could hold out no longer, as his resources were exhausted, but having for more than two hundred years belonged to the ruling element, he was determined for himself and family to die rather than come under Mohammedan rule. He gave the chiefs their choice either to die with him or go out of town and giv themselvs up to the enemy. They decided to die with him. He then set fire to the powder-house, and they were all blown up. Thus ended the Soolima power, which for more than seven generations had influenced the trade and politics of extensiv districts, and had commanded the principal highways to the coast.

Another very important achievement of this army is the destruction of the Hooboo power—an irresponsible organization which for thirty years has been an annoyance and loss to caravans passing from the interior to the coast. Samudu gave orders to attack them in their mountain strongholds, which until then had proved inaccessible to the neighboring forces. They were surprised. Their chief, Abal, was captured and decapitated, and his arms and legs, severed from the trunk, were sent to the various countries whose inhabitants had suffered from his predatory and murderous proceedings. The Hooboos are described as renegade faulahs in rebellion against the king of Timboo. The roads hav now been cleared of these thieves and murderers, so that an unprotected child or female may travel in safety all through the district. These operations will not be without a salutary effect upon American commerce, for there is in that country an increasing demand for American productions, and many of the articles produced by the people are valuable in American trade. Samudu's army is now only a few miles from the coast northwest of Sierra Leone. It is said to be their purpose now to deal with the Timuch and Sherbro countries, whose constant wars keep the maritim regions in such a state of ferment that often the caravans hav struggled through obstructions for hundreds of miles. They find their greatest difficulty among the coast tribes, and often fall victims to the latter. Samudu proposes to settle these districts, or, if not able, to seize the professional warriors, who are the chief causes of disorder, and transport them to the distant interior, where there will be no opportunity for the gratification of their warlike proclivities. It is not known here what steps the government of Sierra Leone will take in view of the proceedings of this force from the interior, but it is believed that a judicious co-operation with them on the part of the British authorities would effect great good for the freedom and permanent security of trade in the regions contiguous to the colony.

The Sibylline Acrostic.

The most celebrated of the Sibylline books, the Erythrean, contains an acrostic in Greek, now extant, the initial letters of which are:

Iesous Chreistos, Theou Uios, Soter, Stauros
(Jesus Chreist, God's Son, Savior, Stake).

That the acrostic was written at least a century B.C. is pretty certain. . . . Cicero, who was born 106 B.C., assails the Sibyl's prophecy as too vague in regard to the great person whose coming is foretold, and points to the "art and contrivance" in the "acrostic" (De Div., lib. ii). Eusebius affirms that Cicero quoted these very verses which contain the acrostic.

The word Chreistos is not found in our Greek lexicons, and yet it was in use long before the Christian era. It could not hav been derived from chrio, "to anoint," therefore it was not spelt Christos. It may hav been derived from chreo (also chreio), Ionic for chrao, "to deliver an oracle" (Don. Lex.).

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S IDEAS

UPON SOME LIVE TOPICS.

[Not long ago the Secretary of the League and our "funny brother," as Charles Watts calls George Macdonald, called upon Colonel Ingersoll at his hotel at Long Beach. The brother had with him a long clipping from the Brooklyn Eagle, which he showed Mr. Ingersoll, remarking that if it was true it would grace THE TRUTH SEEKER'S broad columns. Mr. Ingersoll calmly put it into his vest pocket. Noticing, probably, a look of sadness on the face of the junior Macdonald as the article disappeared, he said that if there were any questions which THE TRUTH SEEKER desired he should answer, he would do so if they were sent to his office. The following interview is the result:]

Q. Shall you attend the Albany Freethought Convention?

A. I have agreed to be present not only, but to address the Convention, on Sunday, the 13th of September. From all I hear, the Convention is going to be a success. I am greatly gratified to know that the interest in the question of intellectual liberty is growing from year to year. Everywhere I go it seems to be the topic of conversation. No matter upon what subject people begin to talk, in a little while the discussion takes a religious turn, and people who a few moments before had not the slightest thought of saying a word about the churches, or about the Bible, are giving their opinions in full. I hear discussions of this kind in all the public conveyances, at the hotels, on the piazzas at the seaside—and they are not discussions in which I take any part, because I rarely say anything upon these questions except in public, unless I am directly addressed.

There is a general feeling that the church has ruled this world long enough. People are beginning to see that no amount of eloquence, or faith, or erudition, or authority, can make the records of barbarism satisfactory to the heart and brain of this century. They have also found that a falsehood in Hebrew is no more credible than in plain English. People at last are beginning to be satisfied that cruel laws were never good laws, no matter whether inspired or uninspired. The Christian religion, like every other religion depending upon inspired writings, is wrecked upon the facts of Nature. So long as inspired writers confined themselves to the supernatural world; so long as they talked about angels, and Gods, and heavens, and hells; so long as they described only things that man has never seen, and never will see, they were safe, not from contradiction, but from demonstration. But these writings had to have a foundation, even for their falsehoods, and that foundation was in Nature. The foundation had to be something about which somebody knew something, or supposed they knew something. They told something about this world that agreed with the then general opinion. Had these inspired writers told the truth about Nature—had they said that the world revolved on its axis, and made a circuit about the sun—they could have gained no credence for their statements about other worlds. They were forced to agree with their contemporaries about this world, and there is where they made the fundamental mistake. Having grown in knowledge, the world has discovered that these inspired men knew nothing about this earth; that the inspired books are filled with mistakes—not only mistakes that we can contradict, but mistakes that we can demonstrate to be mistakes. Had they told the truth in their day, about this earth, they would not have been believed about other worlds, because their contemporaries would have used their own knowledge about this world to test the knowledge of these inspired men. We pursue the same course; and what we know about this world we use as the standard, and by that standard we have found that the inspired men knew nothing about Nature as it is. Finding that they were mistaken about this world, we have no confidence in what they have said about another. Every religion has had its philosophy about this world, and every one has been mistaken. As education becomes general, as scientific modes are adopted, this will become clearer and clearer, until "ignorant as inspiration" will be a comparison.

Q. Have you seen the memorial to the New York legislature, to be presented this winter, asking for the repeal of such laws as practically unite church and state?

A. I have seen a memorial asking that church property be taxed like other property; that no more money should be appropriated from the public treasury for the support of institutions managed by and in the interest of sectarian denominations; for the repeal of all laws compelling the observance of Sunday as a religious day. Such memorials ought to be addressed to the legislatures of all the states. The money of the public should only be used for the benefit of the public. Public money should not be used for what a few gentlemen think is for the benefit of the public. Personally, I think it would be for the benefit of the public to have Infidel or scientific—which is the same thing—lectures delivered in every town, in every state, on every Sunday; but knowing that a great many men disagree with me on this point, I do not claim that such lectures ought to be paid for with public money. The Methodist church ought not to be sustained by taxation, nor the Catholic, nor any other church. To relieve their property from taxation is to appropriate money, to the extent of that tax, for the support of that church. Whenever a burden is lifted from one piece of property, it is distributed over the rest of the property of the state, and to release one kind of property is to increase the tax on all other kinds.

There was a time when people really supposed that churches were saving souls from the eternal wrath of a God of infinite love. Being engaged in such a philanthropic work, and at that time nobody having the courage to deny it—the church being all-powerful—all other property was taxed to support the church; but now the more civilized part of the community, being satisfied that a God of infinite love will not be eternally unjust, feel as though the church should support herself. To exempt the church from taxation is to pay a part of the priest's salary. The Catholic now objects to being taxed to support a school in which his religion is not taught. He is not satisfied with the school that says nothing on the subject of religion. He insists that it is an outrage to tax him to support a school where the teacher simply teaches what he knows. And yet this same Catholic wants his church exempted from taxation, and the tax of an Atheist or of a Jew increased, when he teaches in his untaxed church that the Atheist and Jew will both be eternally damned! Is it possible for impudence to go further?

I insist that no religion should be taught in any school supported by public money; and by religion I mean superstition. Only that should be taught in a school that somebody can learn and that somebody can know. In my judgment, every church should be taxed precisely the same as other property. The church may claim that it is one of the instruments of civilization and therefore should be exempt. If you exempt that which is useful, you exempt every trade and every profession. In my judgment, theaters have done more to civilize mankind than churches; that is to say, theaters have done something to civilize mankind—churches nothing. The effect of all superstition has been to render man barbarous. I do not believe in the civilizing effects of falsehood.

There was a time when ministers were supposed to be in the employ of God, and it was thought that God selected them with great care—that their profession had something sacred about it. These ideas are no longer entertained by sensible people. Ministers should be paid like other professional men, and those who like their preach, should pay for the preach. They should depend, as actors do, upon their popularity, upon the amount of sense, or nonsense, that they have for sale. They should depend upon the market like other people, and if people do not want to hear sermons badly enough to build churches and pay for them, and pay the taxes on them, and hire the preacher, let the money be diverted to some other use. The pulpit should no longer be a pauper. I do not believe in carrying on any business with the contribution box. All the sectarian institutions ought to support themselves. There should be no Methodist, or Catholic, or Presbyterian hospitals, or orphan asylums. All these should be supported by the state. There is no such thing as Catholic charity, or Methodist charity. Charity belongs to humanity, not to any particular form of faith or religion. You will find as charitable people who never heard of religion, as you can find in any church. The state should provide for those who ought to be provided for. A few Methodists beg of everybody they meet—send women with subscription papers, getting money from all classes of people, and nearly everybody gives something from politeness, or to keep from being annoyed; and when the institution is finished, it is pointed at as the result of Methodism! Probably a majority of the people in this country suppose that there was no charity in the world until the Christian religion was founded. Great men have repeated this falsehood, until ignorance and thoughtlessness believe it. There were orphan asylums in China, in India, and in Egypt, thousands of years before Christ was born; and there certainly never was a time in the history of the whole world when there was less charity in Europe than during the centuries when the church of Christ had absolute power. There were hundreds of Mohammedan asylums before Christianity had built ten in the entire world.

All institutions for the care of unfortunate people should be secular—should be supported by the state. The money for the purpose should be raised by taxation, to the end that the burden may be borne by those able to bear it. As it is now, most of the money is paid, not by the rich, but by the generous, and those most able to help their needy fellow-citizens are the very ones who do nothing. If the money is raised by taxation, then the burden will fall where it ought to fall, and these institutions will no longer be supported by the generous and emotional, and the rich and stingy will no longer be able to evade the duties of citizenship and of humanity.

Now, as to the Sunday laws, we know that they are only spasmodically enforced. Now and then a few people are arrested for selling papers or cigars. Some unfortunate barber is grabbed by a policeman because he has been caught shaving a Christian Sunday morning. Now and then some poor fellow with a hack, trying to make a dollar or two to feed his horses, or to take care of his wife and children, is arrested as though he were a murderer. But in a few days the public are inconvenienced to that degree that the arrests stop and business goes on in its accustomed channels, Sunday and all.

Now and then society becomes so pious, so virtuous, that people are compelled to enter saloons by the back door; others are compelled to drink beer with the front shutters up; but otherwise the stream that goes down the thirsty throats is unbroken. The ministers have done their best to prevent all recreation on the Sabbath. They would like to stop all the boats on the Hudson, and on the sea—stop all the excursion trains. They would like to compel every human being that lives in the city of New York to remain within its limits twenty-four hours each Sunday. They hate the parks; they hate music; they hate anything that keeps a man away from church. Most of the churches are empty during the summer, and now most of the ministers leave themselves, and give over the entire city to the devil and his emissaries. And yet if the ministers had their way, there would be no form of human enjoyment except prayer, signing subscription papers, putting money in contribution boxes, listening to sermons, reading the cheerful histories of the Old Testament, imagining the joys of heaven and the torments of hell. The church is opposed to the theater, is the enemy of the opera, looks upon dancing as a crime, hates billiards, despises cards, opposes roller-skating, and even entertains a certain kind of prejudice against croquet.

Q. Do you think that the orthodox church gets its ideas of the Sabbath from the teachings of Christ?

A. I do not hold Christ responsible for these idiotic ideas concerning the Sabbath. He regarded the Sabbath as something made for man—which was a sensible view. The holiest day is the happiest day. The most sacred day is the one in which have been done the most good deeds. There are two reasons given in the Bible for keeping the Sabbath. One is that God made the world in six days, and rested on the seventh. Now that all the ministers admit that he did not make the world in six days, but that he made it in six "periods," this reason is no longer applicable. The other reason is that he brought the Jews out of Egypt with a "mighty hand." This may be a very good reason still for the observance of the Sabbath by the Jews, but the real Sabbath, that is to say, the day to be commemorated, is our Saturday, and why should we commemorate the wrong day? That disposes of the second reason.

Nothing can be more inconsistent than the theories and practice of the churches about the Sabbath. The cars run Sundays, and out of the profits hundreds of ministers are supported. The great iron and steel works fill with smoke and fire the Sabbath air, and the proprietors divide the profits with the churches. The printers of the city are busy Sunday afternoons and evenings, and the presses during the nights, so that the sermons of Sunday can reach the heathen on Monday. The servants of the rich are denied the privileges of the sanctuary. The coachman sits on the box out-doors, while his employer kneels in church preparing himself for the heavenly chariot. The iceman goes about on the holy day, keeping believers cool, they knowing at the same time that he is making it hot for himself in the world to come. Christians cross the Atlantic, knowing that the ship will pursue its way on the Sabbath. They write letters to their friends knowing that they will be carried in violation of Jehovah's law, by wicked men. Yet they hate to see a pale-faced sewing-girl enjoying a few hours by the sea; a poor mechanic walking in the fields; or a tired mother watching her children playing on the grass. Nothing ever was, nothing ever will be, more utterly absurd and disgusting than a Puritan Sunday. Nothing ever did make a home more hateful than the strict observance of the Sabbath. It fills the house with hypocrisy and the meanest kind of petty tyranny. The parents look sour and stern, the children sad and sulky. They are compelled to talk upon subjects about which they feel no interest, or to read books that are thought good only because they are stupid.

Q. What have you to say about the growth of Catholicism, the activity of the Salvation Army, and the success of revivalists like the Rev. Samuel Jones? Is Christianity really gaining a strong hold on the masses?

A. Catholicism is growing in this country, and it is the only country on earth in which it is growing. Its growth here depends entirely upon immigration, not upon intellectual conquest. Catholic emigrants who leave their homes in the Old World because they have never had any liberty, and who are Catholics for the same reason, add to the number of Catholics here, but their children's children will not be Catholics. Their children will not be very good Catholics, and even these immigrants themselves, in a few years, will not grovel quite so low in the presence of a priest. The Catholic church is gaining no ground in Catholic countries.

The Salvation Army is the result of two things—the general belief in what are known as the funda-mentals of Christianity and the heartlessness of the church. The church in England—that is to say, the Church of England—having succeeded—that is to say, being supported by general taxation—that is to say, being a successful, well-fed parasite—naturally neglected those who did not in any way contribute to its support. It became aristocratic. Splendid churches were built; younger sons with good voices were put in the pulpits; the pulpit became the asylum for aristocratic mediocrity, and in that way the Church of England lost interest in the masses and the masses lost interest in the Church of England. The neglected poor, who really had some belief in religion, and who had not been absolutely petrified by form and patronage, were ready for the Salvation Army. They were not at home in the church. They could not pay. They preferred the freedom of the street. They preferred to attend a church where rags were no objection. Had the church loved and labored with the poor the Salvation Army never would have existed. These people are simply giving their idea of Christianity, and in their way endeavoring to do what they consider good. I don't suppose the Salvation Army will accomplish much. To improve mankind you must change conditions. It is not enough to work simply upon the emotional nature. The surroundings must be such as naturally produce virtuous actions. If we are to believe recent reports from London, the Church of England, even with the assistance of the Salvation Army, has accomplished but little. It would be hard to find any savage country with less morality. You would search long in the jungles of Africa to find greater depravity.

I account for revivalists like the Rev. Samuel Jones in the same way. There is in every community an ignorant class—what you might call a literal class—who believe in the real blood atonement, who believe in heaven and hell, and harps, and gridirons—who have never had their faith weakened by reading commentators or books harmonizing science and religion. They love to hear the good old doctrine; they want hell described; they want it described so that they can hear the moans and shrieks; they want heaven described; they want to see God on a throne, and they want to feel that they are finally to have the pleasure of looking over the battlements of heaven and seeing all their enemies among the damned. The Rev. Mr. Munger has suddenly become a revivalist. According to the papers he is sought for in every direction. His popularity seems to rest upon the fact that he brutally beat a girl twelve years old because she did not say her prayers to suit him. Muscular Christianity is what the ignorant people want. I regard all these efforts—including those made by Mr. Moody and Mr. Hammond—as evidence that Christianity, as an intellectual factor, has almost spent its force. It no longer governs the intellectual world.

Q. Are not the Catholics the least progressive? And are they not, in spite of their professions to the contrary, enemies to republican liberty?

A. Every church that has a standard higher than human welfare is dangerous. A church that puts a book above the laws and constitution of its country, that puts a book above the welfare of mankind, is dangerous to human liberty. Every church that puts itself above the legally expressed will of the people is dangerous. Every church that holds itself under greater obligation to a pope than to a people is dangerous to human liberty. Every church that puts religion above humanity—above the well-being of man in this world—is dangerous. The Catholic church may be more dangerous, not because its doctrines are more dangerous, but because, on the average, its members more sincerely believe its doctrines, and because that church can be hurled as a solid body in any given direction. For these reasons it is more dangerous than other churches; but its doctrines are no more dangerous than those of the Protestant churches. The man who would sacrifice the well-being of man to please an imaginary phantom that he calls God, is also dangerous. The only safe standard is the well-being of man in this world. Whenever this world is sacrificed for the sake of another, a mistake has been made. The only God that man can know is the aggregate of all beings capable of suffering and of joy within the reach of his influence. To increase the happiness of such beings is to worship the only God that man can know.

Q. What have you to say to the assertion of Dr. Deems that there were never so many Christians as now?

A. I suppose that the population of the earth is greater now than at any other time within the historic period. This being so, there may be more Christians, so-called, in the world than there were a hundred years ago. Of course, the reverend doctor, in making up his aggregate of Christians, counts all kinds and sects—Unitarians, Universalists, and all the other "ans," and "ists," and "ics," and "ites," and "ers." But Dr. Deems must admit that only a few years ago most of the persons he now calls Christians would have been burnt as heretics and Infidels. Let us compare the average New York Christian with the Christian of two hundred years ago. It is probably safe to say that there is not now in the city of New York a genuine Presbyterian outside of an insane asylum. Probably no one could be found who will to-day admit that he believes absolutely in the Presbyterian Confession of Faith. There is probably not an Episcopalian who believes in the Thirty-nine Articles. Probably there is not an intelligent minister in the city of New York, outside of the Catholic church, who believes that everything in the Bible is true. Probably no clergyman, of any standing, would be willing to take the ground that everything in the Old Testament—leaving out the question of inspiration—is actually true. Very few ministers now preach the doctrine of eternal punishment. Most of them would be ashamed to utter that brutal falsehood. A large majority of gentlemen who attend church take the liberty of disagreeing with the preacher. They would have been very poor Christians two hundred years ago. A majority of the ministers take the liberty of disagreeing, in many things, with their Presbyteries and Synods. They would have been very poor preachers two hundred years ago. Dr. Deems forgets that most Christians are only nominally so. Very few believe their creeds. Very few even try to live in accordance with what they call Christian doctrines. Nobody loves his enemies. No Christian when smitten on one cheek turns the other. Most Christians do take a little thought for the morrow. They do not depend entirely upon the providence of God. Most Christians now have greater confidence in the average life insurance company than in God—feel easier when dying to know that they have a policy, through which they expect the widow will receive ten thousand dollars, than when thinking of all the scripture promises. Even church-members do not trust in God to protect their own property. They insult heaven by putting lightning-rods on their temples. They insure the churches against the act of God. The experience of man has shown the wisdom of relying on something that we know something about, instead of upon the shadowy supernatural. The poor wretches to-day in Spain, depending upon their priests, die like poisoned flies—die with prayers between their pallid lips—die in their filth and faith.

Q. What have you to say on the Mormon question?

A. The institution of polygamy is infamous and disgusting beyond expression. It destroys what we call, and what all civilized people call, "the family." It pollutes the fireside, and, above all, as Burns would say, "petrifies the feeling." It is, however, one of the institutions of Jehovah. It is protected by the Bible. It has inspiration on its side. Sinai, with its barren, granite peaks, is a perpetual witness in its favor. The beloved of God practiced it, and, according to the sacred word, the wisest man had, I believe, about seven hundred wives. This man received his wisdom directly from God. It is hard for the average Bible-worshiper to attack this institution without casting a certain stain upon his own book.

Only a few years ago slavery was upheld by the same Bible. Slavery having been abolished, the passages in the inspired volume upholding it have been mostly forgotten; but polygamy lives, and the polygamists, with great volubility, repeat the passages in their favor. We send our missionaries to Utah, with their Bibles, to convert the Mormons. The Mormons show, by these very Bibles, that God is on their side. Nothing remains now for the missionaries except to get back their Bibles and come home. The preachers do not appeal to the Bible for the purpose of putting down Mormonism. They say: "Send the army." If the people of this country could only be honest; if they would only admit that the Old Testament is but the record of a barbarous people; if the Samson of the nineteenth century would not allow its limbs to be bound by the Delilah of Superstition, it could with one blow destroy this monster. What shall we say of the moral force of Christianity, when it utterly fails in the presence of Mormonism? What shall we say of a Bible that we dare not read to a Mormon as an argument against legalized lust, or as an argument against illegal lust?

I am opposed to polygamy. I want it exterminated by law; but I hate to see the exterminators insist that God, only a few thousand years ago, was as bad as the Mormons are to-day. In my judgment, such a God ought to be exterminated.

Q. What do you think of men like the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher and the Rev. R. Heber Newton? Do they deserve any credit for the course they have taken?

A. Mr. Beecher is evidently endeavoring to shore up the walls of the falling temple. He sees the cracks; he knows that the building is out of plumb; he feels that the foundation is insecure. Lies can take the place of stones only so long as they are thoroughly believed. Mr. Beecher is trying to do something to harmonize superstition and science. He is reading between the lines. He has discovered that Darwin is only a later Saint Paul, or that Saint Paul was the original Darwin. He is endeavoring to make the New Testament a scientific text-book. Of course he will fail. But his intentions are good. Thousands of people will read the New Testament with more freedom than heretofore. They will look for new meanings; and he who looks for new meanings will not be satisfied with the old ones. Mr. Beecher, instead of strengthening the walls, will make them weaker.

There is no harmony between religion and science. When Science was a child, Religion sought to strangle it in the cradle. Now that Science has attained its youth, and Superstition is in its dotage, the trembling, palsied wreck says to the athlete: Let us be friends. It reminds me of the bargain the cock wished to make with the horse: "Let us agree not to step on each other's feet." Mr. Beecher, having done away with hell, substitutes annihilation. His doctrine at present is that only a fortunate few are immortal, and that the great mass return to dreamless dust. This, of course, is far better than hell, and is a great improvement on the orthodox view. Mr. Beecher cannot believe that God would make such a mistake as to make men doomed to suffer eternal pain. Why, I ask, should God give life to men whom he knows are unworthy of life? Why should he annihilate his mistakes? Why should he make mistakes that need annihilation?

It can hardly be said that Mr. Beecher's idea is a new one. It was taught, with an addition, thousands of years ago, in India, and the addition almost answers my objection. The old doctrine was that only the soul that bears fruit, only the soul that bursts into blossom, will at the death of the body rejoin the infinite, and that all other souls—souls not having blossomed—will go back into low forms and make the journey up to man once more, and should they then blossom and bear fruit, will be held worthy to join the infinite, but should they again fail, they again go back; and this process is repeated until they do blossom, and in this way all souls at last become perfect. I suggest that Mr. Beecher make at least this addition to his doctrine.

But allow me to say that, in my judgment, Mr. Beecher is doing great good. He may not convince many people that he is right, but he will certainly convince a great many people that Christianity is wrong.

Q. In what estimation do you hold Charles Watts and Samuel Putnam, and what do you think of their labors in the cause of Freethought?

A. Mr. Watts is an extremely logical man, with a direct and straightforward manner and mind. He has paid great attention to what is called "Secularism." He thoroughly understands organization, and he is undoubtedly one of the strongest debaters in the field. He has had great experience. He has demolished more divines than any man of my acquaintance. I have read several of his debates. In discussion he is quick, pertinent, logical, and, above all, good-natured. There is not in all he says a touch of malice. He can afford to be generous to his antagonists, because he is always the victor, and is always sure of the victory. Last winter, wherever I went, I heard the most favorable accounts of Mr. Watts. All who heard him were delighted.

Mr. Putnam is one of the most thorough believers in intellectual liberty in the world. He believes with all his heart, is full of enthusiasm, ready to make any sacrifice, and to endure any hardship. Had he lived a few years ago, he would have been a martyr. He has written some of the most stirring appeals to the Liberals of this country that I have ever read. He believes that Freethought has a future; that the time is coming when the superstitions of the world will either be forgotten, or remembered—some of them with smiles—most of them with tears. Mr. Putnam, although endowed with a poetic nature, with poetic insight, clings to the known, builds upon the experience of man, and believes in fancies only when they are used as the wings of a fact. I have never met a man who appeared to be more thoroughly devoted to the great cause of mental freedom. I have read his books with great interest, and find in them many pages filled with philosophy and pathos. I have met him often, been with him much, and I never heard him utter a harsh word about any human being. His good nature is as unfailing as the air. His abilities are of the highest order. It is a positive pleasure to meet him. He is so enthusiastic, so unselfish, so natural, so appreciative of others, so thoughtful for the cause, and so careless of himself, that he compels the admiration of everyone who really loves the just and true.

I hope that arrangements will be made by the League to keep Watts and Putnam in the field. We need their work.

CHRIST'S MINISTRY IN GALILEE.—Sepporis was the capital of Galilee. It was an important town, being twice captured by the Romans in the first century. And yet there is no mention of it in the New Testament. Not more than ten cities are named in the gospels as the theater of Christ's ministry, out of at least eight hundred which must hav existed according to Josephus, who makes out two hundred in the province of Galilee, the smallest of the four.—Anti-christ.

No man has ever lived a right life who has not been chastened by a woman's love, strengthened by her courage, and guided by her discretion.—Ruskin.

Our Artist Uses His Pen.

From the Chicago Express.

The wrongs and insults that are continually heaped upon us by capitalists and men in high places fills me with such intense indignation that I cannot and will not rest without uttering a protest. How much longer must we meekly submit to the schemes of scoundrels who rob us of our sustenance and steal our inheritance? What has become of the spirit of manhood and patriotism in the American people, that they will suffer themselvs to be robbed and insulted by the greedy and conscienceless knaves who hav control of the government? Has the spirit and blood of our people become so contaminated by the influx of European serfs that they care nothing for freedom, and dare not arise in their might and crush out of existence the traitors who are strangling us? Forbearance is no longer a virtue, patience is dangerous, and submission is a crime and disgrace.

Laborers of America, reflect, arise, and act! Soldiers of the Grand Army, of what avail are your scars and wounds, and what reward hav you for your years of privation and suffering? Of what avail were the lives that were sacrificed and the brave blood that flowed in defense of the union? Unless you show your manhood and courage by calling a halt to the encroachments of monopoly, that badge which you now so proudly wear will be but an emblem of dishonor, the ornament of slaves.

Soldiers, you fought that this land should be a land of liberty, that you and your posterity should enjoy the land you redeemed—then let us unite and swear by the heroic blood of our fallen patriots that this great land shall be redeemed again!

Millions of acres in the clutches of thieving corporations. Millions more given up to aliens and foreign lords, while millions of our citizens and thousands of old soldiers are unable to call a foot of ground their own.

Laborers, of what use are your strikes? Voters, what relief hav you obtained by voting? As affairs now stand, both are worse than useless. We organize strikes, and starvation forces us to resume work at reduced wages. We vote, and scheming politicians so manipulate the political machinery that we lose our votes or elect a horde of plunderers whose brazen rascality would bring the blush of shame to the cheek of the devil!

Workingmen are idle, their families go hungry and half-clad; thousands are in want because a few inhuman wretches choose to satisfy their infernal greed. The workers and useful ones must starve, that the drones may fatten in luxurious ease, yet in our misery and desperation, fools and hypocrits hav the impudence to pat us on the back, while they babble to us about God, and cry, "Patience!" Begone, ye minions of corruption, ye parasites! Patience has become a crime and a mockery! The times demand a revolution.

Such, laboring men, is the result of your toil and skill in this boasted "land of the free" that it has come to this:

> The seed ye sow another reaps;
> The wealth ye find another keeps;
> The robes ye weave another wears;
> The arms ye forge another bears!

Citizens of Americą and sons of patriots, patriots who wrested this land from tyrants that we might be free, shall we remain passivly inactiv while a pitiless despotism is surely destroying all that which is sacred to us, and for which they died? Never! Let us be true to our manhood, and in the name of liberty resolve that henceforth we will

> Sow seed, but let no tyrant reap;
> Find wealth; let no impostor keep;
> Weave robes; let not the idle wear;
> Forge arms, in our defense to bear.

Toilers, you who dig and delve, who feed, clothe, build, and adorn; you whose lives are full of usefulness, whose hands are calloused with honest toil, you whose skill and energy hav given to us all the comforts of life, must ye suffer on? Will ye be bondsmen forever? Must tottering age and helpless infancy find refuge in the almshouse, or perish because we are too weak to help them? No, by all the gods on high Olympus and elsewhere, don't suffer on in mute helplessness like beasts of burden! Arise and speak; aye, swear if it nerves you to resist. A good, hearty oath of indignation is musical compared to the groveling cant and sniveling piety that teach you to belittle your manhood when smitten on one cheek by turning the other also. Away with such stuff; it is worse than blasphemy against creed, for it is blasphemy against humanity, to which all creeds are subservient.

I openly arraign the church, and the clergy in particular, for being responsible, to a great extent, for all the moral rottenness and corruption which is cursing this nation. With a cowardly servility that is both wicked and despicable, they hav bridled their tongues, taught false doctrins, ignored the truth, and dared not condemn the usurers and thieves who hav robbed us. They, as a class, hav become moral harlots who hav prostituted themselvs for hire.

If they hav not been conscious of their shortcomings in these things, then they are very ignorant, and it is the hight of presumption for them to attempt to teach the people. If God be God, he is omnipotent and can dispense with all such ungodly servants. (As I alone wish to be held responsible for this impeachment of the clergy. I hope that if this should arouse the resentment of any among them they will attack me and not this paper.) I tell you we are getting sick of being told of heavenly mansions, and rivers of milk and honey, while we are housed in hovels, mired in mortgages, and must eat of the husks or starve. While you hav directed our eyes to heaven with one hand, you hav stolen our worldly goods with the other! Deny it if you can.

"Shocking! This is heresy," says one. So be it. That is none of your business. I hav not interfered with your worship and care naught for your creed, but I will proclaim the truth and denounce fraud, whether covered with the priestly robe or judicial gown. We are tired of mental slop. There is too much sound and not enough sense. Millions are kept in bondage because they suffer others to do their thinking. Friends, dare to think, speak, and act for yourselvs, and allow no tyranny of thought nor monopoly of your rights. I hav nothing but contempt for the moral coward whose lips are sealed through fear of social ostracism. Must the genius of thought be speechless because some fortunate fool with D D. or L.L. D. tacked on to his name says, "I believe yea, or nay, peradventure!" We don't care what you believe; tell us what you know, prove it, and if we find it is the truth, we will believe also. Public opinion, like a veritable Gorgon's head, full of the hissing reptils of mediocrity and superstition, has paralyzed the lips of truth, withered the brightest thought, and deadened the noblest impulses of the human heart. Bigotry needs room to die; lay it down and march on. Too long hav we already waited and hoped and prayed for relief, and while we hav meekly hoped and prayed the reptils of monopoly hav been tightening their coils around us until we are getting benumbed and sluggish. If we delay much longer we will be crushed beyond the power of resistance. It is said that "prayer without work availeth not;" then it is high time to cease praying and go to work. Let us get to work in earnest, and never cease working until the victims of tyranny all over this great land are aroused to a sense of their degradation and danger.

Let us do something practical and organize clubs in every township and voting precinct, pledged to support each other at all hazards, and demand of the nabobs in office and the sharks of monopoly that land robbery shall cease; that speculation in the necessaries of life shall cease; that railroad extortion shall cease; that the unearned land grants given to railroads shall be forfeited; that aliens shall not own our lands; that the ownership of land shall be limited, and thereby compel the robber corporations to disgorge. Also that banks, both national and private, shall bear their just proportion of taxation; that the right to homestead shall not be abolished so long as an acre of public lands remains unoccupied. There are some great questions upon which the people can unite if we would only begin the work of organization. It is time for us to teach our members of Congress that they are not our masters, but our servants, and if they wish to avert the dreadful calamity of civil war, let them use their brains more and their tongues less, and do something for the relief of the people. There are thousands, ay, millions of men now ready and anxious to stand up and be counted as the eternal foes of despotism, and all that is needed is organization, leadership, and the blast of the bugle calling to march, and they will be found in line and ready to oppose the encroachments of corporate power even at the risk of their lives.

The palaces of the robber barons are standing over the yawning depths of a bottomless pit. Let them beware. Hell is groaning for fuel, and its flames are languishing for the fat of the Vanderbilts, Goulds, Huntingtons, and other pirates and plunderers of their stripe. Fair play — don't cheat even Satan out of his own—let them go. Ay, would it not be better for us if we would all join together and help them off, regaling them meanwhile with the music of the "Rogues' March?"

Verily, the old Lion of Labor is beginning to growl and tug at his chains. If he gets loose somebody will get hurt. So be it. I shall do my best to unchain him and prod him on to resistance.

THE ROCK ST. PETER.—The Christian cherishes a faith founded on a fancied rock—Christ Jesus. The Roman Catholic boasts of a church built not only on the primitiv, but on the secondary rock, St. Peter. It was a pretty pun to call petros a rock, but a little too far-fetched. Petros signifies only a piece of a rock. To the Catholic it seems a tall cliff; to the Protestant a pretty big boulder; to the Freethinker only a pebble; but to Antichrist it is not so big as a grain of sand.—Antichrist.

"A NOBLE part of every true life is to learn to undo what has been wrongly done."

Christian Logic.

One of the most noticeable features in the Christian movement at the present time is the effort that is being made by its most prominent advocates to show that it has a foundation in philosophy, and that its arguments can be sustained by logic.

Not many years ago I heard a very eminent divine, in an address to a class of graduating theological students, make this remark: "Logic and philosophy are the snares and pitfalls used by the devil to entrap the unwary, and feed the flames of hell with precious human souls."

But in these later years they hav discovered that they were wrong, for instead of logic and philosophy being the snares and pitfalls which lead men to hell, they will lead them to the gates of the new Jerusalem.

Last year one of the leading publishing houses in New York published a book entitled, "The Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation," which has obtained a wide circulation, prestige having been given to the work by the leader of the Chautauqua movement, Rev. Dr. Vincent, and as the Chautauqua readers lay great claim to literary talent, it is of course out of character for anyone but an Infidel to question the character of a book that has been prescribed for their reading.

"The Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation" was included in their course of reading last year, and the depth of its philosophy can be judged by the following quotation, found on page 69. It is intended for a syllogism:

> Man becomes assimilated with the character of the being worshiped. The God of the Bible is the only perfect, all-wise, and benevolent being ever worshiped by man, hence man can only become perfect by worshiping the God of the Bible.

This logic and philosophy is only equaled by that of Martin Tupper, author of Tupper's "Proverbial Philosophy," a sample of which is herewith appended:

> The wicked man scorneth prayer; in the shallow sophistry of reason he derideth the silly hope that God can be moved by supplication.
> "Can the unchangeable be changed, or moved in his purposes? Can the weakness of pity affect him? Shall he turn at the bidding of a man? Methought he ruled all things, and ye called his decrees immutable, but if he listens to words wherein is the firmness of his will?"
> So I heard the speech of the wicked, and lo, it was smoother than oil; but I knew that his reasoning was false, for the promis of the scripture is true.
> Yet my soul was in darkness; for his words were too hard for me; till I turned to my God in prayer, for I know that he heareth always, yet I saw not his hand in aught, but perceived that he worked by means.
> And I saw that sound argument was still the faithful friend of godliness, even so the temple of religion is founded on the basis of philosophy (Essay on Prayer).

"Yea, verily," as the Quaker would say. Religion is founded on the basis of philosophy, but it is the kind of philosophy he (Tupper) indulges in—the first proposition falsifying the second, the second contradicting the first, and the third denying the whole.

This is the kind of logic and philosophy that muddled and befogged the brain of Hugh Miller, the geologist, who said, "I know that my science is true; I cannot believe my Bible to be false;" and to harmonize science and geology, he blew out his brains, thus settling the question in his mind forever.

Rochester, N. Y. H. O. SOMMERS.

Your Hand, Brothers.

Condensed from Leo Taxil.

La République Anticlericale wrote in 1880, Feb. 4: In one month we hav been three times condemned to fines amounting to 7,000 fr.

1. For showing up the "chemises de chasteté," so famous in the diocese of Auch.

2. For reproducing a letter of Henri Rochefort's previous to the amnesty.

3. For denouncing an Ignorantine monk of Angers, who had pulled a tooth out of a child's head as a punishment for not knowing his catechism lesson.

Our organ was then only a weekly, and financially weak.

They who, like us, hate the priestcraft, are numerous. They feel the need of a fighting organ that does not shrink from sacrifices.

From our first appearance, we hav been hailed by all the victims of the clergy. You cannot suppress a necessity.

Devoted exclusivly to clerical questions, we cry aloud what the other papers hush; we brand with pitiless satire those black-robed scoundrels who would pass for saints and martyrs.

The anticlerical party is strong because it rests on the most robust of feelings—hate; so strong that it multiplies daily in city and country, so strong that it will turn the elections, invade Parliament, expel the Jesuits, abolish the congregations, suppress the budget of public worship, confiscate to the state the ill-gotten booty of religious cliques, and purify France.

Our party is closing its ranks, solidarity is being established, each group feels itself sustained by others, the timid are encouraged, the hesitating decide, and in the humblest cottage the layman, hitherto abashed before the shaven crown, now dares to look the black robes in the face. Thus when the clerical magistracy strikes us, it develops sympathies in our behalf. For we are no phrase-mongers, and the people know that we are fighting in their cause.

In 1885: We maintain our ground. We publish now twice a week. Louis Venillot, who denounced us in the Catholic Universe, as the "Party of Hatred and the Malefactors of the Pen," who should witness in a few years the triumph of the church, has died insane. Our party has sent to the Chamber 133 deputies who voted the suppression of the budget of the clergy, and the rest of the Republican party declares that its acceptance of the budget is a mere formality as regards the order of the day for its discussion.

The Society of Jesuits is officially dissolved, and without new decrees, an energetic ministry may sweep it away. It is the same for other monastic orders. The confiscation of goods fraudulently acquired by these orders is now a popular question, and will this year be inscribed on the platform of the Radical party.

The Anticlerical League is organized. It possesses in France and Algeria more than 120 groups and 18,000 leaguers.

A universal Anticlerical Congress is announced to meet in Rome May 30, 1886.

Our day draws near.

To Europe and Back.

I started on the 13th of May from San Francisco, and traveled in eight days to New York, where I took the steamer for Antwerp, and arrived there after eleven days. From Antwerp I traveled to Paris. I saw the Tuileries, the Louvre, the monument of the Bastile, the bridge of Arcole, the botanic garden and its menagerie, the boulevards, the city hall, etc. From Paris I went to Geneva, where I saw Mont Blanc; then to Leuk, where I mounted on foot to the famous Leuker baths, which are 9,000 feet above the level of the sea; thence to Vevay, Lausanne, Berne, Interlaken, and Lauter Brunnen, where I enjoyed the sight of the Staubbach, the Jungfrau, the Monk, Pilate, and other high mountains and glaciers. The Staubbach exhibits a brilliant view in the morning when the sun's rays form the image of the rainbow on its water; but the Yosemite Falls in California are higher, and the Niagara Falls are grander and more sublime. I went on, climbing on foot the Pheiderk, a pass 6,000 feet high; the pass of Brunigg, 3,000 feet high; and the celebrated Mount of Rigi, 6,000 feet, where I beheld a sunset, the grandest spectacle I ever witnessed. I met there hundreds of travelers from France, England, America, and all countries of the earth, who watched the sunrise and sunset on the summit of the mountain. The view extends from it as far as the Jura. I sailed also on the fine lakes of Geneva, Thun and Vierwalstetten. Zurich has much improved in size and beauty, and is, except Geneva, the finest city in Switzerland.

On July 11th I commenced my return from Zurich. On the 13th I went again on board of the steamer in Antwerp, and arrived by the Central Pacific the 1st of August, again safe in San Francisco. My round ticket cost $123.50 (including the board on the steamer), taking me thirteen thousand miles, a sum which you hav to pay also on a trip from San Francisco to the Big Trees in the Yosemite valley in California. During my sojourn in Zurich the director of the police fined the general of the Salvation Army of that city one hundred francs, and prohibited its continuing its meetings, declaring in his decree: "The exercises of the Salvation Army are not actions of divine worship, but means to collect money from the public, as by a trade. They blaspheme the religion, and profit from it for economical ends. Their representations injure the public morals and the public welfare. Their collections are really a kind of begging."

The Spelling Reform Association.

This association held its tenth annual session in New Haven, Conn., last month. The following extract from a report of the proceedings in the Phonetic Educator is reprinted to illustrate the way of spelling as amended according to the joint rules of the Philological Association:

The report of the corresponding secretary was a long, and doutles would hav proved a very interesting, document, if it cud hav been comprehended by the audience. But the rapid and indistinct uterance of the reader made it imposibl to catch more than an ocasional wurd. By very close atention, the impresion was gatherd that the reader was reporting the progress made in America, England, and Germany, and was reading letters from the branch associations of Philadelphia, Chicago, and San Francisco; also enumerating the newspapers which had more or less favored the reform, and recounting the new members aded and the old ones who had died. (Mem.—Secretaries who draw up valuabl and interesting reports shud do themselvs the justice of securing a good reader, when they ar themselvs deficient in the power of distinct articulation.)

A good report was made by Mr. A. Fernald, secretary of the New York branch, which was organized last January and meets monthly in the library of Columbia College. He gave a sketch of the work of the comitee apointed to arange a method more or less fonetic but strongly rezembling the common print; the object being to prepare a complete set of text-books on the branches usualy taut in scools, for use among the freedmen, and, while teaching them to read both fonetic and ordinary print, to relieve them of the necesity of spelling according to Webster. Mr. Wayland, editor of the National Baptist, Philadelphia, gave a very interesting account of the formation of the branch society in that city and of the work which they had laid out to acomplish.

"Behold How Great a Fire a Little Matter Kindleth."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hardly know whether or not to notice the criticism of my good friend Dr. Severance, which recently appeared in your columns in reference to some words of mine concerning materialization, demonism, and common sense, printed in a previous TRUTH SEEKER.

I would not like to seem discourteous to Mrs. Severance by not answering her letter, but, really, I can make no apology for the words used, or the sentiments contained in the words.

My "common sense" may be at fault, but by the use of it, I find it utterly impossible to produce a living being from another being without time and material for such purpose. How many hours "Adam" was in the mold in which he was formed, and what was the process, I hav never found out, but he was not clothed, but had to cover himself with fig-leaves, until he should cultivate, or cause to grow, cotton, flax, or silk, raise sheep to obtain wool, and then, by a long process of spinning, weaving, and coloring, get the material to work up into clothing. But modern mediums are able to not only produce a human body with all its wonderful mechanism, organs of speech, hearing, seeing, with the power of locomotion, in short, a full-grown personage, with blood in so healthful a condition that its circulation givs warmth to the hands, a blush to the cheek, etc., but this materialized being comes clothed in modern apparel, all manufactured in a dark cabinet in an hour or two, and made to fit without even the help of a sewing-machine. When people believe in such miracles, I do not feel that it is greatly out of the way to wish they might hav a fresh baptism, and that the water of such baptism might be thickened with some sense, common or otherwise.

I hav no quarrel with a belief in a continued life. I hav found no proof of it, though there is no phase of Spiritualism that I am not familiar with, from the rappings, tippings, slate-writing, playing upon musical instruments, down to materializations. I hav many dear friends who accept such things as proof of life beyond death. I do not doubt that they are true to their convictions, but I do not accept such proof. I wish I could see a disposition among Spiritualists to condemn fraud and expose it, instead of shielding the medium by putting the wrong upon a supposititious bad spirit, as does my dear friend in Rochester of whom Dr. Severance speaks. I will not write further upon the subject, but close by saying I am the friend of truth and Liberalism everywhere.

Is the Earth Increasing?

Professor Proctor's theory, that the way in which our globe was made was by being built up, in part, by accretion—a process of gain which consists in a constant shower of meteoric matter, mostly in the form of almost invisible dust—seems to be to a certain extent confirmed by the investigations of Drs. Kleiber and Keller, two Russian astronomers, who hav just published the results of their observations. These are supported by the observations of Professor Schmidt, of Athens, and others who hav given attention to this curious subject. Professor Newton, of Yale College, has also made some interesting calculations in this matter. He shows that the meteors which at any one place on the earth's surface can be seen, are, in reality, only one ten-thousandth part of the number that actually fall, every hour, upon the surface of the whole globe. This fact, in connection with the observations made in Europe, makes the basis of an interesting conclusion. It is that in every hour no fewer than 450,000 meteoric bodies fall upon the earth; and these include only such as would be visible to the naked eye. Of course they are mostly very small bodies, and the shower, distributed over so vast a surface, is unnoticed. Much, perhaps most, of the aggregate increase to the earth's substance comes in the form of impalpable dust, from exploded meteoric bodies or otherwise. The "shooting stars" that one sees, on almost any clear night, by watching the sky, probably are resolved to a condition of dust before reaching the earth. Set on fire by the friction produced on entering the terrestrial atmosphere, these small bodies, rushing ever faster as they make the downward plunge, are "all burnt out" before they reach the surface. Can the aggregate amount of this imperceptible dust-shower really be enough to affect appreciably the bulk of the earth? If the calculations of investigators are not greatly at fault, that amount, when we consider that its production is unceasing, and that it was more abundant years ago than it is at present, must, in the course of time, hav been sufficient to produce a great increase in the bulk of our globe. If Professor Alexander Herschel's calculation of the average weight of a so-called meteor (five grams, less than a quarter of an ounce) was correct, it would follow that the globe receives, every hour, considerably over two tons of this outside matter, from the depths of space, to swell its proportions. Once, before our globe had captured so much of this form of matter, the surrounding regions of space must hav been fuller than now of that material.—Home Journal.

Our Troubles.

If ever on earth there was a people deeply interested in foreign commerce it is ours. Occupying almost a continent of the most productiv soil, with immense stretches of sea coast, and remarkable opportunities for river and railway transport, our people scattered thinly over the whole area almost, and busily occupied in manufactures, agriculture, and mining, we produce enormous surpluses. What shall we do with them? We must trade them. International commerce is mutual exchange of commodities. There is no buying and selling about it, except as to slight differences (or boot). Why? Simply because it never pays to run vessels, cars, etc., one way laden, to return empty, so long as there are countries where there may be mutual trade. It is only when our markets are glutted and prices very low that empty ships will come here to buy. And yet our tariff law is so stupidly made that it restricts and discourages foreign trade, our only hope of relief.

Although our laws in some other respects are by no means favorable to the general welfare, yet, owing to our happy position, our cheap lands, we might be the most generally prosperous people on earth but for this restriction on our export trade, under a foolish idea that we favor labor by raising prices of home manufactures. We can see at once that labor is best employed in those callings that produce commodities so cheap and popular their consumption is almost infinit. Coal-miners are protected doubly, first by tariff, second by monopolies of mines that enable employers to combine, close mines, and raise prices. Yet their employees complain most of all. We are destroying our cotton trade by forcing other countries to grow cotton. After twenty years' protection to sugar, we do not produce more than we did fifty years ago in Louisiana, its chief seat, and hav made a monopoly of it, just as our internal revenue has made one of tobacco, and destroyed hundreds of small factories in tobacco countries. In 1860 our manufactures of all kinds were flourishing. How is it now?

Impudence Rebuked.

The papacy, not content with proclaiming its own infallibility, and causing the same to be ratified by a lot of clerical buffoons, has commemorated this proclamation by a monumental column.

The site which it had chosen was upon one of Rome's seven hills, called the Janiculus, from Janus, who, previous to Saint Peter, had filled the office of celestial doorkeeper. Infallibility, thus posited, would hav been doubly reassuring to the elect of grace, doubly terrible to reprobates. It would hav been the shopkeepers' sign, in front of the ticket-office of heaven; for the church has an eye to business, even in its love of the sublime and beautiful, in music and in architecture. The monument of infallibility was to hav stood in front of the church of St.-Peter-in-Montorio.

The column had been carved and carried to this spot and was being put up, when the work was arrested by the political catastrophe of 1870. It was then placed aside in a corner.

After the death of Pio Nono, Leo XIII., in his turn, wished to raise this column; but his infallibility, reluctant to ask permission of its secular master the Italian government, addressed itself to the more complacent Spaniard, who owns a large area on the hill Janiculus.

Spain consented, and again the preliminaries were being arranged, when it occurred to the Italian government to raise a monument on this hill to Garibaldi. This, also, was a sentiment of poetic analogy, for in default of heaven, Garibaldi had opened to Italy the door of political success. But Leo XIII., fearing lest the precious column bearing heavenward the hopes of the faithful might suffer by comparisons too realistic with that of heroic achievement beside it, and finding the idea of Italy's emancipation uncongenial to his clerical authority, has again countermanded the erection.

The column has been carried to the Vatican, to be placed in that part of its garden known as the Pigna. Sic transit gloria mundi.

EDGEWORTH.

The Laborer and the Church.

According to information given to the Christian Union by a large number of clergymen, not more than five per cent of American artisans in cities habitually attend religious sevices of any kind. All but two of the letters say that the attendance is diminishing, and all but one that the neglect is not from unbelief in Christianity. The cause of non-church-attendance, as given by these experts, may be summed as follows: The men hav to work all the week, and they recreate on Sunday. They cannot dress as well as those with whom they must associate, and therefore stay away. They think secret societies are as good as the church. They are unable to pay for the privileges because of the high prices of things which they must hav. The large salaries of the ministers disgust some. Some feel that the minister is a hireling, and therefore seeks to upbuild his church as a doctor seeks to increase his practice, not from love of souls, but to increase his salary. Some employers of labor are so bad in their treatment of their employees that the men do not want to go where they shall meet those in whose real Christianity they hav so little faith. All the letters indicate that, especially in the large places, artisans feel that they are not welcomed in churches frequented by the wealthier classes.—Public Ledger.

EXTRA copies of this issue containing the interview with Colonel Ingersoll can be had on application. Price, seven cents per single copy; in quantities of five and over, five cents each. The interview should be widely circulated, as it is a sort of headquarters utterance upon some of the most pressing questions of the day.

THE Albany Convention begins Friday morning, September 11th. Let everyone remember that, and remember also that a royal time may be expected during the three days the Convention will remain in session; that it is the duty of everyone who can to attend; and that the larger the Convention is the more influence it will hav for good over the whole country, and especially upon the legislature of this state.

The Memorial to the Legislature.

A thousand copies hav been sent out through the state of the petition to repeal all laws now on the statute books of New York which allow exemption of church property from taxation, the appropriation of money from the public treasury for the support of institutions founded and managed chiefly by sectarian denominations, and which compel the observance of Sunday as a religious holy day.

We hope that every person receiving one will get the largest possible number of signatures, and that all who hav not received a petition will immediately write for one.

It is proposed to present this memorial to the Albany Convention for indorsement and signatures; afterward to obtain as many more names as possible, and to present it to the legislature which will convene at Albany next January.

After the nominations for Assembly hav been made this fall, it will be wise for Liberals to present the petition to the candidates and ask their aid. In the event of refusal the duty of Liberal voters will be plain.

Undoubtedly the Catholics will again attempt to hav passed the so-called Freedom of Worship Bill. To head them off the Protestants are circulating petitions against sectarian appropriations, but they make no objections to a general support of Christianity. They cannot or will not see that a dollar given to Protestant Christian institutions is as unconstitutionally wasted as though it were presented to the most bigoted of sects. Next January, therefore, is the Liberals' opportunity to bring to the attention of our law-makers the true theory of American government. The subject is bound to come up, and the debates will be heated. Our friends may rest assured that Freethought will hav at court an able advocate to defend its principles.

Good.

Italy is progressing, and her educated people, like those of France, are largely Freethinking. No longer is superstition shielded by the government, and the authorities of some of the towns seem to be equally determined that the pope shall not use thaumaturgy as a means of revenue.

Recently the peasants of Corano declared they saw the Madonna appear from a bush growing in a place where, in the last century, a statue of her had been destroyed. The place was soon crowded with pilgrims, several of whom, owing to the heat and to religious excitement, gave such signs of mental disorder that they had to be placed under restraint in the asylum. The syndic promptly had the bush dug up. Thirty thousand people were present.

Had the town governments always acted with such promptness and matter-of-fact common sense, Italy would hav been spared centuries of degradation and shame.

Charles Bradlaugh's Struggle.

On the first of January next, England will elect a new Parliament. Although Mr. Bradlaugh, by mere force, has been prevented from speaking and voting in the present House, he has never been unseated, and his term expires with that of the other members. The Northampton question is relegated to the constituencies, and to them Mr. Bradlaugh again appeals. He will stand for Northampton and East Finsbury, by which Division he has been selected as a protest candidate by the Liberal and Radical Association. He is also appealing to the House of Lords against the recent decision of the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Bradlaugh proposes to make a vigorous campaign. He alleges that in disregarding the votes lawfully given of a free constituency, and in treating as nugatory the unimpeached and valid return duly and regularly made to the writ sent to Northampton from the Clerk of the Crown, requiring the electors to choose a member, the House of Commons has been guilty of treason against the Constitution. He says that if he is not qualified to sit, then the return is bad, the seat is vacant, and a new writ should hav been issued to elect a member for Northampton. But the House admits that the return is good, and on its return-book he is entered as the member; the House declares that the seat is not vacant, and it allows him to hav and exercise all the rights and privileges of an unsworn member—that is, all except the right of sitting, speaking, and voting. That is, it treasonably violates the right of the electors to be represented in Parliament.

But against the House itself Mr. Bradlaugh has no legal remedy. It is for the constituencies to maintain their own rights. Four times Northampton has elected him, yet, except during five months and two weeks when Mr. Bradlaugh sat, spoke, and voted as a member on affirmation of allegiance, that borough has been only half represented. To the manhood of the voters he again appeals.

Mr. Bradlaugh does not deny that he is an Atheist. But he contends that religion should hav nothing to do with the question. "George Grote," he says, "and John Stuart Mill sat and voted for years, yet both of them printed the most outspoken Atheistic declarations. Ashton Dilke sat and voted in this very Parliament, though in its presence he made declarations of his want of religious belief. John Morley still sits and votes, though in his volumes on Voltaire and Diderot are the very strongest avowals of anti-religious opinion."

There can be no question but what Mr. Bradlaugh is right. And the fight is not only a local one for Northampton—that of the maintenance of her legal rights—but it is one that affects all England, aye, all the civilized world. It is a fight for Freethought—whether a man is to be debarred from holding office because his religious opinions are not the same as those of the majority. It is a struggle for Freedom which must interest the world at large as much as the people of England. Mr. Bradlaugh has been most shamefully treated, and, in him, every Freethinker is insulted by the purse-proud and creed-bound bigots of England. There are Christian men sitting and voting in Parliament, says Mr. Bradlaugh, who hav driven others to dishonor and suicide; men who while parading their piety hav staggered tipsily through the lobby to vote against the heretic. There is one man there now who sold his title as a director of a foreign company; another whose transactions hav been judicially condemned as fraudulent. All these men hav voted against Mr. Bradlaugh, and are "honored" members. Yet one against whom no dishonor can be charged is by force prevented from exercising his duties simply because he is a Freethinker. Considering these circumstances and all the insults heaped upon the Secular party, we cannot blame Mr. Bradlaugh for closing his few words to the Christian opposition with this threat: "I hav hitherto always taught the people to be law-abiding and law-respecting. Until now, for quite two hundred years, law has had the final word in England, and all parties hav bowed to the law's majesty. In my person you hav trampled the law under foot; you hav insulted a free constituency; and you hav written a lesson that perhaps you may read in sorrow before the century closes."

The Hollowness of Christian Faith.

It is rarely that the emptiness and impotence of a faith in Christ are more impressivly portrayed than in the letter left by poor Laura H. Nourse when, forsaken and in despair, she sought the river at Louisville to drown herself. She was a member of a good family, well educated, and had been a missionary, and contributor to the religious press. She had lately been living at the Home of the Friendless. About a mile from the place where her body was discovered, her hat, skirt, gloves, and other little articles were found where she had deposited them before taking the suicidal leap. In the finger of the glove was the key to Miss Nourse's trunk and her address scribbled upon a bit of paper. Upon opening the trunk there were found many evidences of culture and refinement. In one corner was a large blank book which had been used as a diary during the year 1884 while she lived in Cincinnati. Some of the jottings expressed such facts as these:

"This day I hav forwarded an article to the Christian press."

"This day I received a number of very flattering compliments on an article published in the Christian Observer."

In the back of the book there were about fifty pages covered with clippings from different religious papers signed at the bottom with the initials "L. H. N." There were also found a number of receipts showing that she had rented during this period a pew in the Second Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati. Besides these there were a number of personal letters and communications, and several very flattering recommendations from various Christian societies. On a jagged piece of white paper, such as is used about a newspaper office, was written her last statement before the commission of the deed. It was folded four times, and written in a large, nervous hand, with several cross-marks across some of the lines. It is in lead pencil, and was traced the night previous to her disappearance, and is a wail of despair that ought to make Christian preachers bow their heads. Beginning plaintivly, as a heart-broken woman would, it rises through tears to a shriek of agony:

"One that believes in a merciful savior, or a savior that will help those who strive after right with their whole heart, as believing a friend, I hav lived an upright life all my life, and hav given kindness and consideration to everyone, and I hav been driven to despair by a succession of injustice and unkindness that has been undeserved. I believe in God and tried to brave it out. I suffered enough to kill ten people that had not the bravery of a lion. I fought against unkindness and injustice, standing up against them till I can stand up no longer. I hav no defense against lying and misrepresentation. I could defy the world to prove that I hav ever done any immoral act of any kind. I hav loved righteousness and all that was good with all my heart, yet I hav been in the last few weeks insulted to my face with the insinuations that I was not a true woman. I hav never found that God keeps me in the hour of trial, or gave me any help in trouble, but still I hav believed, and never dishonored him before men. But he has utterly forsaken me and left me no recourse but self-destruction. Oh! terrible to love a supposed friend and savior, to find that one you believed almighty to save neither able nor willing to do aught for you. Oh! terrible to love right and find that there is no power in heaven or earth that can bring any good to triumph over evil or help those who strive after righteousness. I pity anyone who has any sense of right, for it is only those who can trample on every principle of honesty and honor that can succeed in life. Those who care for self above everything else and will trample upon everything or everybody that comes in their way will hav a good time. As to the peace and love and joy that is promised to a Christian, it is all a farce. There is no such thing.

"LAURA NOURSE."

This is not the cool judgment of a Freethinker who had reasoned herself out of the meshes of a misplaced faith, but the frantic utterance of a Christian girl who was even then seeking missionary work in the Presbyterian church at Louisville. It is truth wrung from bitter experience.

Mrs. Johnson, matron of the Home of the Friendless, tells of a love affair in which Miss Nourse suffered sorrow. During the first days of her labors here she stated that some years ago she was engaged to be married to a young preacher in New York city. Having occasion to go to the country, she returned to her affianced to find that he had proved false and had married another woman. On visiting him, she took the matter so much to heart that she swooned.

When this appeared in the daily papers, we happened, in company with a friend or two, to be spending an afternoon with Colonel Ingersoll. He read the letter aloud, and continuing read this desertion of Miss Nourse by the preacher. Looking up from the paper he said, "How good that preacher must feel!"

We never heard a stronger condemnation than was expressed in his laconic comment.

Why Should Spain Be Afflicted?

Four thousand nine hundred and sixty-nine new cases of cholera were reported in Spain one day last week. Fifteen hundred and forty-seven deaths of old cases also occurred.

Scientific men say this is due to lack of sanitary measures. Religious people attribute it to the anger of the Lord. Yet Spain is a notoriously pious country—the most thoroughly Christian of any nation. It is also a notoriously dirty country. The piety of the people ought, however, to be a guarantee against an angry Providence, and we can see no religious reason why Spain should be so afflicted, unless it is that the Lord is angry because sanitary precautions hav been neglected. But we do not learn from the Old Testament that Jehovah cared much for cleanliness.

If there is an all-directing God, without whose knowledge and consent not even a sparrow can fall, what a Moloch he must be to sacrifice so many of his devoted subjects!

Editorial Notes.

THE Advocate says there are signs of the total break-up of the Salvation Army in this country. This is good news to the lovers of morality.

"DID you ever hear of God?" was asked a young French girl who applied to a religious institution of Paris for a night's lodging. "God?" she said; "oh, yes—an old man with a long beard." Her only religious instruction had been Catholic pictorial primers.

THE Daily Telegraph announces that Leo XIII. has forbidden the use of the electric light in Catholic churches. Consistency's a jewel! Too much light in some places is very inconvenient. That is probably the reason why truth livs at the bottom of a well.

BIBLE reading and other forms of Christian worship hav been ordered discontinued in the public schools of Concordia, Kan. This just action on the part of the town is largely due to the efforts of J. M. Hagaman, the stanch Freethinking editor of the Kansas Blade.

IN an article on Protestant and Catholic missions in Samoa, the Catholic Union says that the efforts of Protestants to proselyte in Catholic countries only result in making Infidels of Catholic If that is so, the Protestants should be encouraged. Let the good work go on!

SALADIN proposes to publish in the Secular Review, in Latin and English in parallel columns, those lecherous passages in the works of Liguori and Dens which "beggar all description." He does this because these two writers are the trusted authorities of the Romish church in all matters relating to the confessional. Saladin admits that the printing may secure for him a place in Mr. Foote's cell in Holloway jail, but that prospect does not alarm him.

THE Catholic Union and Times persistently maintains that Colonel Ingersoll—whom it calls THE TRUTH SEEKER'S idol and master—has been used by Mr. Lambert as a mop. But if the priest is such an able floor-scrubber why does he decline to wipe the stage of some hall with Mr. Charles Watts? Surely if he has used up Colonel Ingersoll he can annihilate Mr. Watts, who is a large man and covers a good deal of floor, thus making only a few sweeps necessary.

THE Universalist says that it fully believes that the villains of the London disclosures will go to hell. And then it inquires of the orthodox Christians if they do not hold that these scoundrels can escape future punishment by repenting. To this query the Independent replies:

"Yes, so it is. We own it freely. We do believe that repentance means salvation, not from all the scars of sin, but from its punishment, even for the vilest. So the Bible teaches, and so Universalists used to believe, when they did not teach that they must pay out the penalty, but trusted in salvation by God's grace."

Surely the whirligig of time turns up wondrous things. Here hav the Universalists become orthodox, and the orthodox Universalists! What is Christianity, anyway?

THIS is the conclusiv way in which a Christian writer argues against the Old Testament revision:

"(1) Paul wrote the epistle to the Hebrews, as proved by 2 Pet. iii, 15, 16. (2) Then Paul, in Heb. i, 7, definitly pronounces 'angels' to be the proper translation of Elohim, Ps. civ, 4. (3) Heb. ii, 9, uses the same word 'angels' to translate Elohim, in Ps. viii, 5, and so givs Paul's authority that it is correct. (4) But the new revision translates the passage 'little lower than God,' and givs the lie to the decision of Paul, and is, therefore, wrong.

This reminds us of Howard Crosby's argument for the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. Jesus, in the gospels, several times refers to the laws Moses gave. Mr. Crosby maintains, therefore, that unless Moses wrote the Pentateuch, Christ was mistaken, and as Christ was God, that could not be. Nevertheless, people keep on doubting that Moses wrote the books ascribed to him. And a good many millions of the doubters are Christians, too.

Important.

The following is from A. E. Carr, vice-president of the Association of Otsego county:

"S. P. PUTNAM, Dear Sir: I hav sent all the petitions—with the exception of the one I am working on myself—to different parties in the county, and could place a dozen more to good advantage. I hav obtained seventy-five names on the one I hav in hand, and hav had eight refusals. In reporting to the Albany Convention, shall I send in original petition, or state number of signatures?"

In reply to Mr. Carr, I would say: Keep all the original petitions in circulation until the meeting of the Legislature next winter, and report to Albany Convention the number of signatures obtained. After the Albany Convention, we must bend every energy to the accumulation of names. If every vice-president and Liberal takes hold with the activity of Mr. Carr, a formidable petition will be in the hands of the Association for effectiv work.

PARTICULAR NOTICE.

Will every subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and every friend of the cause, make a special effort to hav a notice of the Albany Convention published in his local and county newspaper? Let everyone do his best to attract public attention to this great gathering.

Dr. Brown, of Binghamton, our able and popular president for so many years, sends these cheering words. He shall hav a cordial welcome:

"91 COLLIER ST.,
"BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Aug. 24, 1885.

"MY DEAR PUTNAM: Your kind and acceptable letter I had intended to answer in person. Press of home business prevented my visit. I shall meet you and the Liberal friends at the Albany Convention. Then and there I will comply with the demands you so fitly propose. I am more than ever interested in the success of our Association and the worthy cause it represents. I am with you in all the efforts you hav so wisely made to aid the Liberal and Secular movement. At Albany we shall meet most of our earnest workers in the field of Freethought reform. Every activ Liberal will do well to attend each session of the Convention. Its program is immense, and ought to satisfy every thoughtful person in our ranks. Truly yours, T. L. BROWN."

The Tent.

CARBON, IND., Aug. 26, 1885.—Our Tent, despite most energetic efforts to accelerate its transit, did not arrive at Carbon until 5:30 P.M. Friday, 21st inst.

We found outdoor meetings, like the average picnic, much more pleasant in anticipation than realization. Heavy dew dampened and chilled us; the wind blew out our light; the gnats, moths, millers, beetles, and bugs swarmed around us, attracted by the glow of our lamp. Grabbing at hideous, long-legged, ironclad beetles, that got tangled in our hair; frantically endeavoring to dislodge inquisitiv, long-winged crickets and bugs, who crawled down our neck, evidently desirous to examin for themselvs the texture of our undershirt, had a slightly irritating tendency, liable to interrupt our train of thought, and evoke interjections not the less intense be cause delivered sotto voce. The people came en masse, but it was difficult to preserve order among the small boys, and in Carbon, the small boy, the festiv pig, and the yaller dog "are as the stars for multitude." Despite these disadvantages we aroused a very earnest interest—an intense desire to read and investigate.

On arrival of the Tent, thanks to ready helpers, we had it unloaded, pitched, seated, lighted, organ on the platform, and everything in readiness for our audience by eight o'clock P.M. A very large crowd was in attendance long before the time appointed to commence the lecture. We had got fairly started on our subject when down came the rain in torrents; the lightning flashed, and the thunder roared, as if bent on drowning our voice. Some of the audience fled; the intensely pious believing God was making all the uproar to evince his displeasure at their being present at an Infidel lecture.

Is not such fear singular in most devout believers in God—those most horrified when any person expresses doubts about the exact fulfilment of every promis of the Bible, or that God is omnipotent—who are most glib in quoting what they call the sure and blessed promises?

"The transgressors shall be destroyed together; the end of the wicked shall be cut off. But the salvation of the righteous is of the Lord; he is their strength in the time of trouble. The Lord shall help them and deliver them; he shall deliver them from the wicked and save them because they trust in him" (Ps. xxxvii, 39, 40).

"The Lord preserveth all them that love him, but all the wicked will he destroy" (Ps. cxlv, 20).

Yet this class never trust him. At faintest sign of danger they evince more confidence in their legs than in their God preserving them.

Those who rushed out of the Tent got wofully wet and muddy ere they reached home. Those who quietly remained were preserved from all discomfort, and got home dry and comfor table.

Our greatest gathering was on Sunday. We thought we had as many as would fill Tent three times over on Sunday afternoon, but on Sunday evening we had an enormous multitude. Thanks to the liberality of friends J. A. Kerr, Conrad Bauman, and William Oldham, arrangements were made that ladies should occupy cane-seat chairs free. Every chair was occupied, and fully one-third of the plank seats were filled with ladies, the men again and again retiring before the crowds of ladies. Outside every available stump was utilized, vast crowds standing all around the wall. All evinced eagerness to hear; even some whose troubled visage showed disapproval remained seriously attentiv. There was a very general regret we could not hav remained another week at Carbon.

We found a number of persons here, who, if not avowed Liberals, had lost their faith in Christianity through the able lectures delivered here by our esteemed friend and able coworker, John Remsburg. He gained golden opinions from all sorts of people on his visits here, and has many warm friends and admirers in Carbon and vicinity.

Our most grateful thanks are due to Mr. Wm. Oldham for his earnest zeal and strenuous efforts to insure success to our Tent effort. About to remove to Missouri, he determined to remain over for ten days, and devote that time and his best efforts to affording his friends and neighbors an opportunity to be enlightened and blessed by the glorious truths of the gospel of humanity. We were greatly encouraged at his declaration that he and all who had helped to hav the Tent at Carbon were well satisfied with the work we had accom plished. We regard the declaration as the highest possible compliment, for certainly his self-sacrifice and labor entitled him to a most effectiv and wide-reaching effort.

To Mr. J. A. Kerr and his accomplished wife, a very queen of the cuisine, we were under obligation for a most happy home and royal hospitality Mr. Conrad Bauman, a man of few words but effectiv deeds, proved on any and all occasions to giv practical evidence of his liberality.

Mr. Geo. Hathaway, Wm. Knowles, Frank Mann, Harry Barnet, and many whose names we hav forgotten—we shall never forget their kind service. Mr. R. White, the genial, jovial station-agent of the I. & St. L. R. R., rendered us invaluable service in sending telegrams after our Tent, and affording us special facilities for shipping it to Logansport. He will be one of the delegates from this place to the Congress at Cleveland.

Carbon is a coal-mining village. A people dependent on work in the mines, last summer they had a strike the sad effects of which are still felt. Work has been very slack all spring and summer, so that there is severe dearth of money. They are hopeful of good winter's work. Many will then subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal publications. No people are more generous or desirous of doing their full duty in sustaining any cause which once gains their sympathy and approval.

We carefully distributed a very large number of pamphlets, tracts, TRUTH SEEKERS, and other first-class Liberal papers.

And again we hav to express our thanks to friends in Texas, Massachusetts, Montana, Michigan, Long Island, Iowa, and other places for all their kind words of sympathy and cheer.

We shall return West from Albany and hold Tent effort at Alliance, O. We had intended to stop at Knightstown, Ind., but find the cost of freight and delay would render it doubtful if we could reach Alliance, O. And there might be danger of our being delayed by business at the Albany Convention, so we might fail to connect. But we can giv Alliance the last ten days of September, and then take the Tent to Cleveland for eight days' siege preceding the great Congress, and thus hav the advantage of being at Cleveland to attend to requests of friends and arrange details of the Secular Congress.

Then cold will compel us to fold away our Tent, and at once commence the fall and winter campaign in halls. Thus the good work goes on. C. B. REYNOLDS.

Lectures and Meetings.

ON Sunday, August 23d, J. E. Remsburg spoke at Leonard's Grove, near Corning, Ia., delivering three lectures (nearly thirty thousand words) between 12 and 4 P.M.

MRS. AMELIA H. COLBY is engaged to speak at Portland, Maine, during the Sundays of September and October. Mrs. Colby's services for Sundays are engaged as far ahead as January, 1887.

THE Logansport Daily Journal of August 29th says: "Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds entertained an immense audience in the court-house square last evening. Mr. Reynolds is a Liberal lecturer, and his oratory and ideas are original and attractiv. He is exceedingly dramatic in his delivery, and the force and manner with which he givs his hearers the result of his thought, reading, and apparent conviction is at times most effectiv. Last night he gave his hearers the 'Reason Why I Left the Pulpit,' and this evening he will talk on 'Science and the Bible.' Mr. Arthur Tilney, a popular and accomplished vocalist of London, England, is accompanying Mr. Reynolds, and during the evening renders choice selections. Mr. Reynolds states that the object of his talk and investigation is the attainment of truth and his creed: 'Do justice, love mercy, and promote the best happiness of your fellow creatures. Go and hear him tonight."

MR. SHAW, of the Independent Pulpit, finds it exceedingly difficult—indeed, impossible—to get any of the Christians of his vicinity to debate with him. In this they evince the wisdom of the serpent.

THE city of London, says Theodore Cuyler, grows faster than do the evangelical influences which mold and leaven it. Judging from the fruits of "evangelical influences" as pictured in the Pall Mall Gazette, we should hope it did.

WE hail James A. Bliss's Spirit Voices as an ally in our work against the Catholic church. In the last number of that publication we find reprinted two editorials from THE TRUTH SEEKER, which show up two instances of hypocrisy and tyrannical greed on the part of the Romish church in this country. We thank Spirit Voices most heartily for giving them further circulation.

DURING Mr. Charles Watts's visit to England he has written a series of articles for this journal on "The American Secular Union: Its Necessity and the Justice of its Nine Demands." This is very opportune just when two of the most important Conventions ever held in this country in connection with the Liberal movement are about to take place. We invite the attention of our readers to Mr. Watts's articles, the first of which papears in our present issue.

Letters from Friends.

MARYSVILLE, MO., August 23, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The 19th, 20th, and 21st instant, John E. Remsburg delivered his three celebrated lectures, "Sabbath Breakers," "False Claims," and "Bible Morals," at our neighboring town of Hopkins. His audience listened to his damaging arguments against Christianity and the Bible with the closest attention. He drew good houses each night, notwithstanding the churches had opposition meetings and industriously circulated the report that an admission fee was charged.

Mr. Remsburg is no ordinary orator. His diction is pure and lofty and delivery free and easy; but his great forte lies in the incessant shower of damaging facts he pours upon the absurd claims of orthodoxy. An opportunity was given to anyone who wished to reply to his lectures, and on one occasion three preachers were present, but, deeming discretion the better part of valor, prudently determined to wait until Mr. Remsburg was safely out of the country before they open their batteries upon Infidelity in general and Mr. Remsburg in particular.

"Sabbath Breakers" was the worst dose of all for orthodoxy to swallow. Other lectures had hit them on the Bible question and claims of the church, and they had got a little used to that; but when an attack was made on the monopoly the church had of the "Lord's Day," it struck right at the base of their whole fraudulent system. The wound was not only a fresh one, but deep and severe, and from the way the clergy writhe when struck there it is evident that is the most vital point of attack.

Liberals, if our cause is worth anything at all, if it is what we believe it is, then it is worth making some sacrifices for, and I would say, Keep the good work going; keep Mr. Remsburg and all the other Liberal workers employed; there is not yet half enough of them. GEO. H. DAWES.

PARIS, KY., July 30, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Your postal card received to-day, and tracts a day or two since.

Many thanks for your prompt attention to my order. You say "The Origin of the Bible" is not yet printed. When it is, forward it to my address, and if you hav not enough money for it, let me know and I will remit; if more, send value in something recent and up with these days of progress.

I am nearly seventy years old, and some think I am not making good use of time, and had better be preparing for the future. I am ready for it. Moses was a scientist and said, "Dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return, and the spirit to the God that gave it." We liv and grow upon the products of the earth even in our mother's womb; grow from her blood and new matter formed from the food she eats grown out of earth. In embryo we neither eat, drink, hav natural evacuations from the body, or breathe. We move only when motion is excited in us by the power of the nervous centers in her. What now? If no accident happens to us in embryo or during labor, when born the air strikes us, and penetrates the pulmonary system, and we show life—life from outer surroundings in the air, probably a more sublimated form of electricity than we now know of. So, from dust to dust back we go, and the spirit to the grand pabulum of life around us.

Moses was a matchless piece of seasoned clay—a shrewd general, skilled in all the cunning of his age, and with a face formed to conceal. His record, biblical in villainy and wickedness, far exceeds the criminal record of Europe and America—read in any other book, the author would be up before court for the circulation of obscene matter. But it was Moses whom ignorance and superstition hav privileged to rise above law, morals, and common decency.

Geological and other evidences hav shown us there were people on earth long before Adam and Eve, for Cain the murderer fled into another country and there knew his wife. God certainly was not the parent and kind guardian he is represented to be, or he would not hav suffered the lapse of time before issuing our moral and spiritual guide, the Bible. Oh bosh! it was good to subjugate and keep under power the Jews.

Take woman from the church, and it would become a thing of the past. The common herd of mankind would laugh it to scorn.

All tracts I get I read and dispose of by gift to the thinking men, untrammeled by tyrant power of the church. Thank the God of nature, we hav more of them around us than the church dreams of, but their financial condition closes their mouth for the present. WM. KENNEY.

ROGERSVILLE, O., Aug. 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Some think Hoadly is no Freethinker, but a kind of straddler of all doctrins of belief. It is claimed he is a Unitarian and a believer. Skeptics would like to be convinced that Hoadly is a Freethinker. What evidence can I get that he is an officer of the New York Freethinkers' Association, as claimed by some? What evidence hav we, in short, that he is a Liberal? Did he ever say he is? If he did, where is the proof? Did any other Liberal papers speak favorably of Hoadly's election besides yours? I do not believe in a dough-faced Liberal. CLETUS WEAVER.

[We hav but slight information about Governor Hoadly's religious views, if he has any. He is popularly reputed to be a Freethinker, and as candidate for governor of Ohio, he was opposed on that ground. His Thanksgiving proclamation last fall was marked by the entire omission of all mention of the "supreme being," and contained no religious sentiments. Not being a citizen of the state, we doubt if he is an officer of the State Association of Freethinkers, though he may be a member. He is, we believe, a shareholder in the Boston Index, or in some way connected with it. We agree with our correspondent in not believing in "dough-faced Liberals," and trust that Judge Hoadly is not one of that kind. Perhaps his official position renders him diffident about asserting his views.—ED. T. S.]

BLUEFIELDS, NICARAGUA, C. A., July 22, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Your valuable paper—which is the real lever that Archimedes sought in vain by which to move the world—has reached this obscure corner of the globe, and let me tell you with pride, it has stirred new thoughts and ideas in my mind. I came to this place an imperfect Christian about eight months ago, but having obtained several copies of your wonderful TRUTH SEEKER, and especially No. 26, June 27th, it has transformed me into a perfect Liberal, with respect to Bible truth.

I hav read and compared Mr. Andrew Jacobson's exposition of what he calls "Bible Harmonies," and it settled my mind that, after all, this old book is a compilation of the worst kind of fraud that poor humanity can be subject to. I now admire Colonel Ingersoll as the world's champion for denouncing and exposing an institution that, when you look at it from a distance, is horrible to behold. This wonderful man was a regular bugbear to me, and in my heart—the reservoir of perfect sentiment—I, in the "charity that thinketh no evil," wondered why God permitted this profane man to go around like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour, perverting the minds of youth, and corrupting the hearts of mankind generally. What nonsense this Bible teaches! Oh, if these ministers really believe in God and immortality, how can they, with evidence to the contrary, teach from a book that is evidently a myth, a copy of pagan idolatry and worship that contradicts its own veracity and is full of nonsensical language? Most of it was written by raving maniacs, as, I believe, a man of sense would never think of writing such infamous tales about his fellow-creatures if he sought notoriety. It seems as though men at that time, like the Goths and other barbarians of Europe, had the fire kindled that sought vengeance, and were all the time working destruction in the name of God or some other deity. How they ravished, plundered, and devastated towns, cities, and empires! How much the spirit of God worked in them is only ascertained by the prodigious crimes that they, through inspiration, committed.

Sir, no more Bible for me; I hav it in the house as an old relic, to look at with pity, to refer to as circumstances may require, but never to read with that reverential awe that its advocates instil in the minds of their victims.

There is a mission here; they style themselvs "Moravians." I can appreciate the missionary spirit now, since I hav been here, more than I ever did. I can understand how it is that these saints—as the apostles were permitted to gather corn on the Sabbath—can "serve God and mammon" by having a store, keeping a post-office, officiating as treasurer for the government, buying rubber, having a mail-boat, and other sundry little worldly indulgences too numerous to mention. There are about eight of these holy creatures here, but the rising generation has had several of Colonel Ingersoll's treatises on the "Mistakes of Moses" that hav led them astray. There is only one feature that, perhaps, does not make these new proselytes very desirable, and that is their color. They hav not been perfected through the process of evolution. Do you admit such a one to enter the ranks of universal reform?

There are several Americans in this place, and not one of them believes a word of the Bible. CHAS. A. TELLER.

THE FUNCTION OF CONSCIENTIOUSNESS.

BLISS, N. Y.

MR. EDITOR: It is a fact that people are more jealous of their opinions upon questions of morality and religion than upon any other subject. People with strong orthodox beliefs can meet opponents in discussion with affability and courtesy upon any subject but religion. Nothing so disturbs their equanimity as to listen to the Atheist's doctrins. And it is not a mere disturbance of temper and anger, but their feelings are badly hurt and sorely grieved. And why is this? There must be a cause for it greater than comes from being merely contradicted.

Does it not come from a sense of right, and a desire for mankind to believe that which one thinks is for their welfare and happiness? In other words, is it not on account of their conscientiousness? They may be as sincere on all other questions on which they hav an opinion, but not being what they consider of moral consequence, it little concerns them what people may think on those subjects. I believe that no conscientious and sympathetic person can be unconcerned about the welfare of mankind, especially of his friends and acquaintances. And consequently when such a person thinks it is necessary for other people to believe and act as he does in certain things, it is hard to refrain from expressing those views. And they necessarily feel grieved and mortified to hav their ideas ridiculed or denied. Well do I remember when after years of study on physiology, hygiene, and medicin I came to a very decided opinion that to hav health and consequent happiness, people must liv plainly and simply, and let drugs alone, how anxious I was that others could see it as I did! For a while I could not refrain from expressing my views whenever and wherever opportunity presented. And when those who were near and dear to me were drugging themselvs, and still continued to eat what I thought made them sick, I was actually miserable. Many a time I hav thus passed a miserable day that would otherwise hav been happy. May not most of the orthodox people be as sincere and conscientious in their religious beliefs? Is there any reader of this article who has a sister, brother, father, or mother that he has often heard pray for his conversion, who believes that such a friend was not sincere? I believe they should hav credit for sincerity, until otherwise proven. And if sincere and conscientious, it must necessarily follow that they would feel very much hurt to hav their opinions assailed and desecrated by the acts of people. I believe that people make a great mistake to treat any belief with contempt and ridicule. I do not consider them arguments, but on the contrary they injure the cause of the party that uses them.

When a person has, by certain facts taken as evidence and a due process of reasoning, arrived at certain conclusions, he must necessarily be sincere in his opinions, and will cling to those opinions until convinced by other facts and arguments, or by a different process of reasoning, that he is wrong. So if a man, by education or otherwise, accepts the Bible as revelation, actually believes it to be such, he must necessarily believe the doctrins it contains. Now, a man's conscience always approves of his acts when they are consistent with his beliefs, and disapproves when contrary. This approval and disapproval of oneself is thought by many to be a guide to right and wrong. They accept it as their guide to determin right and wrong. By keeping their "conscience clear" they are satisfied with themselvs. While I admire the moral character of the person whose conscience and moral sense keep him in the path of what he considers justice and right, he should also be aroused to the fact that the moral sense of itself is not any more of a guide to right and wrong than a man's reason is a guide to his affections. If conscience were truth, there would never hav been any improvement. People's opinions would hav always been the same. They could not change.

For what is right once is right forever. If moral sense were a sure guide to duty, there would be no need of teaching morality. All our efforts to raise humanity would be worthless. Education as to duty would be useless. The first opinion a child had as to what was right would be correct. An opinion once upon justice would be an opinion forever. There would be no need of training our children in the paths of virtue and mercy, justice and honor. They might as well run wild in that respect.

Again, people would all be of the same opinion upon all questions pertaining to morality and duty, if conscience were a truthful guide. It could not be otherwise. It could not tell one one thing and another the reverse. Nature would contradict herself. Again, there would be no use to try to remove any evil—conscience telling each one what was right and wrong would be sufficient.

It is by knowledge that improvements come. We try to convince people of an error through their intellect. How anxious parents are that their children should hav good influences! They want them to hav good company. As a rule, they want their children to be moral children, and they recognize the fact that they must be properly taught and cared for, if they are kept in the path of virtue and right. They commence to teach them very young what is right, as they understand it. Certainly, people think and believe as they hav been educated by their teachers and by their environments. Wrong education produces a wrong conscience. We hav a right conscience when our judgment is right, and vice versa. Man's moral sense prompts him to do right. His conscience is continually exclaiming, "Be right, be right." Thus a man with a keen moral sense will be more liable to do right as he strives harder to ascertain the true, and considers justice in all his dealings; while a man that lacks a desire to do right will do wrong, no matter how well educated, because he does not care. Wrong-doing givs him no uneasiness, unless he fears a penalty that human law inflicts.

Hence, while a person should be careful that his moral sense is not blunted—while he should cultivate the faculty of conscientiousness in himself and children, keeping his "conscience clear"—he should also bear in mind that it approves of whatever he, through his experience and education, has concluded is right—that it is no guide itself; and should further bear in mind that all people's sincere opinions should be treated with civility and courtesy, that in no case should we ever attack the man, but his principles, and that we should handle them as his property, to which he has acquired a good title—a title acquired in the same manner as we hav acquired ours, and entitled to the same usage. FRANCIS M. BUCK.

BRUNO—A PROTEST.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME, TOGUS, ME. }
August 18, A.S. 285. }

The Secretary of the Veteran Liberal League to the American Committee on the Giordano Bruno monument:

The Bruno monument and statue should be a masterpiece—a work whereof every honest Freethinker may be truly proud. I had wished to contribute a trifle toward commemorating the sublime martyrdom of science's most noble worshiper; but if the proposed inscription, which makes him appeal for final judgment to a mugwump god, for the demonstrated denial of whose very existence the bigoted fools and bloody frauds burnt him alive in fagot flames, must go upon his lasting monument, any other use of a dollar would be much wiser. I hope there will be a potent protest against that worst word (God) written in any language being blazoned upon that good man's memorial tablet.

What good has any God ever done for man that we ought to pay a penny's worth of tinsel-tribute to his paltry praise? What do we want of a God who cannot, or will not, prevent the evil from passing within the entrance, instead of insolently salving the serious hurt with a tame and tardy pity, and eternally debiting the poor patient for the proffered plaster, whether applied or refused? Beside the bad taste displayed in the Pauline phrase, there is the greater absurdity of attributing Bruno's benison to a gratuitous fore-ordination. Such a false sentence as this placed on metallic record as the standing sentiment of the scientific world foists upon rational civilization a ready weapon which superstitious churchmen and religious mystics and mercenaries will not be slow to turn against those who formulated and accept the awkward and misleading epigram, "The highest God has destined me to be an apostle, not last or least, of the better age to come." If a God destined him for anything, the same absolute despot also destined him to his cruel death, and no praise, blame, gratitude, or responsibility, belongs to any subject of his sovereign will; and God should therefore be left alone by his helpless cattle to magnify and glorify himself in his own omnipotent conceit.

Let the lines on the open page of Bruno's book be amended to read: "The highest judgment of the present Age of Reason regards this master man, whom Christian bigots most cruelly burnt, as the first and chiefest apostle of knowledge, and heroic liberator of superstition-enslaved humanity. He groveled to no priest, and he prayed to no God. Whom the truth makes free is free indeed."

Again: What is John Huss doing on Giordano Bruno's ground? If the Christians who hav perished by the operation of their own dogmatism, in the hands of other Christians, are to be honored by steadfast Freethinkers, who would hav been ignominiously called Infidels by those to whom the largess of merit is liberally remembered, we shall be occupying an ecliptical age in carving their incongruous images (incongruous in their grouping with naturalists), whilst our own and far more excellent worthies remain almost forgotten, except by their contemptible maligners. Let Huss be buried and bronzed by his own creed-bound followers, or go without a statue to confirm his fame—at least until all who own no allegiance to any traditional, supernatural religion shall hav learned that there was but a little later than the time when he lived such a man as James Gruet beheaded by order of the intolerant Jack Calvin—though himself an incisiv innovator—for laughing at his horrible theology and abjuring all the stale jargon of gods together. Gruet was a witty man, possessed of erudite learning and solid sense; though the cyclopedias, which pander to popular prejudice, hav but a slurring mention to make of him, nevertheless there can be furnished something of his history interesting to those who care to investigate the true inwardness of the so-called Reformation. If the fearless likeness of James Gruet can form one of the silent but salient witnesses to honest thought, clustered about that of their superior, Giordano Bruno, an honor will thus be well done to him to whom honor is doubly due; Freethought will hav established another exhibit of its moral heroism, and openly shown one more crimson shame of the sworn Christian bigotry and terrorizing tyranny.

Yours for man, JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I must giv Brother T. R. Perry a little praise for his zeal in trying to convince Materialists that the theistic and orthodox dogma of immortality is true, but really I do not think so intellectual a man can sincerely believe it himself. Be that as it may, he finds out the Materialists of Ohio are not easily caught with chaff. The brother knows that a champion Materialistic Infidel dwells in that Buckeye state, and throws around him such stubborn facts that the high-flyers of superstitious faiths in creeds, dogmas, and spookdom can make but little headway. The Buckeye boy must hav facts—nothing short of positiv proof will convince. What another has seen or heard is not enough evidence to satisfy the level brain of an Ohio Materialist. Bring on your spooks in a clear-cut manner—no dark-lantern trickery; let all be plain, honest, and perfectly free—no juggling and pay for the show. Giv us the square thing! That is a just claim. We take no less.

Can friend Perry, or any other Spiritualist, honestly believe that all the hundreds of millions of all nations, tongues, and religions—savage and civilized; blacks, tans, and all colors; murderers, cannibals, etc., who died thousands of ages ago in every conceivable manner, are alive to-day? I think Brother Perry can scarcely believe in any such preposterous nonsense. I do not expect to convert Brother Perry, but I think that in the deep recesses of his true inwardness he will admit that Materialism is far more sensible, solid, and satisfactory than the flimsy and very doubtful faiths in any of the superstitions known by the name of religion. T. WINTER, Materialist.

CORUNNA, IND., Aug. 3, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Of all the battles that hav been fought for freedom, the battle with the church has been the most obstinate and prolonged. And why? It is because the race has not yet sufficiently developed to perceive the falsity or truth of a doctrin by the workings of the same. Neither can a large portion of our own civilized America fully comprehend the nature of things seen about us, how or why this or that came about. I find that, of all the hobbies of the ignorant church people, the most tenaciously clung to is that of a special creator. They always infer that the human race could not hav been here without a personal creator. To the uncultured mind the Darwin theory appears dark and mysterious. Without a knowledge of history, geology, astronomy, and the general conditions of our earth, it is impossible to understand the true workings of nature. I am of Holland descent, and authentic history shows that fifteen hundred years ago my foreparents were wild savages, dwelling in huts of bark and caves in the rocks, in almost a nude state, subsisting upon the chase, occupying about the same position as the Diggers of the sage deserts do at present. And to-day the race hav attained a high degree of civilization. If in so short a time a race can advance from a state of barbarism to a highly civilized people, how easily could the wild and naked savage develop from the ape or orang outang, especially since we can advance plenty of facts to prove that millions of years were occupied in the progressiv change! I was born of Christian parents, and was early taught the whole Bible theology. I was taught that a book that came from God could not be wrong. My early days were supremely orthodox. My first step toward the light of truth (by Christians called Infidelity) was a small geography given me by my father. The Bible described the earth as flat, standing on pillars, with a hard sky overhead, to which sun, moon, and stars were fastened. But the little geography dispelled all Bible doctrin on that point. Again, I came in possession of some works treating on geology and astronomy. From the Bible I had learned that this was the one and only world, the center of the universe, and that everything visible was created in six days all out of nothing, by a pre-existing God. But geology and astronomy removed every vestige of such doctrin. My Christian teachers now became alarmed lest the boy was drifting to the bad, so they began to advise me to read the Bible more, thinking thereby to bring me back to primitiv ignorance, called Christianity. Accordingly I began at the first chapter of Genesis, and perused the ancient volume carefully unto the last chapter of Revelation, and continued my search until I had gone three times through the wonderful, infallible, holy Bible, and the general conclusion reached was that their holy book contained more and meaner lies, and more disgusting, filthy, and obscene reading, than any other book I ever became acquainted with. The fraud exposed itself so clearly that I at once proclaimed myself an Infidel. And it was then I learned something that I never knew before, that the church did still persecute, slander, and abuse all who dared to differ with them. Since I hav dared to raise my voice in opposition to the dominating rule of the clergy, I hav been slandered, oppressed, and persecuted to the full extent of the Christians' ability. But my bosom swells with pride when I remember that I am marching with the grand army of progression that is sweeping the dark curse of ignorance, superstition, and infamy from the face of our green earth.

Yours for progression, JOSEPH A. SHADE.

LONGSTREET, GA., July 27, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Among my friends North, East, South, or West, there may be some who read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and if so they may be pleased to hav my present thought in reference to orthodox beliefs. In a few words let me say, first, last, and for all time to come, that I believe nothing. It is not needful that I should. I think instead, and use my reason. Belief establishes nothing as truth; proves nothing; demonstrates, settles nothing, but unsettles all things we think essential to our peace and happiness. Hence let us forever drop the word from our vocabulary, and use the word "think" instead. Why say, "I believe thus and so," when by so saying I admit that I don't know? Why not say, "I think it may be so," or, "I think it may not be so," or, "I don't know?" What I know as truth is not a matter of belief. What I don't know cannot become a fact, a truth, to me, until 'tis demonstrated or proven to me. All true science and philosophy must be in accordance with human reason, by the exercise of which truth is brought within the grasp of human consciousness.

Again, belief is based upon evidence. What do I know of the character and reliability of the so-called inspired witnesses? Really, nothing worthy of entire confidence. I hav not entire confidence in everything said by my best and most truthful friend. I do know no man is infallible. No one has all the truth, or the exact truth. Reason must be the standard of truth, as justice that of right.

The foundation of so-called essential beliefs science proves to be false, viz., the creation theory; the fall, and inherited total depravity; the atonement; the miracles; the trinity; and the infamous doctrin of eternal punishment.

And my last word now shall be this: Believe nothing; think instead; strive to know the truth. And why? Simply because 'tis best.

Our Ingersoll is doing more to excite and liberate thought, raise doubt, and giv new hope and joy, than any other man living to-day, great, noble, brave man that he is! And notwithstanding he has in the past said hard, bitter things (from his standpoint) against the South and Southern people, yet were he to come among us now, thousands would flock to hear him lecture.

Freethinkers should be encouraged to talk and work. There are many Freethinkers in and out of the churches, but no organization of Liberals and no lecturers. I am doing what I can in distributing such reading matter as I am able to buy, and will continue to do so, hoping for a time to come when no man will be found in this enlightened country who will not be ashamed to say, as one said a few days ago, "I'd rather not read Ingersoll's lectures, or it will unsettle my faith." "Yes," I said, "'twill put you to thinking, and if you are afraid to think, then I advise you not to read it." T. N. MASON.

CANTON, ILL., Aug. 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav a suggestion to offer for the consideration of professed Liberals, especially money-loaners, viz.: I think a good plan for them to adopt would be to loan money at the lawful rate of interest, and charge no bonus, but charge only for drawing up the papers between the loaner and borrower, and not join in with the rich money-loaner to help rob the poor. The money borrower, like the majority who stick out their money to loan, does. JOHN W. ABBOTT.

KANSAS CITY, MO., Aug. 3, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: As man awakes from the stupor and unconsciousness of his elementary condition to that unfolded point where he can comprehend something of his immediate surroundings, he comes in contact with precedents in the shape of laws, religions, and customs, which he is expected to subscribe to, no matter how abhorrent they may be to his individual nature, and whatever element of his being proves too powerful to yield to their demands is considered the outcropping of legal contempt and religious depravity. Political and religious dogmas of all kinds are founded upon the mistaken idea that humanity started as the fountain-head of intelligence, and that life consisted in simply keeping the original stock at par value. The evolution theory makes it appear that humanity is a diverging, expanding entity; consequently precedents are the dead and dried-up mullein-stalks of a last year's growth. The unfolding process in nature, discernable all about us, proves beyond a doubt that a precedent has been a crown of mildew and a vampire to every age. W. W. JUDSON.

OSHKOSH, WIS, Aug. 21, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: My last letter published in THE TRUTH SEEKER was copied in the Oshkosh Daily Times without my asking, and had the desired effect, for the Times has the largest circulation of any paper in this city; consequently it reached a great many readers in this vicinity, and will cause many to inquire for THE TRUTH SEEKER. We hav our annual Turnfest here this week, and the city is full of Germans, and, as I cannot speak their language, I hav to take a back seat.

Yesterday I received a letter from John E. Remsburg, together with a copy of "Bible Morals," and I must say that I never read a book with more interest; and everyone who has not read it should do so at once. I wish I had a few more of them to lend around among my friends, for, although small, it speaks volumes. I think if every church-member should read that book the coming week, that on the following Sunday one-half of the preachers would hav to speak to empty seats. I hav not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with Mr. Remsburg, but from what I hav read of him, he is second to none but Colonel Ingersoll, and I earnestly hope he will liv to be one hundred years old, at least, with full possession of all his powers. When I had finished reading his book, I said to myself, "Oh, that we had a million such men in this country!"

And now, in conclusion, I must say that it pains me to hear so much backing and filling in regard to Spiritualism. We are all Liberals. One will say, "I am a Deist;" another will say, "I am a Spiritualist;" another, "I am an Infidel;" another is an Agnostic, but all these claim to be Liberal. Now let us all join issue, like a band of brothers, and fight for the Nine Demands, and let these side-issues go, for a time at least; for, if Spiritualism is true, it will not be long in proving the fact, and vice versa. I am not a Spiritualist (unless some friend asks me out to take something), but I like to giv everyone a chance.

We hav got a hard fight ahead of us, and it is very important that we should be united. It does not look well for the churches to see differences springing up among us. Let us first wipe out this taxation without representation, and all other things will be added. GEO. M. HARE.

BRIEF HISTORY OF ENGLISH ORTHOGRAPHY.

CANYON CITY, COL., July 28, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav many times been asked how our spelling came to be as it is, and hav come to the conclusion, with your consent, briefly to answer that question.

England was settled by people from countries on the continent; by the Kelts, Angles, Romans, Saxons, Danes, Franks, Normans, and others. The people of each nation took with them not only their language, but their own way of spelling. At one time seven kingdoms existed in England, and this resulted in a mixture of languages and some change in speech, but the priests of the nation, the Druids, who alone did the writing, each retained the spelling of his own language.

As no printing was done, and hence there were no school-books, kings themselvs couldn't write, nor even read. The priests, being the more intelligent, were the law-makers and judges, and by virtue of their position in society were exempt from military duty and taxation.

In the course of several hundred years what is now called the English language grew out of the slow amalgamation of tongues; and this justifies Dr. Webster in sayin . "The English language is derived from twenty different languages." Hence we hav so many ways of spelling the same sounds, and each way is supposed to indicate etymology.

This reminds of an Englishman in Illinois who wore a piece of sheepskin on his shoulder. He was asked one day by a neighbor why he wore that wool on his shoulder. His answer was, "To preserve my etymology." "How is that?" said the neighbor. The Englishman replied, "I am an Englishman, but nobody would know it if I didn't wear this patch to let folks know that my ancestors dressed in sheepskins."

So we all use the sheepskin in the shape of silent letters to preserve etymology, and so obscure the sounds, which are the stuff that words are made of. We are getting words almost every day from other languages. In this state we get words from the Spanish language, and in every case we adopt their orthography, but pronounce the word as it is most convenient. Instead of re-spelling them and presenting the sounds to the eye as they are to the ear, we retain the Spanish spelling, which to those who hav never heard the word spoken is a perfect jumble. As our language is now written, we are forced to learn two sets of riddles: first, the speech being given, to guess the spelling; second, the spelling being given, to guess the speech. A. B. PIKARD.

OKETO, KAN., Aug. 18, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: It is not very often that I bother you with a letter from this Christian part of God's moral vinyard. I am so much revived in my Infidel belief by hearing two lectures here, given by J. L. Andrew, of Fort Scott, this state, that I must let the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know it. Mr. Andrew is traveling through the state giving lectures in all the towns on the line of the railroads. Mr. Andrews saw my name in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and he hunted me up. He told me that he would lecture in our hall here on "Modern Infidelity," if it was to let now. I told him we had better bait them first with something softer than Infidelity, for it is a church-ridden community. So he agreed to lecture on "Education," which he did. The lecture was a good one; was well delivered, and appreciatingly received. This lecture broke the ice in this town. It was given on Friday night. At the end of this lecture Mr. Andrew said he would lecture here again on the next Tuesday night. Between times he went to Marysville, a town twelve miles south of Oketo. There he gave two lectures on Infidelity. They were well received and largely commented upon by the Liberals of Marysville.

On Tuesday night he met us again in Oketo, and lectured on "Modern Infidelity." Certainly there were some of the orthodox Christians caught in the trap we set for them, although they did not stand it long. When Mr. Andrews told them of solid facts they left the nall. This lecture was also well received and elegantly delivered. Mr. Andrew knows how to handle the subject that he lectures upon. He made his home with us while delivering those lectures, and I kept him busy till late at nights enlightening me on Freethought and Liberalism. He has promised me to call on us this winter, and speak to us again. His lectures were free. Our lecturers cannot make a living this way. We Liberals must organize and prepare to help our lecturers. The church helps theirs. I was told to-day by a friend that the leading Christians of Oketo are going to hav me arrested for bringing such a man as Mr. Andrew there to lecture, disturbing them.

One Methodist member here says he hates to hear those lectures; he says he cannot read his Bible so well afterwards.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Let Us Love While We Can.

We all should love our parents dear,
Our sisters, brothers, friends,
Who stay with us so short a time,
Until life's journey ends.

We place them in the silent tomb,
Away from worldly care;
While round their graves the violets bloom,
And perfume all the air.

Hardest of all hard griefs to bear,
When loving hearts do sever,
Is when we pause and sadly think,
Perchance they sleep forever.

Then let us love them while we can,
As the days pass swiftly by;
For everyone, like autumn's leaves,
Must wither, and fade, and die.

Making Ginger Cookies.

"Saturday morning, no lessons to-day,
Hurrah for business, and then we can play!"
So merrily say my little girls three,
While they're as busy as busy can be
Making ginger cookies.

"Two cups of molasses, of butter one,
O mamma! isn't this jolly fun?
The ginger and soda we'll not leave out;
We must mind closely what we are about
Making ginger cookies

"We'll mix the dough in a nice little lump,
And knead it together thumpety thump,
Never allow it to stick to the pan;
We want to do it just right, if we can,
Kneading ginger cookies.

"We roll it so gently this way, then that,
Till it's as thin as the rim of your hat,
Then cut them out smoothly, firmly, and true;
Remember, no ragged edges will do,
Cutting ginger cookies.

"We'll make for papa a bouncing big one
As e'er was seen in the light of the sun;
Dear Baby Ernest shall hav a fat pig;
'Twill set him to dancing jiggety-jig—
Funny ginger cookies.

"Then in a buttered tin, all in a row,
Into a 'piping-hot' oven they'll go;
Please go back, mamma, and shut up the door,
I'm sure we don't need your help any more
Baking ginger cookies."

[A few weeks since, through the kindness of George E. Macdonald, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a prize, Lossing and Spencer's Complete History of the United States, handsomely bound, was offered for the best original story which should be written for the Children's Corner within a stated time. From a number of well-written stories we hav selected the one that in our judgment seems a trifle better than the others, though where all are so good it was hard to discriminate. We shall publish the best among the other stories sent us hereafter, and as these evince decided talent, both in composition and construction, we would advise the writers to improve all opportunities, and should another prize be offered on some future occasion, we trust the successful winner may be found among them. With many thanks to Mr. Macdonald for his generous kindness and interest in the Corner, and also to our friends for their competitiv efforts, we remain your friend, ED. C. C.]

Converting a Blacksmith.

Once—no matter when or where, but in my thirteenth year—I was standing in the door of a drug-store thinking of serious subjects—wondering how I could manage to escape the torments of perdition, of which our preacher had depicted such a terrible picture the night before. Suddenly my meditation was interrupted by a lame Swede, hobbling into the drug-store. He gave the druggist a prescription, and, after receiving his medicin, started out. But the druggist said, "Hold on! Money!" The Swede, turning around, stammered something in broken English, which I did not understand. "No money! Well, giv back the bottle, then," said the druggist, as he jumped over the counter and took the medicin from the old Swede's hand. The old man murmured something again in his own language, and, as he gazed wistfully at the medicin, a tear made a white streak down his smoke-stained face. The crowd inside the store giggled, and I felt an inward impulse prompting me to pay for the medicin and giv it to him. I was afraid the crowd would laugh at me, however, and did not do so. I thought right, when the pitiful object needing charity was before my eyes, but had not the courage to act my thoughts.

When the old man had gone, the druggist explained that some of the most ignorant foreigners do not understand our customs, and this one had given all his money for a prescription, thinking that was all the paying necessary. I pitied him more then than ever, but the opportunity to help had gone.

The evening of the next day, while reading the town paper, I noticed this item:

"DIED FROM NEGLIGENCE.

"An old Swede was found dead this morning in his shanty, near the southwest borough line. An inquest was held, and it was found that he had died from the effects of an injury received on the railroad, which was not necessarily fatal. Ten cents' worth of medicin would hav saved his life. He will be buried by the company."

Every word sent a sickening shudder through me. I said to myself: "Oh, how horrible to die for the want of ten cents! Oh, that I had paid it and saved his life! Oh, that he were here now!" But he was gone, and forever. It was too late for me to do as my conscience had dictated.

We all fail to take advantage of opportunities, just as I did. How often we spend our time trifling, while we might be doing great things! Think, dear reader, how many times "the sun goes down without some good deed being done." How reluctant we are to remember that

"The drying of a single tear has more
Of honest fame than shedding seas of gore!"

Feeling sad over the fate of the old Swede, my old meditation soon took possession of my mind again. Trying to imagin what a long time forever is, and wondering whether the souls in hell ever got used to burning, I became frightened and sought relief in prayer. While I was not exactly a Christian, I expected to be one, some day. I reflected that what I had done, or rather failed to do, for the Swede, was a virtue in contrast with some of my previous actions. Yes; I had done thousands of worse things, and always prayed and was forgiven, or thought that I was; and this time I prayed again, but still it occurred to me that I was a sinner, and a bad one. However, I would sin on a few years, praying the while. I would hav something out of life, and make it all right before death. I would "get religion" some time.

While my mind was running thus, mother announced that it was bed-time, it having been two hours since I sat down with the paper. "Go to bed, Charlie," said she, "and in the morning you may rise early and read this book before Sabbath-school. It belonged to your Uncle Joe. Though you never saw him, you know enough of him. He is only six years older than you, and it was only three years ago that he went to hear Colonel Ingersoll lecture, and then wrote pieces against the Bible, and got into jail for his wickedness. This good book was his before that time. He got it at Sabbath-school."

All this and more I had heard many times before.

Next morning I read most of the book, and, in Sunday-school, talked to my teacher about its contents. It, like all such books, told how a delicate Christian girl, six or seven years old, had converted a cruel, heathen boatman, etc. My teacher said that was just the kind of child I ought to be. Neither of us knew any heathen boatmen, but we both knew that a young blacksmith—a poor Infidel who never heard of God—had recently come to town, and needed Christian light. He had hired me once to blow the bellows for him, and I was not much afraid of him. When I suggested that he should be read to from the Bible as the heathen boatman had been, my teacher, Miss Chamer, said nothing could be better. So after she had told me several religious things to say to him, it was agreed that I should take my Bible, and do as would a Sunday-school-book hero.

The blacksmith "kept bachelor's hall" in a small but neat hut near his shop.

Before Monday's sun had been long set, my Bible and I were in his quiet home. After civilities had been passed, I said solemnly, as Miss Chamer had told me, "Well, Mr. Stomer, do you think you are saved?"

He looked rather astonished as he replied, "Saved! I guess so. None of me seems to be wasted."

"What ignorance!" thought I. "He needs light and must hav it." Then I continued: "Mr. Stomer, do you believe the word of God and know he will save you?"

"Havn't seen the word of God. Am not lost. Don't know there is a God."

"Don't know there is a God! Why, who made the world? 'The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God.' Even the cannibals and heathens acknowledge an omnipotent God of the universe. You are worse than—than—a heathen." (This I had learned by rote from a book.)

"Well, Charlie—I think you said that is your name—the case is like this: you believe in a God, the cannibal believes the same, and I do not. Now, who, in your opinion, is most like the cannibal?"

That staggered me. He had silenced my thunder in a few simple words. But, thinking of some more I had learned from the book, I commenced anew: "The Bible is the book that stands the test of ages. It surpasses in grandeur all other books. It has been the guide of great men and believed by every civilized being. More Bibles are printed than any other book in the world—a standing argument for its divinity."

Here I stopped, for I remembered no more of what I had learned for the occasion.

Pausing a moment, he said quietly: "We all hav weak points. Some great men believe in the Bible. That might be their only weak ness. True, a good many Bibles are printed, but it has been proved false, and a lie cannot be printed often enough to make it true."

My strongest points were gone again, but I thought of one more argument. "If it were not for hell and hope of heaven," said I, "everybody would murder everybody else. If there is no hereafter, what difference is it if we are bad."

"Charlie, your mind has been deformed by superstition. According to your own statement, Christians do right through the fear of hell, while Infidels do right without the promis of reward or punishment. Which, then, is the best? Is the banker who lends on security better than the man who givs? If you should find out, as I hav, that Christianity is one of the basest frauds that ever cursed this world; if you should discover to-morrow that religion is the most blighting superstition that ever enslaved the intellect of man, would you—speak honestly—be inclined to go and murder all your friends? If so, then who most needs conversion?"

He paused for reply, but my lips were sealed by amazement. This gush of eloquence, coming in such a natural tone from the poor, heathen, Infidel blacksmith, filled me so with wonder that that I couldn't move. Soon he resumed his talk, quoting scripture that I had never heard or read, and making his pungent comments. He opened his mouth and sentences seemed to fall involuntarily from his lips with as much ease and rhythm as water bubbles from a mountain spring. His closing sentences seemed to make the marrow quiver in my bones.

"Prayer," said he, "is the vaporing of mental deformity. You hav seen a cucumber deformed by putting it into a bottle while small and letting it grow there. In the same way your mind, when young, was pressed into the clamp of a creed and is now deformed like the cucumber. You heard of the Swede that died. He was not a Christian. If you are right, he is at this moment in hell, and the Christian druggist who refused him medicin will some day be in glory, and hav the pleasure of refusing the Swede a drop of water to cool his burning tongue. Religion is a disease, of which you are in the first stage. Study its history, and you will know how to treat it. To do wrong is to violate one of the laws of nature, and God can't forgiv you. Put your hand in the fire, and pray if you please, but it will burn; so it is with all the laws of nature. Crime is a cause and misery an effect. As Ingersoll says——"

"As who says?" I interrupted, without exactly knowing why.

"Ingersoll," he repeated.

"Why, that's the man that mother says Uncle Joe went to hear before grandpa drove him off." (I had learned he was driven off)

"Joe who?"

"Joe Remots."

"Where is he now?"

"Don't know. Dead, I guess"

"I guess not."

"Why?"

"Because I am he! Spell my last name backward."

Space doesn't permit me to tell what followed; but Joe gave me a bundle of TRUTH SEEKERS, and accompanied me home. I never tried to convert any more heathens. We are all Freethinkers. TOCS WAINE

A Letter From Father Hacker.

MY DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS: I hav been reading your little letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and am very glad you hav good books and papers to read. When I was a boy, there were no books nor papers fit for children to read. They had a little book called "The Catechism," that said, "In Adam's fall we sinned all;" and when I asked what that meant, they told me a God created a ga den of fruits and flowers and took some dust and made a live man out of it, and then put the man to sleep and took a rib out of his side, and out of that bone made a full-sized woman, and placed them in the garden and told them they might eat of the fruit of all the trees except one in the middle of the garden, and if they ate of that they would die. Then, when the Lord God was gone, a snake came and talked with the woman. Did you ever see a snake that could talk? Do you believe any snake ever talked? No; you know better; but when I was a boy almost everybody believed it, except one man that they called "Old Tom Paine." I was eight years old when that good man died, but I remember how they talked about him, because he could not believe the snake story, and other similar falsehoods, told in the catechism and an old book called the Bible. They said everything they could about Paine that was bad, and thought his body ought to be burnt, because he could not believe the big snake and fish stories.

Well, the catechism, about the only book children had to read when I was a boy, says the snake talked with the woman and pursuaded her to eat the forbidden fruit and giv some to her husband, and then the Lord God came and drove them out of the garden, and told them they, and all their children, must go to a lake of fire and brimstone and burn forever and ever after they were dead. That is part of the abominable stuff children were taught when I was a child, and I am very glad you hav good books and papers and are taught something better. I will write to you again if you like this. Your friend,

Berlin, N. J. J. HACKER.

Correspondence.

COIN P. O., Aug. 17, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I read the Children's Corner every time. I see where other little girls write, so I thought I would try. We liv about two miles from Rock Lake. We go out boat-riding, and hav very pleasant times. This is a hilly country, and rocky in places. We lived at Walla Walla before we came here, and I like to liv here much better than down there. I hav four brothers and five sisters. I am twelve years old, and will be thirteen in September. The stage that runs from Sprague to Colfax stops here every day and changes teams. My father is not at home now; he is working in a quartz mill in Montana. Water is scarce in this country; but there are two springs on our place, and a creek running through one corner; and there is a nice Quackingast grove, where we go to play in the warm weather. The thermometer has been as high as 108° in the shade If you don't think this is good enough, please don't hav it printed. So I will close.

Yours truly, FLORENCE E. WHITE

Advance Notice.

MEN, WOMEN, AND GODS: and Other Lectures. By Helen H. Gardener. Price, $1.00 in cloth, 50 cts. in paper.

This forthcoming book has a reason for its being. It is not written from vanity, but from conviction. It has a fixed purpose amid all its sparkling humor and shafts of wit. It is the eloquent expression of what woman most deeply feels and most deeply resents. It is a declaration of war against theology, whose very essence is the subjection and indignity of the feminin element. Theology is mascu lin. It is the despotism of brute force. It is the enthronement of mere power—of might instead of right.

Emancipated woman protests against theology. It is not a half truth, but a whole lie. The subjection of woman has been made a frightful nightmare by theological assumptions. The head of the woman is the man; the former is the nullity, the latter is the only will. Woman cannot choose; according to theologians, she has no soul, no legal volition, and hence no freedom of person.

Helen Gardener's book is a tremendous impeachment of this barbaric notion. It is a book born of intensity of feeling. It surges with indignant thought. The storm of rebellion is in many a quivering line. It is the result of many a laborious hour. It is compact of learning. It is unanswerable in its fervid reasoning.

Nevertheless it is a light, bright, and airy book. There is not a heavy line. The storm-cloud is flecked with brilliant sunshine. The argument moves along with buoyant utterance. Even when we are angry at the dark unfolding of tyranny, the rippling laughter bursts at some bright conceit whose electric illumination intensifies the deeper revealing. It has the interest of a novel. It is like a kaleidoscope in its delighful passage from "grave to gay, from lively to severe."

This book is based upon fact; it deals with verity. It is scientific, however, from the standpoint of poetic insight. It speaks the truth in the light of imagination; the glittering wings of fancy mark the pathway of its logic; the reader is convinced, and at the same time infinitly amused. Only the theologian preserves a solemn face. His aspect is funereal, for these flowers of wit decorate his coffin. He is buried with a joke, as he ought to be, for his death is the regeneration of the world. We are glad that Helen Gardener has employed the method of ridicule, that she has chosen to giv us a sort of "divine comedy" of the destruction of the ancient world of theology. Solomon says there is a time to laugh, and really the time has come to laugh at the barbaric notions of our ancestors. This is the wisest way to treat them. They are utterly absurd. Why not smile at the ridiculous jumble? To refrain from mirth is to be disloyal to truth. Cachinnation in the nineteenth century is the logical result of the theology of the fourteenth. There can be no other finale. To be altogether serious is to be insincere.

All Liberals (and especially women) should read this book, and circulate it far and wide. It is a good missionary document. Its array of facts has been gathered by a skilful hand. Its appendix is exceedingly valuable. It is a unique collection of rattling musketry against the church—dynamite gathered from its own arsenal, thunderbolts forged in the armory of its own history.

There will be a vast demand for this book. Its bright and original thought; its limpid stream of logic; its keen wit and radiant humor, and its thorough honesty of purpose make it one of the most valuable and interesting contributions to Liberal literature. By its admirable eloquence the "gods" of yesterday must giv place to the Men and Women of to-day. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

A very ancient granite, which is now in the museum at the "Indian House," was dug from the ruins of a temple in the island of Bombay. It is, as described by the late Thomas Maurice, (Indian Antiquities, vol IV, p. 372,) "A bust composed of three heads, united to one body, adorned with the oldest symbols of the Indian Theology, and thus expressly fabricated according to the unanimous confession of the sacred sacerdotal tribe of India, to indicate the CREATOR, the PRESERVER, and the REGENERATOR of mankind; which establishes the solemn fact, that from the remotest eras, the Indian nations had adored a TRIUNE DEITY."

Nearly all the Pagan nations of antiquity, in their various theological systems, acknowledged a Trinity in the divine nature. This is shown in BIBLE MYTHS.

A SHORT LESSON IN HISTORY.

A double-page picture contrasting science and theology, showing how the one has labored for human advancement, and how the other has always opposed it. The German-American thus describes it in detail:

The palmy days of the church witness the burning at the stake of Bruno, the pope and priests witnessing the burning of the heretic with expressions of joy. Galileo is represented sitting in his study, the pope holding the sword of inquisition over his head, and to save his life being forced to recant his philosophy. Martin Luther is represented tacking up his "Right of Private Judgment." Behind him stands the pope with the bull of excommunication drawn, and beside him the headsman's block and ax of infallibility. In their study are Morse and Stephenson applying their inventions to practical tests, and in the rear of them the Presbyterian pulpits are filled by two of the broadcloth gentlemen denouncing the inventions as "Thwarting the will of God," and branding these men and their inventions as "Heralds of Antichrist." Ingersoll stands on a platform apparently delivering his lecture "Which Way?" which he holds in his hand. Talmage approaches the platform at the colonel's back, pulling after him, by the arm, the chief of police, who holds in his hand the warrant of arrest for blasphemy. The colonel seems to take no notice of the spleeny, cadaverous form ascending the platform at his rear. Then come the modern teachers of salvation, the Salvation Army, with their drums, bones, tambourines, and streamers, (and screamers, too), also a fac simile of our crazy army. A group of likenesses of the teachers of science, Haeckel, Humboldt, Darwin, Tyndall, and Huxley, is also shown. The likenesses throughout are remarkably correct. As a pictorial history the caricatures contain volumes.

Price, six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents; twenty-five copies for $1; one hundred copies for $3. We wish that the friends of Freethought would distribute thousands of these telling pictures.

THE MODERN BALAAM.

Showing the Balaam of modern times to be the priests. It is a splendid pictorial argument. Price, per dozen, 30 cents; per hundred, $1.50.

The Course of Human Life.

In the hour of mellow twilight,
When the day's hard work is done,
And the somber shades of evening
Follow soon the setting sun.
When at midnight mortals slumber,
Gathering strength for future strife,
I hav often thought and pondered
On the course of human life!

Days and nights succeed each other,
As the ages roll along;
Life and death are no exceptions,
Health and sickness, right and wrong.
Disappointments, joy, and sorrow,
Discord, harmony, and strife,
Expectations for the morrow,
Mark the course of human life.

Who can tell the why and wherefore
Of the things we daily see?
Faith in Gods and revelations
Leaves unsolved the mystery!
Faiths, beliefs, religious dogmas,
Foster enmity and strife;
Ever block "the wheels of progress"
On the path of human life.

Facts and figures—some despise them;
Both are stubborn, useful things.
Demonstration is their motto,
They ask no aid from Fancy's wings.
Use them justly, they'll relieve you
From perplexity and strife,
But, misplace them, they'll deceive you
With regard to human life.

Lives are chiefly what we make them,
Be they honor, grief, or shame;
Some, when troubles overtake them,
Try to screen themselvs from blame.
Knowledge, self-reliance, reason,
Lessen ignorance and strife;
Charity, in timely season,
Smoothes the course of human life.

And is life but Fancy's vision,
Like a shadow or a dream?
"Life is real, life is earnest,"
Things, to us, are what they seem.
Life's vicissitudes and changes,
Filled with turmoil, care, and strife—
What would life be, though, without them?
What the course of human life?

Life is mortal, or immortal,
Which, I own, I cannot tell,
But, while living in the present,
Let us liv this present well:
Since there is no time but present,
Why let future care and strife
Make our present so unpleasant
In the course of human life?

Things that can't be comprehended
Let us wisely let alone;
Our known duties to each other
Don't exchange for those unknown!
Guided by the lamp of reason
Through all bickerings and strife,
Make our earth a present heaven,
Bless the course of human life.

HOMER A. BILLINGS.

To Keep Sweet Love.

From the Home Journal.

A smile or two in the morning,
A loving word through the day,
A kiss or two at even-tide,
Are very good things, they say;
Are very good things to keep sweet love
From roving far away.

So when my sweet came smiling,
With tender words all day,
And a good-night kiss at even-tide,
What could I do but say—
"Let us wed and keep love, darling,
From roving far away."

—James Clarence Harvey.

A Modern Creed.

From the Sun.

Let all the dogmas perish,
Let all the legends go;
All the grander and the brighter
Are the truths that we shall know;
All the clearer and the sweeter
The paths of duty here;
No present filled with anguish,
No future filled with fear. —D. T.

The Flood and the Ark.

In the autumn of 1830 I attended a Methodist camp-meeting in the interior of Georgia, and heard a sermon which I hav never been able to forget or describe.

The speaker had just been licensed, and it was his first sermon. In person he was small, bullet-headed, of a fair, sandy complexion, and his countenance was indicativ of sincerity and honesty. He was taking up the Bible in regular order for the first time in his life, and had gotten as far as the history of Noah, the ark, the flood, etc. Besides, "just before his conversion he had been reading Goldsmith's 'Animated Nater,' and the two together, by the aid and assistance of the sperit, had led him into a powerful train of thinking as he stood at his work-bench, day in and day out." The text was: "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall the coming of the son of man be," and he broke out in the following strains:

"Yes, my brethren, the heavens of the windows was opened-ah, and the floods of the g-r-e-a-t deep kivered the waters-ah, and there Shem, and there Ham, and there Japheth-ah, a-l-l a-gwine into the ark-ah.

"And there was the elephant-ah, that g-r-e-a-t animal-ah, of which Goldsmith describes in his 'Animated Nater'-ah what is as big as a house-ah, and his bones as big as a tree-ah, depending somewhat upon the size of the tree-ah, a-l-l a-gwine into the ark-ah. And the heavens of the windows was opened-ah, and the floods of the g-r-e-a-t deep kivered the waters-ah, and there was Shem, and there was Ham, and there was Japheth-ah, a-l-l a-gwine into the ark-ah.

"And there was the hippopotamus ah, that g-r-e-a-t animal-ah, of which Goldsmith describes in his 'Animated Nater'-ah, what has a g-r-e-a-t horn-ah, a-stickin' right straight up out of his foreward-ah, six feet long, more or less-ah, depending somewhat on the length of it-ah, a-l-l a-gwine into the ark-ah.

"And there was the giraffe-ah, my bretherin, that ill-contrived reptil of which Goldsmith describes in his 'Animated Nater'-ah, whose fore legs is twenty-five feet long ah, more or less-ah, depending somewhat on the length of 'em-ah, and a neck so long he can eat hay off the top of a barn-ah, depending somewhat on the hithe of the barn-ah, a-l-l a-gwine into the ark-ah. And the heavens of the windows was opened-ah, and the floods of the great deep kivered the waters-ah, and there was Ham, and there was Shem, and there was Japheth-ah, a-l-l a-gwine into the ark-ah.

"And there was the zebra, my bretherin-ah, that b-e-a-u-t-i-f-u-l animal of which Goldsmith describes in his 'Animated Nater'-ah, what has three hundred stripes a runnin' right straight around his body-ah, more or less, depending somewhat on the number of stripes-ah, and nary two stripes alike-ah, a-l-l a-gwine into the ark-ah.

"Then there was the anaconder-ah, that g-r-e-a-t sarpint of which Goldsmith describes in his 'Animated Nater'-ah, what can swallow six oxens at a meal-ah, provided his appetite don't call for less-ah, a-l-l a-gwine into the ark-ah. And the heavens of the windows was opened-ah, and the floods of the great deep kivered the waters-ah, and there was Shem, and there was Ham, and there was Japheth-ah, a-l-l a-gwine into the ark-ah.

"And there was the lion, bretherin-ah, what is the king of beasts, accordin' to scripter-ah, and who, as St. Paul says-ah, prowls around of a night like a roarin' devil-ah, a-seekin' if he can't catch somebody-ah; a-l-l a-gwine into the ark-ah.

"And there was the antelope-ah, my bretherin, that frisky little critter-ah, of which Goldsmith describes in his 'Animated Nater'-ah, what can jump seventy-five foot straight up-ah, and twice that distance down-ah, provided his legs will take him that fur-ah, a-l-l a-gwine into the ark-ah. And the heavens of the windows was opened-ah, and the floods of the great deep kivered the waters-ah, and there was Japheth-ah, a-l-l a-gwine into the ark-ah.

"But time would fail me, my bretherin, to describe all the animals that went into the ark-ah. Your patience and my strength would giv out before I got half through-ah. We talk, my bretherin, about the faith of Abraham and the patience of Job-ah; but it strikes me they didn't go much ahead of old Noer-ah. It tuck a right smart chance o' both to gather up all that gopher-wood, and pitch, and other truck for to build that craft-ah. I am a sort of carpenter myself, and hav some idea of the job-ah. But to hammer, and saw, and maul, and split away on that one thing a hundred and twenty year-ah, an' lookin' for his pay in another world-ah—I tell ye, my bretherin, if the Lord had a-sot Job at that, it's my opinion he would a-tuck his wife's advice inside of fifty year-ah. Besides, no doubt, his righteous soul was vexed, every day, hand runnin', with the filthy communications of the blasphemous set that was always a-loaferin' and a-saunterin' around-ah, a-pickin' up his tools and a-misplacin' 'em, and a-callin' him an old fool, or somethin' worse-ah, and, to cap the climax, he was a preacher, and had that ongodly gineration on his hands every Sunday-ah. But the Lord stood by him and seed him through the job-ah, and when everything was ready he didn't send Noer out to scrimmage an' scour and hunt all over the wild world for to git up the critters and varmonts that he wanted saved-ah. They all come to his hand of their own accord, and Noer only had to head 'em in and fix 'em around in their places-ah. Then he gathered up his own family, and the Lord shut him in, and the heavens of the windows was open-ah.

"But my bretherin, Noer-ah had use for patience after this-ah. Think what a time he must a-had a-feedin', and a-waterin', and a cleanin' out after sich a crowd-ah. Some of 'em, according to Goldsmith's 'Animated Nater'-ah, was carnivorious, and wanted fresh meat-ah; and some was herbivorious, and wanted vegetable food-ah; and some was wormivorious, and swallowed live things whole-ah; and he had to feed everything accordin' to his nater. Hence, we view, my bretherin-ah, as the nater of the animals wasn't altered by goin' into the ark-ah, some of 'em would roar, and howl, and bark, and bray, and squeal, and blat the whole indurin' night ah, a-drivin' sleep from his eyes, and slumber from his eyelets-ah; and at the first streak o' daylight the last hoof of 'em would set up a noise accordin' to his nater-ah, and the bulls of Bashan wer'n't no whar-ah. I've often wondered how their women stood it. Scripter is silent on this pint-ah; but I think I know of some that would a-been vapory and nervious under sich circumstance-ah, and in an unguarded moment might a-said somethin' besides their prayers-ah.

"My bretherin, one more word for old Noer-ah, and I will draw to a close-ah. After the out-beatin' time he had, first and last, for so many hundred year-ah, if he did, by accident or otherwise, take a leetle too much wine on one occasion-ah, I think less ort to a-been said about it-ah. Besides, I think he was entitled to one spree-ah, as he made the wine hisself, and, accordin' to scripter, it makes glad the heart o' man-ah.

"My bretherin, as it was in the days of Noer-ah, so shall the coming of the son of man be-ah. The world will never be drowned agin-ah. It will be sot a fire and burnt up, root and branch, with a fervient heat-ah. Oh! what will wretched, ondone sinners do on that orful day-ah? They will be put to their wit's end, and knock and straddle around in every direction-ah. For all at once, my bretherin-ah, they will behold the heavens a darkenin' ah, the seas a-roarin'-ah, the tombs a-bustin'-ah, the mountains a-meltin'-ah, and everything, I think, will be in a confused and onsettled state."—Independent.

Book Notices.

A CONDENSED OPINION.

From the Altruist.

"Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" and other Agnostic poems. By Samuel P. Putnam. All of lofty sentiments and well written.

"The Religion of Humanity Better than Eternal Punishment." By M Babcock. Price 10 cents. The hell idea made an absurdity.

"Truth." A poem by Edwin Kingsley, Minneapolis, Minn.; price 25 cents. A pamphlet of 57 pages giving the Bible fits in short meter.

"Bible Fabrications Refuted and its Errors Exposed." By O B Whitford, M D. Forty-seven pages; price 15 cents. Full of plain facts.

"St. Matthew Before the Court." By Secularist. Thirty-eight pages; price 10 cents. This is in dialog form and is very interesting.

The above five books are published by the Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York city, and would be very serviceable tracts to show the inconsistencies of the Bible.

YOU ARE WELCOME TO THEM, MR. PINNEY.

Whitford, M.D.; "St. Matthew Before the Court," by "Secularist;" and "Truth: A Poem in Three Parts," by Edwin N. Kingsley. The Truth Seeker Company is constantly publishing interesting and instructiv matter in various forms and its weekly journal is the leading Freethought paper in America. Send to the company for a catalog of their books. For the three pamphlets named the publishers will please accept our thanks.

LIKES ALL THE PAMPHLETS, TOO.

From Spirit Voices.

"St. Matthew Before the Court." By Secularist. Published by the Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York. We always take great pleasure in reading all books that lead toward the overthrowal of superstition, and this work has more than pleased us, for it is filled with instructiv and entertaining reading. We only wish it might be placed in the hand of every Christian who believes that the gospels were inspired by divinity. The conceit of the author in putting the evangelists on the witness-stand is a most happy one. We most cordially recommend this neatly-printed pamphlet of 38 pages to all Liberals as a suitable tract to do missionary work for Freethought.

"Bible Fabrications Refuted, and its Errors Exposed." By O. B. Whitford, M.D. Pamphlet, 48 pp. Published by the Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York. A book calculated to do an immense amount of good, as are all books written in the same spirit of candor and fairness. Dr. Whitford has been a close student of the Bible, and his keen eye has not missed its fabrications and glaring absurdities. Such pamphlets, scattered broadcast over the world, would aid greatly in ushering in the era of Freethought that needs must come when old superstition is completely annihilated.

"Truth: A Poem in Three Parts." By Edwin A. Kingsley. Published by the author, Minneapolis, Minn. Pamphlet, 66 pp. The auther, in his preface, says: "This poem is most respectfully addressed to the people of a hundred years to come, who, it is confidently believed, will perceive and appreciate 'Truth.'" A strange admixture of rhyme and prose, containing many grand ideas and some very radical thoughts.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

IMMORTALITY INHERENT IN NATURE.

Gems of Thought.

I FEEL, while standing in his birthplace, a deep veneration for the memory of Burns, whose cheerful songs and poems are still sung and repeated with admiration by the people of Scotland, as well as wherever the English language is spoken. The natural outbreathings of his soul have made the world happier and better. Some of his songs are the sweetest ever penned by man, and his "Man's a Man for a' That" is grand and glorious. He believed in manhood, but despised tyranny, oppression, and cant, whether of royalty or of a hypocritical priesthood.—D. M. Bennett.

IT will not do to take the ground that the rapid rise and spread of a religion demonstrates its divine character. Years before Guatama died, his religion was established, and his disciples were numbered by millions. His doctrins were not enforced by the sword, but by an appeal to the hopes, the fears, and the reason of mankind; and more than one-third of the human race are to-day the followers of Gautama. His religion has outlived all that existed in his time; and according to Dr. Draper, "There is no other country in the world, except India, that has the religion to-day it had at the birth of Jesus Christ." Gautama believed in the equality of all men; abhorred the spirit of caste, and proclaimed justice, mercy, and education for all.—R. G. Ingersoll.

IN the view of the legalist, God is arbitrary power—a despot whose will makes right. In the view of the Liberal, God is moral ideal, a person in which right precedes will; a law which causes all things to work together for the good of all. In the view of the legalist, man is naturally bad; sin his normal state. Depraved by an accident of history, he is incapable of good, except by a radical change in his nature. In the view of the Liberal, man is naturally imperfect, liable to sin, but also capable of good. Sin is an abnormal action of his nature; rectitude his normal state.—Dr. Hedge's Ways of the Spirit.

YET much remains
To conquer still; Peace hath her victories
No less renowned than war. New foes arise
Threatening to bind our souls with secular chains;
Help us to save free conscience from the paw
Of hireling wolves, whose gospel is their maw.
—Milton.

IF we believe that there is a God, and that he created heaven and earth, and that he rules the world by his unceasing providence, we cannot believe that millions of human beings, all created like ourselves in the image of God, were, in their time of ignorance, so utterly abandoned that their whole religion was falsehood, their whole worship a farce, their whole life a mockery. An honest and independent study of the religions of the world will teach us that it is not so; will teach us the same lesson that it taught St. Augustine, that there is no religion which does not contain some grains of truth. Nay, it will teach us more; it will enable us to see, in the history of the ancient religions, more clearly than anywhere else, the divine education of the human race.—Max Muller.

IT needs the overflowing heart
To giv the lips full speech.
Think truly, and thy thought
Shall the world's famin feed;
Speak truly, and thy word
Shall be a fruitful seed;
Liv truly, and thy life shall be
A great and noble creed.
—Horatius Benar.

WHEN the sentimentalists of New England desire to go back and moralize on the condition of the past, let them read the history of other nations and content themselves with their abstractions, for they are but abstractions at best. I say it in no unkindness, and with no desire to put any badge of inferiority on the Indian race, but, in all animated nature, the rule prevails of the survival of the fittest; in all history it has been so, and will be so to the end. (The very volume on the pulpits of the East, when preacher and congregation gush in sentimentality over the wrongs of the Indian, contains that wonderful history of the forty years' pilgrimage by the chosen people of God, in which, under his immediate direction, they seized territory after territory and exterminated the inhabitants, smiting them hip and thigh, even to the destruction of men, women, and children.) It has been so, and will be so unto the end of time. The superior race, under the expansiv force of civilization, will push aside the inferior. The Roman people had dominion over the then known world; but they fell before the superior force of the nations of the north. The Norman overcame the Saxon, who had before that driven out the Celts and the Picts, and when our fathers landed upon this continent, the wave of civilization commenced rolling westward until it struck the shores of the Pacific Ocean. As well cope with the silent but irresistible forces of nature as with the expansion that comes from the superiority of blood and of race.—G. G. Vest.

HE who lies intentionally is guilty of impiety, inasmuch as he acts unjustly by deceiving; and he also who lies unintentionally, inasmuch as he is at variance with the universal nature, and inasmuch as he disturbs the order by fighting against the nature of the world; for he fights against it who is moved of himself to that which is contrary to truth, for he had received powers from nature through the neglect of which he is not able now to distinguish falsehood from truth.—Antoninus.

THE spirituality of the divine nature is fully implied in Genesis, where it is said that God created the heavens and the earth—the chaos out of which they were formed—in the fact that he is represented as being in all places, and seeing, though often unseen, and that he communes with the spirit of the patriarch in sleep and in trance. And yet he is conceived of as having bodily parts. The wickedness of man grieves him at his heart; he smells a sweet savor in burnt offering; he walks in the garden of Eden; he comes down to see the city and the town which the children of men build, and he appears to Abraham in human form, and Jacob believes that in the person with whom he wrestled he had seen the face of God.—Dr. Moffat's Comp. Hist. of Religions.

Odds and Ends.

AN Iowa farmer recently met a young man who was engaged to be married to his eldest daughter, and after cowhiding him, and cutting off one of his ears with his knife, knocked him down and kicked his lung out of place. The old gentleman objected to the young man because he wasn't a professing Christian.

FOR its private mark the bank of Devil's Lake, Dakota, has adopted a vignet, the base of which is a sheaf of wheat on which rests a silver dollar, over which Satan is climbing, holding in one hand the scales of justice and in the other a lance. At his left is a map of the lake, which forms the place for writing the amount of draft or check, and on which are the words, "Giv the devil his due." When the cashier skips for Canada, one of these fine days, the managers will regret having inculcated such expensiv doctrins, or will they carry out the idea themselvs by closing the doors, and paying ten cents on the dollar?—Peck's Sun.

A NEW YORKER who happened to be in Boston for a day, availed himself of the opportunity to make a social call. He was shown into the parlor, and while waiting there a nurse entered with a little baby in her arms. "Ity pity, tootsey wootsey," said the New Yorker, addressing his conversation to the infant; "oozy, boozy, goozy, nooz——" At this juncture the child set up a howl that made a steel engraving of Emerson rattle against the wall. "I'm afraid she doesn't understand you, sir," remarked the nurse: "There, there, Penelope," she said, soothingly; "And were you alarmed at a combination of circumstances over which you had no control that led to the unexpected appearance of a strange gentleman?" At this the screwed-up expression on the child's face relaxed, her sobs ceased, and she slumbered.

They walked at eve on the beach together,
In the tender glamor of love's first joy,
And life ahead was all summer weather,
And their hearts were as light as the tossing buoy.
And he said: "O love, all the path before us
Is peopled only with fairy forms,
That have tenderly dropped from the blue sky o'er us
To promise a life unvexed by storms."

1885.

Now do they walk on the beach together,
The beach that is covered with old plug-hats,
Tomato-cans, and defunct shoe-leather,
And brooms, dead horses, and Thomas cats.
And as they observe the old tin and cowhide
And quadrupeds stretched in their last long sleep,
They yearn to just behind some old scow hide,
And hav a protracted old-fashioned weep.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.

Make your children mind you. Obedience is the first law of the family.

Be stern.

Spare the rod and spoil the child.

Be severe.

Be kind to your children.

Be firm.

Never whip your children.

Be gentle.

Never lie to your children.

Never hit your children with an axe, or a club, or a broom-handle, or a red-hot stove-lid.

Never shoot your children with a revolver, a shotgun, a derringer, or a repeating-rifle.

Never lie before the children. Always wait till they hav gone to bed.

Never permit your children to over-eat.

Let your children eat whatever and whenever they please.

Never permit your children to drink gin, whisky, brandy, rum, or champagne to excess.

Never permit your daughter to marry a Mormon.

Never smoke before your children.

Never kill anyone, or rob a savings-bank, in the presence of your children.

After your children are married, never let them liv with you. It is cheaper to liv with them. (This is important.

Never let your son become a politician, or a financier, or a cowboy, or a leading American humorist.

A FEW SEASONABLE RHYMES.

The Fat Man Rejoices.

The months roll on, the torrid heat
Of summer's almost over;
The nights are growing cool again,
The fat man feels in clover.

Put 'em Away.

Though Sol still glows, his tropic strength
No longer he can muster;
We'll soon put by the palm-leaf fan,
Likewise the linen duster.

He Knocks the Dust out of the Bible Again.

The parson back to work, refreshed,
Now stirring sermons preaches;
The girls are coming home again
In bevies from the beaches.

Misspent and Well-spent Time.

Some sighing over precious time
They've wasted in flirtations,
And some, who've hooked their fish, to make
Their wedding preparations.

They've Got Home.

Now people who've been "living back,"
Avoiding observation,
Throw open wide their blinds in front,
Which means home from vacation.

No more High Life Below Stairs.

From beach and mountain families
Are coming home in dozens,
And from the kitchen, servant maids
Are clearing out their cousins.

Kissed by Old Sol.

The pretty girls who went away
With cheeks as red as cherries,
We notice coming back to-day
With faces brown as berries.

A Premature Explosion.

Now in the fields from dawn till dark
The ardent sportsman lingers,
With what result? An empty bag,
A missing pair of fingers.

Notes and Clippings.

GERMAN geologists estimate that the Dead Sea will be a mass of solid salt a thousand years hence.

THE Sun of this city has at last found out that Cardinal Newman's brother F. W. is a pronounced Agnostic.

WHO preacheth much and hard against the charm
Of money-getting, styling it a harm,
Yet hath for higher pay an itching palm?
The parson!—Clipper.

THE Chicago Express says that the co-ordinate branches of the government are: The executiv—Wall street; the legislativ—Vanderbilt; the judicial—Jay Gould; the people—B. Damned.

A DETERMINED effort is being made to clear the Salvation Army out of Chicago. The members are arrested at every attempt to parade noisily, and neighbors will no longer stand the din of their meetings.

THE Congregationalist says, "on good authority," that so far as can be remembered, no young man born and bred in the nine Congregational churches in Hartford, Conn., has within the last fourteen years become a minister.

SISTER WOODWORTH is an Indiana evangelist. While she exhorts the people to repentance her husband provides food for them. These peculiar camp-meetings are very popular; and yet there are critics who say that the prices charged for the meals rather more than cover the mere cost, which is all that the Woodworths profess to desire.

A GENTLEMAN of this city remarked to his wife, while on the way home from meeting, where the preacher took for his text: "Whomsoever the Lord loveth he chasteneth," that he "was going right home and whip everyone of the children." "What for?" asked his wife. "Why, I love my children, and the minister says that's the way the Lord shows his love for his children, and then commands us to follow him."—Labor Advocate.

THAT was a good hit made in the House of Representativs a day or two since. Rev. Dr. Felton moved that $500 each be appropriated for life-sized portraits for the eminent Baptist, Rev. Jesse Mercer, and the equally eminent Methodist, the late Bishop Pierce. Mr. Arnheim, who is a devoted Jew, immediately arose and moved that $25 be appropriated to secure a cheap picture of Moses.—Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution.

THE Buckeye state boasts an evangelist who can discount all rivals. He whipped a twelve-year-old girl in his family because she did not pray loud enough to suit him, and then demanded to be sent to jail for his efforts at evangelizing her. Failing in this he has placed seats for a thousand persons in an open-air lot in the rear of his house, and there gathers crowds to listen to his extravagant eccentricities. The painful part of the story is that he is overwhelmed with invitations to go and do evangelist work in other quarters.

"THE one thing that strikes a Philadelphia man hardest," said a visitor from the City of Brotherly Love, as he strolled up Broadway last evening, "is the complete way in which a New-Yorker minds his own business. When you're walking down Chestnut street, and meet a fellow about your own style and station in life, you stare at one another, each one noticing the other's dress and mannerisms, wondering in a passiv sort of way where he comes from, whether the grandfather of one was as big a man as the other's venerated ancestor, and so on through the whole list of antecedents and consequents, until they meet and pass. And then there are ten chances to one that they'll gape over their shoulders at each other. Here a man passes you as though he was walking for the Astley belt, and on his last lap. If you happen to get in his direct line of vision he gives you one glance that photographs your personality in an instant, or looks through you with the preoccupied gaze of a man whose mind is so entangled with matters of importance that he is utterly oblivious to the images impressed upon his retina. It makes no difference whether the stranger is attired in Indian war-paint, London broadcloth, or Chatham street sandwich boards, he is never accorded a second glance, and a dog-fight or a drunkard fares no better."

THE most impertinent and intolerable accessory of the Grant obsequies has been Parson Newman. Evidently laboring under the impression that he is quite as great a man as was the dead soldier, he has not ceased to exploit himself obtrusivly before the public, and in his sermon at Mount McGregor he violated all the canons of good taste, and approached the borders of blasphemy. The people at large, bowed with sorrow, would gladly forget Newman, if he would permit them to do so. But the parson, looking at the matter from a business point of view, appears to think he will never again hav such a chance of advertising himself—and we hope he is correct.—Mercury

ON Methodism in the South, the Freeman's Journal says: "Methodism has encouraged cant, mediocrity, and sentimentalism. It has killed the power of thinking in the rising generation of the South, until it can only think in a Methodistical way. Methodists who become aware of the narrowness of the persons who rule them religiously, rush from an inflated and illogical belief in 'salvation' to utter unbelief. 'Salvation is free!' shout the Methodists. If it were not free half the Southern Methodists would not be so willing to embrace the doctrins that promis it to them. It costs nothing, if we may judge it by the lives of its most voluble adherents—not even the sacrifice of leading a moral life."

MR. ED. WHEELER, one of the lecturers at the Lake Pleasant Spiritualist Camp-meeting, must be a painfully sensitiv person, if what he says of himself is true. He says: "I know a woman, who, when I am sick, simply bakes bread for me and I eat the bread and rise up like a giant." This may be due to the yeast she uses, but seeming not to hav thought of that, Mr. Wheeler continues: "I eat other bread and I know I hav swallowed some unholy thing; and for my life I cannot tell any difference in the taste of the bread." Bread that is holy is generally light, and bread that is unholy is necessarily heavy. That may be the difference, but Mr. Wheeler thinks otherwise, for he says: "But the one is the bread of life prepared by an artist hand, the other by a slave woman." He is also particular about other things: "When the woman smooths my pillow and makes my bed to-day, if her hand moves conscientiously and with a sense of duty and delight in the performance; if she is genial, loving, and true, I rest in dreams of beauty and delight. But if she goes to my bed and chugs it together in a hurry—grumbling all the while—I go to bed at night and don't know what is the matter with me." Probably at such times nothing is the matter with him, but we do not doubt that there are people to whom such imaginations are as bad as realities.—Winsted Press.

SOUTH CAROLINA people were surprised the other day over the discovery that the officials of a colored church had applied to a trial justice for a warrant against a member who had "repeatedly, wilfully, without just cause or provocation," refused to attend service. It seems odd enough that anybody should suppose the assistance of the courts could be thus invoked by the church in a matter of disciplin, and yet there are people still living in the older parts of the country who can remember when the relations between church and state were very intimate. The little town of Rowe, high among the hills of western Massachusetts, has this week celebrated the centennial anniversary of its incorporation, and some interesting facts bearing upon this matter were brought out in the historical address. When the first clergyman was settled over the church—for there was but the one Congregational church in such a place in those days—a town meeting was called, and the voters not only ratified the choice of the church in the selection of a man, but bound the town to pay £50 a year toward his salary, besides raising £150 as an inducement for him to settle in the town, this latter sum, by the way, to be paid in neat cattle, in three annual instalments. The town also voted to invite a council for the ordination, and to ask a clergyman in a neighboring town to preach the sermon, as well as to hold a day of fasting and prayer, in view of so solemn an event. Even as late as 1812 the town, as a political organization, again took its share in the settlement of a clergyman, so that the older people at the recent celebration could recall the time when the connection of church and state was a vital union. When one reflects how absurd it would now seem to tax all the people of a New England town for the maintenance of a denominational clergyman, it seems very strange to remember how short a time ago such a performance appeared the most natural thing in the world.—Post.

A LETTER in the Denver Tribune-Republican of August 7th thus describes the feeling in Salt Lake city, and outlines the future conduct of the Mormon Church: "Throughout this city there is a feeling of unrest and apprehension. There are daily conferences of Mormon leaders in all the various wards; there are other gatherings weekly, in which the results of the ward meetings are discussed. No effort is spared to reach a conclusion to which the whole Mormon forces can be held in unbroken line. When Orson Arnold last spring went into Judge Zane's court, pleaded guilty, promised obedience to the laws, and was dismissed with a trifling fine, there were scores of polygamists who openly or privately dedecided to follow his example. I know that Bishop Hendricks, of Richmond, said he would do so, and I hav reason to believe that Bishop Sharp, of Salt Lake, reached this decision. There can be no question that Mr. Dinwoody and several others returned from their voluntary exile determined to plead guilty and to promis to obey the laws. Had this course been left unchecked, it would hav been hard to find an avowed polygamist at the close of this current year. Arnold was denounced, not as a renegade or apostate, but as a weak, foolish, and misguided man. The church was too great and too magnanimous to punish an act of thoughtlessness; but such a thing must not happen again. Four weeks later Bishop Hendricks stood trial, and went to the Idaho penitentiary; others went to the Utah prison, and Bishop Sharp, Henry Dinwoody, and others hav pleaded not guilty, and know that the trial at the fall term means the inevitable six months among felons. It is feared that Henry Dinwoody will flinch. He is a wholesale furniture dealer in this city, and is worth $150,000. He is a lover of ease and comfort, and has arrived at an age when men begin to thoroughly enjoy the results of successful and laborious business life. He is said to be disgusted with Rud. Clawson, his son-in-law, who is serving a long term for polygamy, and whose legal wife has secured a divorce, and it will add much to the horrors of prison life to be shut up for six months with his daughter's discarded husband. Yet if Mr. Dinwoody submits to the law there will be an army of men to tread in his footsteps, and this must be prevented. It is easy to see, therefore, that the Mormon councils hav enough to discuss. The power behind those councils is enormous. There are, doubtless, fifteen thousand men who are enrolled in what is known as the Order of the Melchizedeck Priesthood. In the Endowment House at Salt Lake city, or in one of the Utah temples, through solemn ceremonials, and in the presence of men they fear, all these men hav taken vows of obedience which they hold higher than the obligations of human law. If there is any one thing preached to the Mormons with greater persistence than another, it is this, which is heard in every Mormon meeting, in every place, and at all occasions: "Obey the priesthood!" Whatever pressure the Mormon councils see fit to apply to the polygamists will be put on without mercy and backed by the whole Mormon body. Every detail will be agreed upon—every man will know his work—and there will be no forbearance hereafter toward the polygamist who pleads guilty in a Federal court or promises to obey the laws. In brief, it may be safely prophesied that future strife in Utah, if any exists, will be within the Mormon church."

News of the Week.

THE Rev. Heber Newton has announced a lecture for next Sunday on "The Religious Aspect of Socialism."

PRINCE BISMARCK has demanded immediate satisfaction from Spain for the recent insult to the Germany embassy, population, and flag by Madrid mobs.

THE land reform agitations of Henry George in Scotland hav resulted in the arrangement of a great agrarian campaign. The first mass meeting of the series was held on the 2d in the open air at Portree, Isle of Skye.

ON the 2d a dissatisfaction which has been brewing for months among the miners at Rock Springs, Wy., caused by the importation and employment of Chinese, and discharge of the whites, culminated in a massacre of one hundred of the former. Troops hav been dispatched to the scene.

THE working of "influence" received an illustration on the 5th when Justice Walsh surprisedly recognized in George King, brought before him on a charge of assault, a man whom he had a few weeks ago committed to the penitentiary for six months for assaulting a lady. Why he is not in the correctional institution at present is a question which the magistrate proposes to solve.

THE Chicago Socialists held a parade on the 6th, and the trade unionists, at present in bitter opposition to the former body, and tabooing the red flag, held an opposing parade on the 7th. A noticeable feature of the Socialists' parade was an exemplification of their principles of equality and fraternity in the absence of drum majors, or leaders of any kind. Many women and children took part, the former wearing either crimson feathers in their hats or pieces of red ribbon pinned to the bosoms of their dress, and the children all having red stockings.

A PROPOSITION to introduce into the schools of this state text-books teaching the ruinous effects of alcohol is opposed by many on the ground that the books prepared, while depicting the evil effects of the excessiv use of alcohol on the system, so fail to set forth the danger attending all use of it as a beverage, so neglect to mark the insidious and cumulativ effect which powerfully leads to its excessiv use, and so contrive to abound in suggestions concerning its possible benefits, as practically to encourage the formation of the habit of moderate drinking by the young.

A GRAND trade unionists' parade was held in N. Y. city on the 7th, with 12,000 men in line, terminating with an afternoon and evening picnic at Sulzer's Harlem River Park, where were present 25,000 workingmen, their wives and daughters. Among the inscriptions on the banners carried in the parade were: "Ninety cents a day—the effect of competition in labor;" "We ask all virtuous men and women to inquire into the cause of our strike," carried by the girl silk-weavers who hav struck against an insulting foreman; "Prepare for the Eight-Hour Law;" "An injury to one is the concern of all;" "United we stand, divided we fall;" "Agitate and organize." One wagon bore a cartoon of a tenement house, on each side of which were a liquor saloon and undertaker's store, with the inscription, "How our workingmen liv." Another cartoon labeled, "Before election," represented a huge workingman towering above the shoulders of a crowd of politicians who pressed about him seeking his vote, while in a companion picture, "After Election," the workingman, dwindled to a diminutiv size, was ignored by the now inflated politicians. A picture of a negro represented "The Chattel Slave of 1858," and one of a factory hand "The Wage Slave of 1885." The members of the Petroleum Exchange massed themselvs on the steps of that building while the procession was passing and insulted the trade unionists, who were with difficulty restrained from beating the offenders, black and blue.

The American Secular Union:

ITS NECESSITY, AND THE JUSTICE OF ITS DEMANDS.

II.

III.—The Catholicity of the Nine Demands, and the ground to be covered.

There is nothing whatever in the smallest degree sectarian in what the Union proposes to accomplish. Our aims are truly catholic, which is more than can be said of any religious system that the world has ever seen. The "holy Catholic church," for whose welfare thousands of Christians pray every Sunday, is to be found nowhere on the face of the earth. There are what are termed a Roman Catholic church, a Greek Catholic church, an Anglo-Catholic church, a Catholic apostolic church, and a sort of Spiritual Catholic church, each one of which limits and denies the catholicity of the other. How truly anyone of them is Catholic, let the others decide. As already stated, it is not pretended for one moment that all who unite with us will agree upon every matter that comes before them, either of a social, political, moral, or theological character. Such an agreement would be completely out of harmony with the fullest right of that private judgment for which we contend. In the material universe variety is to be observed everywhere, and much more so will it be the case in the world of thought. It is stamped on all things in eternal nature, and indelibly imprinted on the mind of man. We see it alike in the stars and in the rocks that form the earth's crust; in the largest mammals and the minutest insect life; in field and forest glade; in the lofty mountain peak and the cloud which envelops its summit in mist; in rivers, lakes, and seas, and in all that makes the fair scene of nature lovely and delightful. In the mental universe, therefore, we may expect the same variety, more beautiful, because more natural, than any uniformity of belief or stereotyped monotony of thought. We want no Procrustes's bed either of a theological or an intellectual character. Nature maintains variety as well as uniformity, and we prefer to follow her. Well has it been said of those who strove to bring all men to one way of thinking:

> Tyrant more cruel than Procrustes old,
> Who to his iron bed by torture fits
> Their nobler part, the souls of suffering wits.

Genuin catholicity does not consist of sameness of opinion, but of the freedom to think being conceded to all. We teach men to prefer knowledge to faith, love to opinion, true life to an orthodox creed, and noble acts and genuin deeds to catechisms and confessions of faith. We instruct them to speak kindly as well of those who differ from us as of those whose views are in accord with their own. We aim at establishing, instead of antagonistic sects warring against each other, a society wide enough to embrace all lovers of the human race, an association that shall be the more perfect because of its diversity, just as a band of music is rendered the more perfect by the variety of its instruments, or a monarch's crown by the difference in the jewels which it contains. The principles that we enforce are of such a nature that no man can oppose them without sacrificing justice; hence, we hope to enlist on our side men and women who love truth rather than mere opinions, conscientious conviction rather than safe policy, and the good of the whole rather than the professed creed of the few. Our demands are reasonable as well as just, and in these Freethinkers of every type, and every class, should see something to be desired. What are those demands?

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from taxation.

It is really difficult to see upon what just ground this can be resisted. We only ask that churches shall be placed on the same footing as other public buildings in which people assemble together for various purposes. Why should a distinction be made between them? We do not seek to close the doors of the church by force so long as there are people who think it their duty, or privilege, or pleasure, to attend such places. Where they go is an affair of their own—perhaps we could wish that their time was better employed; but all we ask is that, in justice to their fellow-men who do not share their views, nor participate in their worship, those who do attend church should pay their equal share of the taxation of the country in which they liv.

A very remarkable reason was given some time ago by a sort of humorist why churches should not pay taxes. It was that women principally attend such places, and women ought to be exempt from taxation. Probably all religious people will not be prepared to admit the full force of this reason. It reminds me of an anecdote told in England of the celebrated Sydney Smith, who on one occasion went to preach in Edinburgh, and finding a congregation awaiting him made up almost exclusivly of females, he took for his text the words, "Oh, that men would, therefore, praise the Lord," and then, looking round at the congregation, he facetiously exclaimed, "Oh, that men"—laying great stress on the word men—"would praise the Lord!" If this great writer were alive to-day, perhaps he would exclaim, "Oh, that men would pay their taxes!" No doubt it is a fact that most of the congregation is made up of women; but, admitting that to be so, and with the charge of want of gallantry staring me in the face, I must still protest against the public buildings, either of one sect or another, being free from taxation. Woman, even in a church, ought not to be made the cloak of a wrong—justice forbids it; and there are thousands of noble and Liberal-minded women who will condemn it. A true woman does not seek to thrive upon injustice to others. Neither does she require favors through the sacrifice of what is right. Justice is her plea, equal facilities for the performance of duty her claim, and fair play and no favor her demand. In seeking to accomplish these ends all women should hav the hearty co-operation of their masculin co-workers in the Secular ranks.

In seeking to win justice for mankind, the American Secular Union includes in that task the emancipation of woman; for, so long as her rights are ignored, her value depreciated, and her legitimate demands unheeded, so long will a cruel and disgraceful injustice be perpetuated, and one of the noblest objects of Secular advocacy be neglected. Without committing itself as an organization to any one particular phase of what is called "woman's rights," the Union contends that both sexes should hav equal opportunities for moral, mental, and general advancement, without special privileges being claimed on either side. The only superiority to be recognized in either case is that of intellect, and that will, as a rule, assert itself both in man and woman. Theological domination has of late years received many severe blows; but the most effectiv of all will be struck when women, as a class, can be brought to see their true position, understand their real value and influence, refuse to be treated as slaves, and when, with intellectual dignity and moral force, they insist upon having the rights which undoubtedly belong to them. The time is close at hand, we hope, when woman will more than ever see the necessity of taking the cause of her redemption under her own control. From a bitter experience she has discovered, with Addison, that "the woman who deliberates is lost." The great advantage on her side to-day is that she knows what to do to vindicate her rights, and, what is more, she has learned how to do it, and what is still more, she intends doing it. That she will win in securing for her sex mental freedom and social rights appears to me to be certain. Justice is not the monopoly of either sex or any class. And as Tuke observes:

> He is a fool who thinks by force or skill
> To turn the current of a woman's will.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in state legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

This demand is very much of the same character as the previous one. To resist it is to perpetuate an injustice in favor of a church that has persistently done its best to hinder all reform, and to make secure those impediments which for ages hav prevented the free development of the liberties of the race. In the words of Lecky, the church has "uniformly betrayed and trampled on the liberties of the people—she has invariably cast her influence into the scale of tyranny." And Macaulay, in the first volume of his "Essays," says: "The Church of England continued to be for more than one hundred and fifty years the servil handmaid of monarchy, the steady enemy of public liberty." The Rev. Dr. Allon also remarks: "Throughout its history the Established Church has been uniformly inimical to all questions of public freedom and national righteousness. . . Is there a single record on the statute book in England in which a victory for freedom, for philanthropy, has been won by the Established Church, or even led by it? I very much doubt it." Thus the evil that we demand should be removed is one protected and defended by an institution which is proved at the bar of history to hav been the opponent of all advancement, and which our experience testifies is still the upholder of injustice and class favors. We do not ask that the chaplains of those institutions should be deprived of their profession; we only request that they may cease to receive state pay for their services in our public institutions.

Here is where the great injustice comes in. If the religious societies are determined to send ministers to visit prisons, asylums, and soldiers, they must do so at their own expense; and then we should, upon the same principle, be allowed to send our public teachers also. In the name of eternal justice we protest against state money being expended in the promulgation of doctrins which we and a large number of our fellow-citizens hold to be injurious in the extreme. State money is the people's money, and it has no right to be used for religious purposes at all. Americans condemn the injustice of the state church in England—and a monstrous and burning injustice it is. Yet what is the state payment of chaplains in any public institution but a small injustice of exactly the same kind? Even if religious belief were universal in the country, it might then be questioned, with great show of reason, whether it would be right, or even judicious, to uphold it by the aid of state pay. But as it is, when so many thousands of good citizens hav no belief whatever in the dogmas of the churches, it certainly is indefensible that these men should be called on to support systems of religion which they believe are calculated to do harm instead of good. And while such an anomaly exists in a free country we shall never cease to protest against it with all the power at our command. The times are past when the people will tamely submit to bear burdens imposed by priestly greed and theological arrogance. Those who desire to perpetuate such wrongs and follies, born of ecclesiastical monopoly, may pay for it if they see fit; but we, as Secularists, object to subscribe for such a purpose. True civilization is the nearer reached, proportionately, as we depart from the bondage of religious exactions and sectarian enforcements. To make that departure possible and thorough is the object we hav in view in insisting upon this, the second demand of the American Secular Union.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

Very little need be said in favor of this demand, inasmuch as its nature is similar in character to the other two already given. We protest, under any circumstances, against the payment of public money for sectarian purposes, but our protestations are the more necessary when such money is used in support of an education which is really worse than no education at all, and in placing theological limitations upon the exercise of human benevolence. True charity and the desire to help the unfortunate are not religious impulses felt only by the professors of religion. In every heart wherein humanity reigns the inspiration to benevolent acts is to be found. Poverty may be a misfortune, but it is not a crime; and the profession of any creed should not be required to secure an alleviation of the miseries born of want and penury. Justice and humanity, not theology and dogmas, should control the regulation of all charitable institutions. The training of youth should also be kept free from ecclesiastical associations. Much of the instruction now being given at many of the existing institutions is injurious in the extreme, for it often fills the youthful mind with erroneous ideas of the true mission and duty of life; it creates a bigoted intoleration toward opposit views, and hinders the recognition and development of true educational pursuits. The moment the instruction which is imparted to the rising generation becomes associated with any form of theology, it should at once forfeit all claim upon the public exchequer. A story is told of a man who ceased attending a certain church, and was afterwards met by the local clergyman, who, on seeing the backslider, exclaimed, "Why, Mr. Jones, you hav left us, I hear. What might be your reason for so doing? Did you think our road to heaven was not a good one?" "Oh, sir," replied Mr. Jones, "the road was perhaps good enough—that seldom bothered me; but the fact is, I found the tolls much too high!" So we say, the tolls for these sectarian purposes are far too high. Theological institutions are bad enough in any case, but when we are taxed to support them the climax of injustice is reached. The tolls are too high, and our object is to endeavor to get rid of them altogether.

CHARLES WATTS.

Roman Catholic Principles.

"The state also derives its power from God, but on entering the Christian church its natural rights and range of action are adjusted and limited by the superior claims of the supernatural order of things it has submitted to. The civil magistrate has entered into the house of God, and must sit at the footstool of the vicar of Christ. When the kings of the earth put on the livery of Christ they must obey their master's orders. When once they come under the jurisdiction of the church, kings cannot at their good pleasure withdraw from its authority."—Essays on Religion and Literature, edited by Archbishop Manning, London, 1867.

"When the king of the Netherlands, in 1885, gave his people a constitution which guaranteed religious liberty, the Belgian bishops objected in these words: 'To swear to maintain liberty of religious opinions and equal protection of all worship means the protection of error as well as truth, the development of anti-Catholic doctrins, the blending of the tares with the wheat, and the slow but certain extinction of the true faith in these happy countries. To swear fealty to a law bestowing equal rights on loyal subjects of various beliefs would sanction all measures intrusting the interests of our holy religion in thoroughly Catholic provinces to Protestant functionaries.'"—Contemporary Review, August, 1885.

SPANISH ROBBERS LOSING THEIR RELIGION.—At Cartelos, in the province of Gallicia, some bandits entered the curate's house, and being disappointed in finding money they bound him upon a straw mattress and set fire to it. His corpse was found blackened—and his God did not come to save him!

Facts and Fallacies of the New Testament Heaven.

NO HUMAN LOVE IN HEAVEN.

The Sadducees denied the resurrection and future existence. Naturally it occured to them if a woman had seven brothers for her husbands—and under the decree of the holy God she had no choice but accept them: "If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and hav no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger; her husband's brother shall go in unto her, and take her to him to wife, and perform the duty of a husband's brother unto her" (Deut, xxv, 5).

It would be strange if the woman did not love one of the seven more dearly than any of the others. And one of the seven would love her more dearly than did any of the others. Yet the one she loved most might not be the one that really loved her most. The Sadducees ask, Who should hav her for wife in heaven—they all had her on earth?

Christ declared, "For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven" (Matt. xxii, 30).

"And Jesus answering, said unto them, The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage. But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead neither marry, nor are given in marriage, neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection" (Luke xx, 34, 36).

Children of this world marry and are given in marriage, become husbands, wives, fathers, mothers; but in heaven all are as the angels, neither marry nor are given in marriage, hence the question of who should hav for wife the woman of seven husbands. The question which she loved most, or which loved her most, could never arise, simply because human love does not exist there.

Angels, and those who become like them, do not rejoice at arrival of those near and dear to them. Not what degree of relationship, but what degree of sin, decides the cordiality of the welcome to heaven, and regulates the rejoicing among the angels.

If loved ones are now in heaven, they rejoice more over the arrival of such characters as the saintly Jesse James, or the godlike Charles Guiteau, than over the arrival of father, mother, brother, sister, husband, wife, or child. Says Christ: "I say unto you that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth more than over ninety and nine just persons which need no repentance" (Luke xv, 7). These facts help to explain that very much controverted text, Luke xiv, 26: "If any man come to me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brothers, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."

This hate (Gr. miseo, to detest, to abhor) of loved near and dear ones is a condition of being a disciple of Christ and having any share in heaven.

We call the attention of our would-be facetious critic to the fact that Liberals accept all that is of truth in the Bible or any other book, and we commend to his consideration the truth recorded in Prov. xv, 2: "The tongue of the wise useth knowledge aright, but the mouth of fools poureth out foolishness."

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Is It Spirits?

Our friend Thompson, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 22d, takes Elmina severely to task because she cannot believe in certain phases of Spiritualism, or believe the phenomena (granting it real) comes from spirit power.

All along, for thirty years, I hav been told to go and see and I would believe. I finally did go and visited every phase of phenomena, and saw nothing I could not hav done under the same conditions. I hav since written to four of the so-called clairvoyant mediums, and with no better success. I received for my money nothing more than thee or I could hav written. Wherever I gave no news, I received none. Those who know me best know I am not "bigoted," but am always open to conviction, and glad for truth.

As Dr. Hollick says, I am ready to change any opinion I hold if evidence convinces me I am wrong.

Why is it I can hear so much of spirits painting oil-paintings in a few moments, or fruit being placed under a machine cover and in a few moments only cores remaining, solid rings being passed around a man's neck, spirit-lace disappearing in one's hands (dematerializing), and furniture moving about at beck and call of mediums, and yet I can see nothing of all this? I do not deny clairvoyance—"reading writing and printing through wood, and even iron"—but I hav only hearsay evidence of it. Why was not my letter to Bennett read by Bonton, the medium at Liberal? It was handed in under the best of circumstances and conditions. I do not pretend to say why all that Thompson tells occurred, or to giv scientific reasons for it. I do not know why one planet is light as cork, and another condensed into rock. There is so much we do not know that it were vanity indeed in me were I to try to giv a why for many of the commonest things. We may say what cannot be, and yet not say why things are. If, in all the millions of years we hav lived, none of all the millions of earth's inhabitants hav given us one solid, indisputable fact showing death does not end all, is it not reasonable to believe it does so? I read all the accounts of phenomena with interest, because they are phases of human mind, and its powers and capacities. At least, those that are real are. The fact of frauds like Slade, and Caffray and wife, and deluded ones like Chesebrough, makes it difficult indeed to know what is real phenomena, and what is trick or delusion. Mind-reading does not depend upon what is in the mind at the time of the reading. If it is a reality, it goes deeper than that, and reads things long since forgotten by the mind—things even casually impressed that the mind never knowingly took cognizance of.

This is proved by people in delirium telling of things they could not remember when sane, and speaking in foreign tongues they never understood, only casually heard at some previous time. The impression was made, but not recognized.

I hav just had a letter from a noted clairvoyant—the editor of a paper—and I quote from it the clairvoyant reading given to my last letter to said editor. Should any desire the name, I will giv it if permitted. I quote it as proof that I am not bigoted, for I confess the reading seems to me to be as correct as I could hav given of myself. But I claim the knowledge given was gleaned from my writings and not clairvoyantly.

I sense more through your letters than others can looking at the outside. I confess at one time I thought you would not acknowledge the proof if you received it, but through your letters I sense a feeling of investigation for the good there is in Spiritualism and not merely a vain desire to be stubborn; neither do I sense bigotry with you but a heart full of love and goodness to the world, and while you feel it needful for the good of yourself and family that you count the cost to yourself in both money and time, yet to me through the magnetism of your letter I feel nothing of a mean or miserly disposition. You are convinced through fire, and many of your pet ideas are ruthlessly trampled under foot when you feel that they are wrong. You are as uncompromising with yourself as with others when convinced that you hav been wrong in your belief in the past. You are loving, kind and obliging in your disposition, but when a friend injures you it is worse for themselvs. You forgiv and would watch by their sick bed if needed, but when the necessity for that is over, retain to yourself the privilege of acting the part of a stranger toward them. You like money, not for what it is, but that it represents to you help for the needy and spreading the light as you understand it, always ready to change on sufficient evidence, but pardon me, I hav no right to steal your life from your letters, but something impelled me to write as I hav, write soon again as ever.

Your Loving Friend, —— ——.

Truly, ELMINA.

Refinements in Clerical Education.

Circular of a convent-school in Algeria:

Madam: Allow me to remind you, as in years past, of the approaching fete day of our Immaculate Mother, the superior of our boarding school.

It is a very sweet duty for our hearts to contribute to this fete, by the subscription of five francs. I hope, madam, that you will join us on this occasion, for our mother is the devoted mamma of all the pupils, and all of them on this day are happy to show her their grateful love.

Please to accept, madam, the assurance of my respectful devotion. PHILOMENA DE LA F., Assistant Teacher.

Touching appeal. Truly a dollar's worth of sentiment. In the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, not forgetting the Virgin Mother nor the "Immaculate Mother Superior." What mother can resist the image of her child, made happy in presenting the five-franc symbol of her "grateful love?" How considerate in the Mother Superior to hav a birthday, and to make that a holiday! For an hundred pupils—as in previous years—nothing like establishing a precedent! And the assistant teachers . . . hav they birthdays? Perhaps it would not answer to hav them too often. EDGEWORTH.

Proposed Abolition of English Grammar.

Grammar is the bane of language. No wonder the Greek, Latin, and other ancient scholastic tongues are dead. They died of too much grammar. Nor are the living languages free from the hereditary leprosy. But happily the English is far less tainted with it than the rest, and I now move to abolish what little grammar it has.

The phonetic reform, embracing that part of grammar called orthography, has been agitated for more than thirty-eight years past. Its progress is slow but hopeful; and while its champions seek to make reading so easy that it will hardly be necessary to teach it at school, I propose, by a few changes in the use of English words, to render ungrammatical speech impossible—to make the lisping child and the unlettered European speak our language as correctly as the college tutor.

This may be substantially done by the adoption of a single rule, to wit: Do away with all irregularities of declension and conjugation. But to be more explicit it is necessary to lay down eight rules, which will be understood at once and need not be committed to memory.

1. Let the objectiv case of all pronouns, like that of all nouns, be the same as the nominativ.

Example: I love she; he talked to we.

2. Let the possessiv case of pronouns be formed by adding 's.

Example: I's hat; he's cane; it's name; who's house.

3. Let the plural of all nouns be formed by adding s or es.

Example: Ox, oxes; sheep, sheeps; man, mans; phenomenon, phenomenons.

4. Let verbs take the same form for both singular and plural.

Example: I love, thou love, he love, etc.; I hav loved, thou hav loved, he hav loved, etc.

5. Let the present tense of the verb to be be be.

Example: I be, thou be, he, she, or it be, etc.

6. Form the past tense and participle always by adding d or ed.

Example: Be, beed; do, doed; eat, eated.

7. Make no difference between an adjectiv and adverb.

Example: He acted right; you speaked it good (or well); she singed beautiful.

8. Let the comparativ and superlativ adjectivs always end with er and est, except when more and most, less and least, are used to qualify.

Example: Good, gooder, goodest; bad, badder, baddest; much, mucher (ormore), muchest (or most); little, littler (or less), littlest (or least).

RESULTS, REASONS, AND EXCEPTIONS.

Rules 1 and 2 will change the following possessiv and objectiv pronouns, and a few of their compounds:

My and mine,	to	I's.	Him,	to	he.
He,	"	I.	Her and hers,	"	she's.
Our and ours,	"	we's.	Her (obj),	"	she.
Us,	"	we.	Their and theirs,	"	they's.
Thy and thine,	"	thou's.	Them,	"	they.
Thee,	"	thou.	Its,	"	it's.
Your and yours,	"	you's.	Whose,	"	who's.
His,	"	he's.	Whom,	"	who.

Why should not I, thou, he, she, we, they, and who be the same in the objectiv case, like it and you?

Why should we not say I's, thou's, he's, she's, we's, you's, and they's as well as it's and who's? And why should the apostrophe, if used at all to indicate the possessiv case, be omitted in pronouns any more than in nouns? Indeed, why may it not be omitted altogether?

Rule 3 will make regular the plural termination of a few nouns adopted from the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, as cherub, cherubs (not cherubim); criterion, criterions (not criteria); phenomenon, phenomenons (not phenomena); datum, datums (not data); genus, genuses (not genera); lamina, laminas (not laminæ); vortex, vortexes (not vortices). Even now some of the words of the above class take the regular plural ad libitum; as cherub, cherubs; encomium, encomiums; index, indexes; memorandum, memorandums.

In regard to other common nouns, why should we not say oxes, sheeps, mouses, mans, as well as boxes, heaps, houses, fans?

A few Greek nouns ending in is will, for euphony's sake, form their plural by changing is to es; as basis, bases; crisis, crises. And foreign nouns which hav no singular will remain as they are, as literati, minutiæ, also a few, ending in es, that are both singular and plural, as series, species.

Rule 4 drops the terminal s in the third person singular of the present tense, and the st in the second person singular of the present and past tenses.

Why should we add an s to the third person singular of the present tense and not of the past tense? Why should we say, he makes, she sees, and not also he mades, she saws?

The use of the pronoun thou is obsolete, except in stilted poetry and prayers to the deity. Even the Quakers, in their laudable efforts to retain it, hav substituted the objectiv for the nominativ, and always couple it with the verb in the third person—as, thee is, thee does. It may be well to revive the use of thou instead of you, but let us dispense with hast, hadst, shalt, wilt, mayst, canst, mightst, couldst, wouldst, and shouldst.

Rule 5 is a return to the old style in the use of the verb to be. It abolishes am, art, is, and are, which be anomalous.

Rule 6 makes all past tenses regular in form. Our irregular verbs are a vexation, though not half so much so as those of the German language.

The subjoined list is taken from Murray's Grammar, ninth edition, omitting eighteen verbs whose irregularity is in the perfect participle only; as clothe, clothed, clad. This distinction is useless, and in fact it exists only in 71 out of the 169 irregular verbs, or practically only in 48, because 23 of the 71 irregular perfect participles are allowably regular.

IRREGULAR VERBS WITH PARALLEL ABSURDITIES.

Abide, abode (glide, glode), be or am, was (see, soz or slam, sloz), arise, arose (prize, proze), awake, awoke (make, moke). bear, bare (wear, ware), bear, bore (dare, dore), beat, beat (pleat, pleat), begin, began (grin, gran), bend, bent (mend, ment), bereave, bereft (weave, weft), beseech, besought (screech, scrought), bid, bid or bade (skid, skid or skade), bind, bound (blind, blound), bite, bit (spite, spit), bleed, bled (heed, hed), blow, blew (flow, flew), break, broke (take, toke), breed, bred (need, ned), bring, brought (sling, slought), build, built (gild, gilt), burst, burst (thirst, thirst),

Of the above 151 irregular verbs 16 are allowably regular according to Murray, to wit: awake-d, bereave-d, catch-ed, crow-ed, deal-ed, dig-ged, dwell-ed, gild-ed, gird-ed, hang-ed, knit-ted, shine-d, slit-ted, spill-ed, sweat-ed, and thrive-d. And Webster adds 9 more, to wit: bend-ed, dare-d, rid-ded, speed-ed, split-ted, weave-d, wind-ed, work-ed, and wring-ed; thus increasing the number of allowably regular verbs to 25, and leaving only 126 positivly irregular. And four of these—heard, laid, paid, and said—might as well be made regular by spelling them heared, layed, payed, and sayed.

The constant tendency is to the reduction of irregularities. Even Murray omits such obsolete forms as crope (crept), drunk (drank), slank (slunk), strang (strung), and swot (swet); while Webster makes obsolete or rare, clove, spat, shrank, swet, swum, throve, and prefers stank to stunk, and worked to wrought. And would not many of us hav to consult a dictionary to know whether to write burst or bursted, chid or chided, rent or rended? Nor would it be safe to prophesy that fifty years hence it will be vulgar to say blowed, growed, and knowed.

For euphony's sake the auxiliary verb hav may drop the v in the past tense, and remain had instead of haved. It would be very awkward to say I haved haved for I had had.

So also the auxiliary defectiv verbs, can, may, shall, will, must, ought, being used to express moods and tenses, would better retain their irregular past forms, could, might, should, would, must, and ought, instead of canned, mayed, shalled, willed, musted, oughted. Quoth, used only in the past tense, need not be disturbed in its obsolescence.

Rule 7 drops the terminal ly when used to distinguish adverbs from adjectivs. The distinction is unnecessary, and scholars are sometimes in doubt whether the adjectiv or adverb should be used, while such adverbs as lovelily, holily, uglily, are almost intolerable, and goodlily, manlily, funnily, are not allowable.

Rule 8 makes regular two or three comparativs and superlativs. Good, gooder, goodest, and bad, badder, baddest, ought to be as proper as rude, ruder, rudest, and sad, sadder, saddest. And why should not farrer, farrest, be as proper as nearer, nearest? Further and furthest are superfluous, and so are elder, eldest.

ILLUSTRATIV EXAMPLE.

And old man finded a rude boy in one of he's apple-trees stealing apples, and he desired he to come down; but the young saucebox telled he plain he would not. "Willn't you?" sayed the old man; "then I will fetch you down." So he pulled up some tufts of grass and throwed at he. This only maked the boy laugh. "Well," sayed the old man, "if tufts of grass will not do, I will try what virtue there be in stones." So he pelted the boy hearty with stones, which soon maked the boy come down and beg the old man's pardon.

The above example afford perhaps mucher (or more) than the average number of changes. Out of 105 words only 15 be changed.

It may be objected that there be less euphony in some of these changes. I think, however, that there will be as much euphony gained as losed, if not mucher (or more).

The only obstacle I apprehend to the adoption of this radical reform will be prejudice, or aversion to change. But consider the vast advantage of having to learn no grammar, whereby the most illiterate person will speak good English. See what prejudice the phonetic reform hav had to encounter. And as it be now working slow by a compromise, so the reform which we propose may be only in part adopted at first. Say, then, that we waive the first two rules, which apply only to the pronouns. The pronouns be few and familiar, so let their present objectiv and possessiv cases be retained ad libitum. The rest of the changes be less objectionable and more important. Why not begin to adopt them? The English language be now ahead in the struggle for existence. Make it phonetic, and abolish what little of grammar it hav, and what can hinder its covering the earth as the waters cover the sea? BURR.

Annual and Life Memberships.

Every Freethinker should become an Annual or Life Member of the National Liberal League. Life-membership certificates are issued at $25 each; annual membership, $1. These certificates are adapted to framing, and bear the signatures of the president of the League, Robert G. Ingersoll, and of its secretary, Samuel P. Putnam; they are therefore an ornament to any place and a memorial of great value. They should adorn the walls of ten thousand homes before the close of the year. The support thus given to the League would make its success certain. A. C. MACDONALD,

Call for the Ninth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League.

To the Auxiliary Liberal Leagues and All Citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Ninth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, to be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 9, 10, and 11, 1885.

According to a vote at the last Congress of the League notice is hereby given that an Amendment to the Constitution will be submitted, as follows: Article I. of the Constitution of the National Liberal League shall be amended to read: "The name of the association shall be The American Secular Union."

Measures for the affiliation of the Freethought Societies of Canada with the National Liberal League will also come up to be acted upon.

Also measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various State Governments and by the National Government as shall make the United States thoroughly Secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local Auxiliary Leagues are entitled by the League Constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the President and Secretary and three Delegates. All Charter Members and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual Members are entitled to seats but not to votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every Auxiliary League will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present. Having adopted a common basis of work upon which all Liberals can combine, it is now desirable to discover the best means by which this work can be carried forward, and to this end large attendance and free expression of opinion will contribute. It is hoped that all will come to the Congress to emphasize the unity of Liberalism and to create an interest for harmonious action which shall result in the abolition of all laws that are contrary to secular government.

Per order of Board of Directors:

Albany Convention—Place of Meeting.

It seems there are two parties who hav the letting of Leland's Opera House in Albany, and while Mrs. Leland let it to Mr. McCabe for Sept. 11th, 12th, and 13th, the other agent also let it to a theatrical troupe for two of those dates—the 11th and 12th. As Mr. McCabe is a friend of Mrs. Leland's, he disliked to force her to pay damages to the troupe—as he could hav done by insisting on his right to the house—and a compromise has been effected by which all are to be accommodated. The New York State Freethinkers' Association waives its right to the house on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon and evening, in consideration of which no charge is made for Friday morning and afternoon, Saturday morning, and Sunday morning, afternoon, and evening.

The Convention will meet Friday morning and afternoon at Leland's Opera House, 45 and 47 Pearl street; Friday evening at Bleecker Hall, No. 529 Broadway; Saturday morning at the Opera House; Saturday, afternoon and evening, at Bleecker Hall. Sunday, all three sessions—morning, afternoon, and evening—will be held at the Opera House.

This necessitates a slight change of speakers from the program as printed on the tickets, but the following order will be observed if the orators are present:

FRIDAY MORNING AT LELAND'S OPERA HOUSE, 45 PEARL ST.

Business Meeting. Opening address by J. J. McCabe. Music. Address by C. B. Reynolds. Music.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON AT LELAND'S OPERA HOUSE.

Music. Address by Joseph McDonough. Music. Lecture by Elizur Wright, "The New Version." Music.

FRIDAY EVENING AT BLEECKER HALL, 529 BROADWAY.

Music. Address by Miss Susan H. Wixon. Music. Lecture by T. B. Wakeman, "The Outlook of Liberalism." Music.

W. F. JAMIESON debated with Elder I B. Grubbs, of Lexington, Ky., at Burlington Junction, Mo., September 1st. Mr. Jamieson affirmed that "Infidelity is conduciv to the welfare and happiness of the human race"—which of course was denied by Elder Grubbs—and Mr. Grubbs affirmed that "Christianity and the Bible are supernatural and divine." We fancy Mr. Jamieson had no trouble in showing Elder Grubbs his mistake, though we doubt if the elder would admit it.

The Tent.

LOGANSPORT, IND., Sep. 6, 1885.—We arrived at Logansport on the evening of Wednesday, Aug. 26th, having stayed over night at Terra Haute to insure prompt transfer of our Tent, thus precluding the possibility of disappointment by delay, as at Carbon.

We were met by quite a delegation of Liberals at the depot, and escorted to the hospitable mansion of Capt. John G. Kesler, who did most valiant and arduous service in the war for the freedom of the colored race, and, with equal zeal and self-sacrifice, devotes himself to the heroic task of rescuing the honest-hearted of his own race from servil submission to the arbitrary dictations of the priesthood, breaking the cruel fetters of tradition that bind them in the dismal dungeons of bigotry and superstition.

We were royally entertained at his most cosy and happy home on Bittle's Island, receiving every care and kind attention from his estimable family.

We commenced our lectures on Thursday evening, and had excellent success. We had much to contend with from counter attractions, a free Indian show and a free concert, besides the more legitimate attractions at the Opera House, etc. Yet our attendance was good, and of a most intelligent class, who evinced continued, earnest interest, listening with attention despite the nipping frost, and eagerly availing themselvs of our gratuitous distribution of Liberal publications.

At every lecture, in the most kind and courteous terms, we gave our usual invitation for any minister in good standing in his own denomination to occupy our Tent on any afternoon, or the first hours of any evening, to attempt to refute any argument we offered, or to defend his faith and giv reason for his hope, in compliance with 1 Peter iii, 15, announcing we would remove our pictures, mottoes, books, or anything that was objectionable. If our presence was embarrassing we would stay outside the Tent; and if they could not afford to do this for love of Jesus, we would—although we would not do it or permit it to be done for ourselvs—pass the hat and take up a collection, and giv such minister the entire collection, and if such minister had made a really creditable effort, and the collection amounted to but little, we would giv five dollars additional.

It is strange that they insist we cannot be Christians, or even be saved, if we do not obey the plain teachings of the New Testament, and yet thus regard its plainest teaching.

The excitement ran high. The Tent was pitched in the court house yard—a privilege secured by vote of the town council, who were bitterly denounced and besieged and entreated to order the removal of the Tent. In the language of the ex-mayor, "You hav stirred up a hornets' nest."

Never was the whole Christian community so wild; but if the people were not blind, they could not fail of being convinced of the worse than nothingness of the Christian profession. Church folks declared we were their enemies, and while they boast that the church alone teaches the sublime faith of "Love your enemies, do good to them that hate and despitefully use you," they are advertising their fierce hate, and publicly clamored for evil to be done to you.

We are under special obligations to Louis York, John Stoll, and friend Dolemiski, who rendered constant practical service and stood by us from first to last.

Wednesday was our last lecture. Thursday morning, under direction of our faithful Tent-master, Tilney, and the help of the above-named friends, the Tent was struck and packed, and we saved labor—a kindness which in our exhausted condition we appreciated keenly.

We left the Tent to be forwarded to Alliance, Ohio; and friend Tilney will hav all in readiness for us by the 19th inst., on our return from the great Albany Convention.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

From the Logansport Pharos of September 1st.

"The church people are inclined to wage war against the ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds, who holds out in the court house yard. They strongly denounce him as a blasphemer, and hav made many complaints to the county commissioners for allowing the Liberalist to hold forth in the shadow of the temple of justice. One of them was so wrought up to-day that he thought that Reynolds ought to be mobbed and hustled out of town. The county commissioners who granted Reynolds the privilege of locating in the yard at their last meeting were put under a false impression of the kind of lectures to be delivered by those who petitioned for the permission. Had they been fully aware of the nature of Reynolds's doctrin, they would not hav given him such public quarters. While the church people think that Reynolds ought to be arrested for blasphemy, the Liberalists and Infidels think that he ought to be allowed full freedom of speech, and they crowd his Tent every night. As Reynolds will go away in a day or so, it is not probable that he will be ousted."

PORTRAITS IN THE TENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of August 25th, I notice a letter from Elmina, as regards the pictures in our Tent. In my letter describing Tent, I said we had our trinity—Paine, Bennett, and Ingersoll. Elmina asks, are there no noble women worthy to hang by the side of these men? Certainly there are, and, as Tent-master, if I had life-size lithographs, nicely framed, of the ladies mentioned by Elmina, and if it were possible to put more than three people in a "trinity," I would gladly adorn our Tent with them. As it is, we hav twenty-one vacant panels, and if some kind friend would supply us with portraits or lithographs of any or all the ladies named, we will gladly hang them in most conspicuous positions, and the donors will receive the thanks of yours, for justice, right, and truth, ARTHUR TILNEY.

Dr. Monroe Dislikes the English.

THE following is from the Ironclad Age of August 29th:

"The National Liberal League Congress is to convene in Cleveland, O., Oct. 9th, 10th, and 11th. It is then proposed to change the name to the 'American Secular Union.' This is a softer name than Liberal League. It will bring in the Universalists, who hav a Jesus and a heaven, but no hell; and the Unitarians, who hav no God but still worship. Also the Free Religionists, who are just too sweet for anything, but are never known to smile, believing that life is so solemn a matter that tears should constantly flow. This latter class of religionists are indigenous to Boston. They are good Infidels, but their tribe is decreasing. And some unruly ministers will herd with Liberals if they will call themselvs 'Secularists.'

"This word which we borrow, as we do our morals, from London, doesn't reflect on the God family. It doesn't reflect on anything; it doesn't mean much of anything. There is neither religion nor politics nor Infidelity in it. It is the clumsiest and meanest word in the language. No man ever writes or speaks it if he can help himself. It is altogether too British for a land of liberty. In England they are up to all the tricks and crimes, but they giv them soft names. The Christian men and women who stand high in the church practice and connive at those crimes that in this country we lynch people for, and if they escape that they land in penitentiaries. And we don't call these crimes by the names they go by in Christian London. And the law fixes no punishment for these crimes in England. But New York and Boston must ape London. Hence we must change the name of Liberal League to Secular Union.

"By this change of name we can smooth over all disputes in the past, and become Londonized, or foreignized, at the same time. The old troubles about repeal or modification will be forgotten when the League changes its name to Secular Union. How could a man hold a grudge against John Smith for knocking him down after John had changed his name to John Bull? What's in a name? Shakspere thought a rose by any other name would smell as sweet.

"We hav a heart big enough to embrace Great Britain and Ireland in any good work, and the wide world, too. But this is the only free country upon the earth. It is the only country where reform has any chance for success. And we don't want to introduce any of the notions, or names, or crimes that flourish in the lands of tyranny and oppression. And especially do we abhor British methods.

"Infidels who are afraid to go by their right names are of no use to any cause. An Infidel who is afraid to take an Infidel paper and read it publicly is out of place outside of the church.

"The meeting at Cleveland will be a meeting of Infidels. The word 'Liberal' is weak enough. If we want anything weaker and softer, let us call ourselvs Free Religionists. By becoming 'Secularists' we renounce Infidelity. Any fool can be a Secularist, but it takes a man to be an Infidel."

The foregoing was evidently written when the genial doctor of the impervious Age was "laboring under a misapprehension," or an attack of dyspepsia. He seems to think that England is responsible for the proposed change. This is not so. The name "American Secular Union" was first proposed by Hon. A. B. Bradford, of Enon Valley, Pa., ex-consul to Japan. The idea was that it would broaden the field of work, and particularly to allow the affiliation with the League of the Canadian Freethought societies. As the correct information knocks the underpinning from under Mr. Monroe's subsequent remarks (except his criticism of the name), comment upon them would be superfluous. To his strictures upon the name people can pay as much or little attention as they consider them worth. We hope the efforts of the Ironclad Age to aid the organization during the past year hav not seriously interfered with the editor's capacity to see straight.

Will They Revise their Catechism?

"Brown's Catechism," for sale by the Sunday-School Union, asks:

Q. What kind of a heart hav you by nature? A. A heart full of all unrighteousness.

Q. What will become of you if you die in your sins? A. I must go to hell.

Q What kind of a place is hell? A. A place of endless torment.

Q. How long will the wicked continue in hell? A. Forever and ever.

Q. What will they do in hell? A. They will roar, curse, and blaspheme.

Q. What are you by nature? A. An enemy of God, a child of Satan, and an heir of hell.

The revised edition, to correspond with the revised Old and New Testaments, would hav to read:

Q. What will become of you when you die? A. I must go to sheol.

Q. What kind of a place is sheol? A. A good, cool grave.

All the other questions must necessarily be left out.

Governor Hoadley and a Temperance Calendar.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Governor Hoadley's Liberal relations having become subject of inquiry in your columns, I wish to say that he became, in company with R. W. Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Gerrit Smith, Robert Dale Owen, Fred. Schünemann-Pott, and E. L. Youmans, a vice-president of the Free Religious Association, May 30, 1872, and that he has held that position ever since, although it was much complained of by the Republicans during the campaign of 1883.

Permit me to take this opportunity to call the attention of your readers to a series of arguments for the temperance cause which Mrs. Helen R. Olin, of Madison, Wisconsin, has arranged in the form of a calendar for 1886. Her selections are just what our young men ought to see presented, fresh every day, in our homes and schools. Her zeal against the sale of liquor on Sunday has made her let in a few quotations of too Sabbatarian a tone, but the general spirit of her work is bold, free, and friendly to progress. The publisher is Chas. E. S. Fielden, 161 La Salle street, Chicago. Yours cordially,

FRED. MAY HOLLAND.

Industrial Co-operation in Minnesota.

From the Christian Union.

The first Co-operativ Barrel Association of Minneapolis was organized in the fall of 1874 with a capital stock of $15,000, each member paying in $15, and a weekly assessment of $5. The success of this organization was such that it was followed in 1877 by a second, in 1880 by a third, and in 1881 by a fourth and fifth, and subsequently by two more—all doing well. Each stockholder has but one vote, however many shares of stock he may possess, a condition which tends to prevent consolidation of the stock in a few hands. These co-operativ organizations possess a good property, are very thrifty and successful, with a capital stock ranging in each case from $15,000 to $70,000, paid up. They are all doing a good business. What is more important, the coopers, who before this co-operativ movement had a poor reputation for sobriety and law and order, now stand high in the estimation of the community as good citizens. The first association, the old "co-operativ," has its own manufactory of stock in Chippewa county, Wisconsin, employing there a capital of $30,000, with prudence and success. The seven co-operativ companies are doing business to the amount of $1,000,000 yearly. For these facts we are indebted to Mr. T. G. Rankin, of Minneapolis, whose letter appended furnishes additional and interesting information.

"The co-operativ shops hav been making rapid as well as continuous progress since 1881. Three more hav been started, of which, however, one joined itself to the old 'co-operativ,' the mother organization. There are now seven, all doing well, and working in perfect harmony. They supply all our mills except three, and are doing fully four fifths of all the coopering work of this flour city. They claim six-sevenths of all the work done. The boss shops hav disappeared, one by one, until there is but one left, and its owner has tried several times to sell out to his workmen.

"The great mills favor the co-operativ shops, because (1) they are sure of the best work, and (2) they are never disappointed by them. The shops help each other in a pinch, will divide orders, and otherwise equalize matters. They are filled with a mixed multitude of Swedes, Norwegians, Irish, Germans, Italians, and Americans, yet (1) they consult dispassionately, (2) vote fairly, (3) submit without hesitation, (4) work faithfully, (5) choose their best men always, (6) obey implicitly, and (7) hav unlimited faith in co-operativ effort. During their existence the eight shops hav had not less than a score of officers entitled to handle their money. Out of this number not one has given any security, not one has proved careless or dishonest, and not one dollar of deficit or defalcation has been charged against them. After their eight years' experience, it is now admitted they are unassailable and unconquerable while united. They hav now taken steps to establish a co-operativ store on the pure Rochdale system—cash sales at current rates.

"We are now taking stock to buy a township of land in this state. I hope to be one of a company that will form a co-operativ village on it this fall. This, in my opinion, will be the very table-land of co-operativ effort and of society. I hope to be able hereafter to send you items for publication in regard to it. We can get land for less than $2 per acre, in a region of good soil; good, soft, pure water, fine timber, close to this and other good markets. I am nearly sixty-six, hav been a co-operator ever since I began to hear of Rochdale work, hav preached it for thirty-five years at least, and now hav more faith than ever. The stock is held by practical workingmen. They prefer to hav each man interested in that way. Stock receives interest only—profits are divided according to wages."

There are twenty-two co-operativ productiv societies in Great Britain, most of them from ten to twenty-five years of age, and nearly all of them declaring a moderate profit.

Selections and Communications.

A Scared Doctor of Divinity.

From the Independent.

In John Swinton's Paper for April 5, 1885, is an editorial with the euphonious and classical title, "Fiddle-de-Dee." In it occur these words:

The preachers all over the country are now pounding away at the labor question in their pulpits. We hav been picking up their sermons for the past three months, but now the pile has grown so high that we are unable to handle them. These preachers hav somehow heard that this labor question is up; but, we regret to say, few of them appear to know anything about it.

There is ground for this taunt. There has been too much outside study of the labor question. The Socialists hav supreme contempt for all doctrinaire students. Those who study pages written in blood, and listen to voices which are a confusion of sighs and wails, not unnaturally feel that they know some elements in the problem that never reach pulpits and professors' chairs. They are right. Facts look different in the miner's hut from what they do in the monopolist's palace. My right to speak on this subject is that I hav studied Socialism somewhat from the Socialist's standpoint. These men are not all dreamers or impostors. They hav a cause. Many hav died for it. Others are ready to be offered. Such men are entitled to a hearing. If it is not granted freely it will be taken by compulsion. All lovers of liberty should stand with uncovered heads when the names of many of these heroes and heroins are mentioned. They are denounced to-day. They will be crowned to-morrow.

I. What is Socialism? It is both a sentiment and an organization, or a congeries of organizations. As an organization it is the enemy of existing institutions. It seeks the revolution of society, the destruction of the state, the abolition of marriage, the negation of religion, and the reconstruction of all things on the three corner-stones, Liberty, Equality, Fraternity. As a sentiment, it is an attempt on the part of the poor of all classes to better their condition. The sentiment and the organization are confounded. The danger is in the fact that this special organization will manipulate and mold this commendable sentiment. The sentiment is laudable; the organization is execrable. Socialism has many forms. In Russia it is Nihilism, in Spain the Black-hand, in France the Commune, in England the trades union, in Germany Socialism, and in America a combination of all. But the fact to be kept in mind is this. All these forms of agitation are only different symptoms of one and the same disease. Its distinguishing characteristics are not Atheism, nor a denial of the state, nor a negation of marriage, but simply oppression and poverty. No oppression and no poverty, no Socialism; Communism and the Commune are not identical. There is nothing wrong in Communism. The Commune is Paris, as in 1871. Communism is simply "economic equality." It aims to destroy all ranks and conditions in society, to make one man as good as another. Socialism goes back of the processes of modern life to the fact that he who does not work livs on the labor of others. It aims to distribute economic good according to the services rendered by the recipients (Ely's Socialism, p. 30). It may be Communistic, and it may be that of the Commune, and it may differ from both. Annihilate Socialism as an organization, and its power as a sentiment will not be destroyed but increased. By suppression force is intensified. We get no conception of the power and prevalence of Socialism by counting heads in processions, and organizations. It eludes statistics. It is the natural and inevitable resistance of the spirit of man to oppression and poverty. Increased enlightenment means increase of Socialism. The form of its manifestation may be wild, like that revolution which Carlyle calls the "threnody of the Furies;" but the fact has come, and it is absolutely sure to triumph. Whether it be peaceably, or by forcible revolution, depends on the wisdom of the American people.

II. Some facts which make Socialism possible. Bakers in Brooklyn, John Swinton says, are worked, many of them, eighteen hours a day. Their average length of life is twenty-seven years. They are not slaves, for they can cease to be bakers. They can go West or South—if they can get money enough. That "if" stands in the way of a multitude. Horse-car drivers on some lines in New York work eighteen hours a day, and are compelled to take their sleep in two sections. All of them work at least thirteen or fourteen hours a day. Their meals are often eaten on the cars. No force is used. Those men must do something. They may be bad, and reduced to their present condition by their own vices. That does not alter the fact that a human being is compelled to work from thirteen to eighteen hours out of twenty-four, for a bare subsistence, while the company for which some of them work has dividends so large that its stock is seldom on the market.

The condition of things in this country among the laborers is largely determined by the condition in the Old World. "Taking Europe as a whole, and comparing the prices of labor with the cost of living—food, clothing, and shelter—it can be proved that the average European peasant of the fourteenth century, as also of the fifteenth, was better off relativly than the average European peasant of the nineteenth century. In England, for example, when the wages of a common farm-hand were fourpence a day, a penny went as far as a shilling goes now. At this rate the common laborer should now be getting four shillings a day, whereas, in fact, he is getting only about two. Mechanics' wages, owing to the trade unions, are a trifle higher relativly than they were then. In Germany, the highest price paid farm-hands anywhere is fifty-six cents a day; on the lower Rhine the price paid is thirty-one cents; in Silesia, only eighteen cents. As Froude has said, the upper classes hav more luxuries, and the lower classes more liberties; while in regard to the substantial comforts of life, they are farther apart now than they were then. And the greater the wealth of the nation as a whole, the greater the inequality between its upper and its lower classes" (Hitchcock's Socialism, p. 15). Those who hav been oppressed in Europe come here with hatred against government and capital. They are not to be blamed. One noble-looking English laborer, near Oxford, who asked no favors at my hand, told me he was thankful when he could get twelve shillings a week, and much of the time he could not get half of that, and he had his rent to pay and his wife and three children to clothe and feed. He uttered no tirades. He asked nothing but the privilege of work. He was surrounded by the splendor of the rich. Right or wrong, it is not to be wondered at if sometimes he asks if the social order is not askew. The Rev. G. S. Reany, one of the noblest of the workers in East London, says in the English Congregationalist for December, 1884: "The fact, and no one denies it, is this, there are men engaged in large commercial enterprises, and some of them are professed Christian men, who hav made, and are still making, large profits, and who pay workers in the East End and elsewhere the miserable pittance of one shilling for a day's work of twelve, fourteen, and sixteen hours." I am not now asking whether such things are fair, but simply declaring that when men in such circumstances see their employers' families rolling in wealth, and their own on the brink of starvation, they quickly become anarchic Socialists.

The sight of the unemployed rich, who hav more than they can use, who were likened by an English professor to the lilies, because "they toil not, neither do they spin," is a constant cause of discontentment to those who are willing both to toil and spin for a bare existence. Manual laborers are not fairly paid as a rule. Why should the manufacturer realize ten times as much as his employee for his time, and then an interest of twenty per cent on the money invested? The oppressed classes do not think it is fair, and an imaginary grievance is as potent as a real grievance.

III. What Socialists say about themselvs.

To get a fair answer to this question I went to headquarters, to the lager beer saloon of Justus H. Schwab, to the shop of a certain German tailor, and to the office of John Swinton. Schwab's saloon is in a very decent quarter of the city, No. 50 First street, between First and Second avenues, and Swinton's office is on Park Row, facing the post-office. I was received with the greatest courtesy, and my questions answered without hesitation. I condense the answers. The Socialists in the United States may be divided into four classes: (1) The foreigners who are here temporarily, many of whom do not speak English, and whose thought is all of affairs in other lands. These exert no influence in this country. (2) The State Socialists. The number of these is not large. Nearly all are Germans. They work solely through the machinery of government, as it now exists. Many laws concerning the rights of the laborer, the employment of children in factories, prison labor, the management of railroads and telegraphs, hav been prepared by State Socialists. They hav no sympathy with revolutionary methods. (3) The Anarchists. These are divided into two classes. (1) Those who seek the overturning of all existing institutions by means of peaceable revolutions. (2) Those who seek the same end, but who hav discarded ballots, and are ready for bayonets and bullets. The latter class is led by such men as John Most and Justus H. Schwab in New York, and Benjamin R. Tucker in Boston. This class is by far the ablest, most numerous, most aggressiv, and most rapidly increasing. John Swinton said that "fifty thousand was the average attendance at the Socialist meetings in New York on Sundays, and that one hundred thousand men in that city are learning the principles of Socialism, and getting ready for the inevitable revolution." Justus Schwab said: "I am a revolutionary Socialist. . . I do not seek the protection of anyone. I do not want the protection of the police of New York, or the police of the United States, nor of any of the authorities. I don't believe in any government whatever."

"Is Socialism spreading?" "Yes," was the answer. "Will it be a peaceable or a forcible revolution?" "Forcible," was the reply. John Swinton said: "I hav labored for three years to prevent the shedding of blood, but it cannot be helped. It is sure to come." I asked, "Will the attack be on individuals or on institutions?" The instant answer was, "On individuals." This remark reminds me of what Professor Ely heard a man say on the street the night the Union League Club was opened: "A revolution will yet come and level that fine building to the ground;" and of what was said when some bronze work was being carried into Mr. Vanderbilt's house: "The time will come when that will be melted by fire." Most, on the 11th of February, 1883, lectured in Baltimore, and was cheered by a crowd as he advised his hearers to buy muskets. The presiding officer responded: "Lead and powder alone can make us free." The motto of the Freiheit is, "All measures are legal against tyrants." Swinton said that more than a score of battles had been fought between Socialism and capital in the last year, each time capital has been the aggressor, and each time labor has won substantial success. He predicted other battles soon to come, and especially mentioned one at Denver.

I asked Swinton what the churches could do to avert the impending revolution. The churches were then denounced in unmeasured terms. They hav always been the stronghold of capital; they are afraid to speak out; they toady to wealth. Schwab said he was a Materialist, and Swinton said he was the only genuin Calvinist alive, who actually believes in the damnation of infants. After the explosion against the churches had worn off, Swinton answered my questions in this way: "All we ask of the churches is that they should study the facts. They hav not done it." "Why, do you know," said he, "that the death-rate in London is from seventeen to nineteen in a thousand, and in New York forty-three per thousand? Do you know how the people are compelled to liv? Do you know that it is impossible to keep the children from the sight of crime, and the girls from a life of shame? And all because capital must hav its dividend, whether labor gets a fair day's pay for a fair day's work or not? Do you know that still there are thirteen thousand children under thirteen years of age in the factories of New York state who ought to be in school?" I knew that if what he said was somewhat exaggerated, it was substantially true, and I recognized then, as I do now, that what makes Socialism a power is the fact that there is terrible truth in what was asserted. But the question arises, are these men genuin, or are they taking advantage of the condition of the people for selfish purposes? I do not know. They received me like gentlemen. John Swinton is courteous and cultivated in manner, and a man who knows what he is about. Some say "he is a crank." That may be, but there is a marvelous method in his crankiness.

The little tailor said: "Oh, Schwab, he wants to sell his lager, that's all he wants;" but then, the tailor is a member of another society. Whether Schwab is genuin or not, he is a power. Just here observe, Socialism as organizations in the United States has evidently been captured by the International—the International that fires at emperors, and dynamites czars, and seeks, as Schwab distinctly says, the overthrow of all government. Henceforward the trades union will be exploited by the International. Let me giv you a few dates. The International, or society of combined Socialists, was started in London in 1839, and was started by Germans who had been expelled from Paris. In 1847 a private congress of Communists was held in London. Karl Marx was present. A public congress of the International was to hav been held in Brussels, in 1848; but the Revolution in France hindered it. Not much more is heard of it until the great builders' strike in London, in 1859. From this time the Trade Unionists and the International rapidly converge. In 1862 the International was formally organized. As the result, in 1863 and 1864 there was much excitement in Europe among artisans. The first International congress was held at Geneva, in 1867, and the same year two societies were established in the United States, and in 1872 the Internationalists' headquarters were transferred from London to New York. The United States at this time is not only the scene of its own natural and inevitable commotion, but it is the capital of the International; it is the asylum of the discontented and outcast of Europe.

On these shores, to-day, we are facing a vaster problem than that of slavery, and one more difficult of solution. —A. H. Bradford, D.D.

Montclair, N. J.

From the Independent of the following week.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEPENDENT: The Rev. Dr. Amory H. Bradford, of Montclair, N. J., may be a first-class interviewer, but he is a very poor reporter of his interviews, if I may judge by his article in the Independent of August 27th. He makes me say a number of queer things; but the queerest of them all is this: "That fifty thousand was the average attendance at the Socialist meetings in New York on Sundays." The good doctor must hav misunderstood me, or else your printer must hav put the definit number "fifty" instead of the indefinit article "a" before the word "thousand." Let it stand at a thousand, more or less.

But, on the other hand, as regards the number of young children in the factories of this state, the figures he attributes to me are far below the facts!

After all this, allow me to say that there is much truth and force in the article of my esteemed antagonist, Dr Bradford.

JOHN SWINTON.

Opinion of a Cassadaga Camper.

After a two weeks' sojourn at Cassadaga, I hav just returned to my home in the Mahoning valley. On the eastern border of Lake Cassadaga is situated the camping-grounds of the Spiritualists of western New York, western Pennsylvania, and northern Ohio. The grounds are dotted with handsome cottages, nice tents, and stumps, the stumps giving the place a primitiv appearance, as well as adding to the variety. Centrally located is a fine pavilion, in which meetings are held—daily lectures and daily conference meetings being the main features—and many of the speakers being angels, or spirits, who "spake as never man spake," and their utterances soul-inspiring and beautiful beyond description. The conference meetings were free to all. All were invited to take part, and giv their best thoughts in ten-minute speeches.

Another feature of the entertainment was music, interspersed with all the proceedings. A brass band, with piano, discoursed fine music. Mrs. Denslow and her children, and occasionally others, gave thrilling and inspiring songs, beautifully sung.

And then, during the last two or three days of my sojourn there, the Grattan-Smith family, and Mr. and Mrs. Lillie, added much to the entertainment by their soul-stirring music and songs. And any who desired it had an opportunity of attending seances, and hearing from their friends and loved ones who had gone before.

And the social feature, always coming in between the other acts, ought not to be overlooked. And taken altogether, the lectures, conference meetings, music, and the social feature made up an entertainment seldom equaled or enjoyed by mortals here below. But such assemblages are always made up of persons who entertain different views on almost all subjects. Spiritualism consists in the belief, from evidence obtained, that friends and loved ones still liv, and make themselvs known to their friends here, after the death of the body. And some are still coming into the Spiritual ranks who hav just learned that their loved ones still liv, and hav their views of heaven and hell somewhat disturbed or disarranged, but are still fairly burdened with old theology, superstition, and standards—standards or creeds always meaning no further progress. And this class of Spiritualists are generally trying to draw Spiritualists and Spiritualism down to their level. And then there are others who are farther advanced, who hav stuck their stakes and make an effort to stay all progress, until they may sometime in the course of a lifetime take another step forward.

There are also the more advanced thinkers, who hav abandoned all standards and creeds, and pay no heed to the stakes which hav been set long ages ago, nor yet to the new ones, which hav been stuck down or up by the partially enlightened. And the thinkers desire to know the truth—to obtain some knowledge of nature—of themselvs, their duties and responsibilities, and to do something for the world of mankind lying in wickedness; and some of these are Materialists, who hav just been waked up to renewed effort by the light of immortality.

And the management deserves great credit for establishing and maintaining a free platform in the midst of such a heterogeneous multitude of conservativs, Liberals, Christians, and advanced thinkers as assemble from day to day and from week to week at Cassadaga.

A free platform would hav saved Spiritualism from degeneracy, absorption, and extinction eighteen hundred years ago, and saved the world, too, from the ignorance, superstition, and barbarism of the Dark Ages. And a free platform may be necessary in the present age to save modern Spiritualism from degeneracy and absorption, and the world from such a state of sin, and misery, and barbarism as has prevailed during the last fifteen centuries, or ever since freedom of worship, learning, and civilization were extinguished in the Roman empire by the introduction of Christianity. But there seemed to be a considerable strain on the free platform, and freedom of speech, sometimes. When speakers of the more advanced type departed from the usual routine, and took occasion to speak of God, worship, prayer, trust in God, etc., as delusions which must be dispelled from the minds of men, or reform be forever hindered or held in abeyance, and when signs of degeneracy among Spiritualists were pointed out, and the danger of history repeating itself, and some remarks made about the church and its teachings perpetuating sin and misery in the world, it really was curious and amusing to see old Conservatism arouse itself and flutter, and, coming to the rescue, proclaim that wrong was just as necessary as right in the economy of God; that we ought not to find fault with or blame anyone, for we were all the creatures of circumstances. Others advocated fatality straight, reminding one of predestination and foreordination. Great sorrow, too, was said to be necessary, as an educator. The necessity of wrong in the economy of God seemed to be quite comforting to some, and everything passed off smoothly and pleasantly while the writer remained, with one single exception. A conservativ manager misrepresented and insulted a gentleman on account of some disparaging remarks made about the church. With this exception everything was in harmony with the proclamation of a free platform, and freedom of speech was maintained throughout. The doctrin that wrong is as necessary as right in the economy of God seems to me to be simply a relic of the old theology, with hell everywhere, now, henceforth, and forever.

Wrong seems incidental to ignorance, and will disappear as knowledge increases. And it does seem like a self-evident truth that much wrong might be dispensed with without interfering in any way with the equilibrium of the universe. And further, there would be no danger of wrong disappearing too rapidly, if the advocates of its necessity should be silent for all time to come. Drunkenness and debauchery, with all their kindred vices and crimes, might be dispensed with, without shock or harm to even this little world of ours. And the same might be said of other wrongs. And in conclusion, let me say that I know of no place where a few days or weeks can be spent more pleasantly and profitably than at Cassadaga. WILLIAM WATSON.

What the Liberals Should Say to the Christians.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is not necessary that I should occupy your space with quotations to prove the truth of what I am about to charge to the Christians, but for those who are desirous of my sustaining the charge, I will refer them to THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 8th, under the head of "Notes and Clippings," and all they will hav to do to obtain further proof is to keep a good look-out for articles in the papers, especially in the states where there is to be an election this fall.

Christians, you do yourselvs a very great injustice when you set up a howl like hyenas every time a Liberal receives a nomination for an office. Did you ever know the Liberals to do the like when one of your number had been nominated? We never inquire into a candidate's belief, though, all things being equal, we generally vote for our party's choice. But do not attempt to set up your peculiar creed as a test of office in a secular government like ours where none is required. We know full well that, where there is one that givs such bigoted thoughts publicity, there are thousands that keep them to themselvs, and they only find too ready an echo of approval when uttered by a representativ man.

Now, then, if you propose to proscribe a candidate because he is no hypocrit, and, therefore, may be relied on as being duly honest, why, we propose to work among those we may chance to hav an influence over, and vote for this class of men irrespectiv of party; and you know that a person has more influence in working against his party than in working for it. It becomes necessary that we do this in order that we may not commit suicide as a class; because what professional man, especially the lower, does not hope to aspire to office some day? And if we allow you to use us to help defeat everyone of our class that gets nominated, what may we expect? Why, the very men that would help our cause most would be compelled to keep silent, or to act the hypocrit, and hence we don't intend to help carry out your nefarious designs, either directly or indirectly.

The Bruno Statue.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed list speaks for itself—and very well. The committee here and at Rome can not help but love large subscriptions, but they know, too, how to appreciate the small ones. While the dollars of Mr. Fisk and Mr. Blodgett are gratefully counted, the $0.05, "a mite given out of my poverty," as Mrs. Elizabeth Peabody, "the mother of the kindergarten in America," said at the Concord meeting, may weigh as much or more. Then we may say, "Verily, she has given more than they all," by this token of her devotion. To do that we ask men who hav means to make the $0.05 of this noble woman at least $50 in her name! Let her contribution count that much!

In the same sense we hope for increased $1 contributions. This statue should be a popular affair. There should be as many names of Americans as possible on the roll of honor which will go into its corner-stone. It should appear that America is the popular home of liberty. Each of those who hav contributed must therefore act as a committee of one to obtain a list of contributions.

We hear nothing but praise of the proposed statue. But to the proposed inscription in the book to be held by the grand figure of Bruno, "The highest God has destined me an apostle, not last or least, of the better age to come," Mr. John Prescott Guild, a veteran soldier, takes exception. He also excepts to the use of the medallion of the Christian John Huss as an ornament in the frieze.

Well! The committee at Rome will consider all this. Bruno probably meant that Truth was the highest God, which rendered the God of his persecutors and their doings in his behalf contemptible.

As to Huss, he may stand very properly as the representativ of the dawn of the Reformation, and the name or figure of James Gruet, which Mr. Guild prefers, may be also included in the frieze.

Let the next announcement show that the second $200 is raised, since Mr. Fisk has so promptly and liberally completed the first instalment.

Planetary Motion.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Assuming that Mr. Edgeworth has sufficient intelligence to comprehend the logical import of the self-evident fact—it being within the domain of every man's personal observation—that, however spiritual the matter called ether is supposed to be, it is undeniably of sufficient density to sustain the weight of the planets that float upon it, whose weight is evidently sustained by the same law of comparativ density by which the weight of similarly constituted bodies is sustained by our atmosphere, I shall suspect him of an intent to whip professors of science to the contrary over my back. However well deserving they may be of the castigation he givs them, I shall protest against being made a whipping-post of for the purpose of administering it.

Nevertheless, I shall award him my grateful acknowledgment of his implied, though somewhat eccentric, indorsement of my theory of planetary motion. Though, having failed to find it stated in THE TRUTH SEEKER, except in his letter of August 1st, page 487, that a planet cannot recede beyond a given distance from the sun for the all-sufficient reason that matter in that direction is of greater density than it can penetrate and displace, I shall suppose that to be his view of the subject, and regret that I cannot indorse it. J. A. TUTTLE.

A Freethinker Founds a Hospital.

From the Staats Zeitung, Aug. 29th.

We read in the N. F. Presse, Vienna: "Mr. Oswald Ottendorfer, editor of the Staats Zeitung, in New York, and who was born in Zwittau, Austria, has presented 200,000 Austrian florins for the erection of a hospital, poorhouse, and orphans' home. His late wife endowed a similar foundation. The commonalty of Zwittau, in January, called a public meeting to consider the plans of the architects Claus and Moritz Hintrager. The plans were accepted." An Austrian florin is about fifty cents, and Mr. Ottendorfer's gift amounts to $100,000.

The Pious Mr. Stearns.

At a recent meeting of the Central Labor Union in this city, a delegation consisting of six ladies, representing the striking silkweavers of John N. Stearns, was introduced to the meeting. The spokeswoman said that an atrocious system of fining and other tyrannical rules had been introduced into that factory. Fines were imposed for the most insignificant disobedience of the rules. To sit down, or even to lean against the wall to get a little rest, speaking to one another, etc., was sufficient cause for being fined. The foreman of the factory, in addition to enforcing the most inhuman rules, had made use of some very insulting language in presence of the girls and women. Stearns, the proprietor, was a very pious man, and had made it understood that all the money which was collected for fines went to furthering benevolent ends. He had established a reading-room, a school for cooking and sewing, and various other branches for his employees. Those who attend the classes are called upon to pay twenty-five cents per month, and twenty-five cents for every attendance. All this money is again used for benevolent purposes—so Mr. Stearns says.

A committee was appointed to seek an interview with the clergy of the sect to which Mr. Stearns belongs, and to make known to them the true character of this "pious" member, so as to counteract the "benevolent" efforts of the hypocrit. To advertise himself as a benefactor he now and then makes a donation to this or that institution, and through this scheme he has eventually gathered quite a fortune.

When the Gospels Were Not Written.

We hav received the following with a request to answer. The query is prompted by a series of long articles in a Christian paper supporting the chronology of the gospels as taught in the churches:

"I would like to ask a question. Did Celsus speak of the ascension of Jesus Christ? If so, it establishes the fact that the first four gospels were known before 181, which Bennett denies."

It is not probable that the exact date of the gospels can ever be known. That they were not written when they purport to hav been is as certain as anything can be about those times. The best Christian authorities agree on this point. To print all the evidence upon which this conclusion is based would take THE TRUTH SEEKER several months. We may, however, briefly epitomize the conclusions.

There is reason to believe that Luke's gospel was the earliest. This is rendered probable partly by internal evidence and partly from what might be called political reasons—for church politics and wire-pulling are as old as Christianity. The date of Luke may be inferred from a statement made by Jerome, that Luke, in chapter i, v. 1, refers to the gospels of Basilides and Apelles. The gospel of Basilides dates from A.D. 125; that of Apelles, about 160. According to Jerome, then, Luke was after 160. In this Venerable Bede agrees with Jerome. Epiphanius says Luke meant Cerinthus, who wrote about 145. All authorities agree that he did not mean the other three evangelists. Wescott thinks that Luke's gospel circulated mostly about Alexandria and Antioch when first published. If so it would probably be addressed to Theophilus, who afterward, about 180, became bishop of Antioch. (See Waite's History of the Christian Religion, chapter xxviii.) Professor Davidson says Luke did not write the gospel at all. Bronson Keeler, obtaining his data principally from Davidson and Wescott, concludes that Luke was written or compiled (perhaps from Marcion's gospel) about 170.

Mark is probably the next gospel in point of time. Waite says it was "probably constructed from the gospel of Peter, as a basis, with many changes, and the incorporation of new material." All the best authorities agree that it is anonymous. Professor Davidson, especially, is emphatic on this point. Papias said that John the Presbyter said that Mark was the interpreter of Peter. But Papias's works are all lost and we hav to take the word of Eusebius. So it amounts to this: That Eusebius said that Papias said that John the Presbyter said that Mark said that Peter said that Jesus said thus and so. That, says Keeler, is the historical lineage of the authenticity of the gospel of Mark. Anyone acquainted with Eusebius's general character will hav very little respect for his evidence. Mark is supposed to hav been written or compiled about 175.

John is next. This gospel is also anonymous. Davidson says its Johannine authorship must be abandoned, and its existence prior to A.D. 140 cannot be maintained (Canon, p. 99; in his Introduction to the New Testament the limit is 150). Both Irenæus and Jerome assert that John wrote against Cerinthus (A.D. 145). There is evidence that in the construction of this gospel, as in that of Matthew, the author had in view the building up of the Roman hierarchy, the foundations of which were then (about A.D. 177–8) being laid (Waite's Hist. Chris. Rel., p. 357). Certain it is that no Christian writer makes mention of it previous to 180. In that year, Theophilus of Antioch speaks of John's gospel, but says nothing of the writer having been an apostle. Keeler concludes it may hav been written about 178.

It is written that the first shall be last. This may hav been said of Matthew, or it may not. But the gospel which unread Christians believe to hav been written first is really the last, according to the modern lights of the church. No one knows who wrote the book of Matthew, and their ignorance is acknowledged by all Christian scholars whose opinion is worth having. Professor Davidson, in his "Introduction to the New Testament," says that the gospel of Matthew, as we now hav it, could not hav been written by Matthew. Papias said that Matthew composed his history in Hebrew, but the present gospel is in Greek, and as there was, according to McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia, another gospel passing under the name of Matthew, which was used by Christians, there is no means of telling which gospel Papias meant. Scholars admit that our gospels of Matthew and Mark were not referred to. Tischendorf, in his "When Were Our Gospels Written?" published by the London Religious Tract Society, is forced to grant it. Professor Davidson fully concedes it. Papias spoke of a "gospel according to the Hebrews," and said it contained a history of a woman accused of many sins before the Lord. Eusebius said the Ebionites used a gospel according to the Hebrews; Irenæus said it was the gospel according to Matthew. Epiphanius (A.D. 403) and Jerome (A.D. 420) say these two books were the same. As the gospel according to the Hebrews was in existence and in use first, the deduction is quite plain that some one subsequently forged Matthew's name to it (Short Hist. Bible, p. 30). The theft was consummated, Keeler thinks, about 180.

Our correspondent will see that Mr. Bennett had ample authority for his denial of an early date to the gospels. The first "apostolic father" was Clement of Rome (A.D. 97). In his epistle to the Corinthians there is no mention of either Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John. In neither of Ignatius's four epistles (A.D. 115) is there the least mention of the four gospels. Polycarp (A.D. 116) is also silent. There is an epistle attributed to Barnabas, probably written about A.D. 130, but it makes no mention of the four gospels. Hermas of Rome wrote, it is believed, the "Shepherd of Hermas" about A.D. 150. He makes no reference to either of the four gospels. This comprises, says Keeler, the whole of the extant Christian literature from the death of Jesus to the middle of the second century, and not one writer mentions the four gospels, or makes the slightest reference to them. They make quotations from tradition, and from other gospels, but not from our four. As we hav seen, Theophilus of Antioch (A.D. 150) was the first to mention an evangelist by name. The first writer who mentioned all four of the present gospels by name was Irenæus, who flourished about A.D. 200. Dr. Westcott calls the first two centuries "the dark age of Christian literature." He says: "A few letters of consolation and warning, two or three apologies addressed to heathen, a controversy with a Jew, a vision, and a scanty gleaning of fragments of lost works, comprise all Christian literature up to the middle of the second century." This is a frank confession that the four gospels were not in existence prior to A.D. 150. The author of "Supernatural Religion" says: "We do not find any real trace even of the existence of our gospels for a century and a half after the events they record. They are anonymous narrativs, and there is no evidence of any value connecting these works with the writers to whom they are popularly attributed" (p. 700). This, supposing Christ to hav been thirty-three years of age at the time of the crucifixion, and his work to hav been performed during the three preceding years, would make the date of the gospels from 180 to 183. Allowing the usually accepted error of four years in our Christian chronology, it would date the gospels from 180 to 187. Counting from the alleged birth of Christ, the gospels date anywhere from 150 to 187. This is the earliest possible date, and the probabilities are that they were written or compiled from a miscellaneous lot of gospels and oral tradition somewhere between the years 170 and 180.

Celsus refers to the alleged resurrection of Christ, only to discredit it. But his mention of the resurrection counts for nothing. Though Lardner ascribes the date of Celsus (whom we know only by those scraps of his writing preserved in Origen's controversy with him) to A.D. 176, the ascription is arbitrary and without historical support. Celsus is generally credited with having written about A.D. 200. The author of "Supernatural Religion" assigns him to the reign of Septimus Severus, in the early part of the third century. Except the book of Enoch, Celsus nowhere mentions the name of any Christian book, and it is evident that his "Logos Alethes" ("True Doctrin," or "Word") was written to refute the traditions then current.

In conclusion we may say that the Christians hav not one scrap of certain historical evidence of the truth of the claims they put forth for the New Testament.

It is Dangerous to Be a Modern Christian.

Substantially, religion is a theory of the unknown.

Reverence is the upward-looking of ignorance. In worshiping "God" a man only yearns toward his utmost possible conception of an ideal. It is a rule that the most ignorant persons hav the most definit idea of God. A Catholic or a Calvinist can describe "him" accurately. So can a Fejee Islander. Those who hav progressed far enough to comprehend the most scholarly philosophies of the day either say, "I don't know," or call it the unknowable.

"Revelation" is the writing down of some ancient guesses. A guess once written down cannot be changed. It then to the guesser becomes a fact, which the firmer he believes the further will he try to propagate, and the more indignant will he become at the doubter. This was the attitude of the early Christians, and this attitude the church maintains to-day.

The earliest Christians were intolerant and ignorant to the last degree. Christianity first spread among the slaves of the pagans and among the poorer people. Their belief was that the world was soon to end, and their great source of content was that when their masters had been destroyed the few thousands who accepted Christ as a supernatural savior would be saved. They believed that the whole world was created only to be damned and as a foil to their own salvation.

"Zeal, then, not charity, became the guide,
And hell was built on spite, and heaven on pride."

But since the world did not bring itself to an untimely end, the Christians hav stretched their scheme to cover eternity. They put first one new blade, and then another, into their jackknife, then a mainspring, and then added a new handle. Yet, if we do not believe it to be the same old knife, we shall be damned.

We'll be damned if we do. Revelation xxii, 19, makes that plain.

Cremation.

A few years ago a person who favored incineration of the dead was looked upon as a heretic but little less depraved than "Tom" Paine. So strong, indeed, was the opposition of the church to this method of disposing of the dead, that it was left to the heretics—the Infidels—to advocate and defend the practice. But to-day cremation has gained strong headway not only in this country but in Europe. First to follow the lead of America was Germany. The Gotha Crematory was opened in 1878, and 200 bodies hav been burned there. In 1881 and 1882 the number was only 33, in 1883 it was 47, and in 1884 it was 54. In Italy half a dozen crematories hav been built, and the cremations now number 362. In Milan there are 6,000 members of a single society. In France the topic has been much discussed, but the practice is still illegal, although Gambetta favored a permissiv law. The committee of the Belgian Chamber has favorably reported upon a petition for a law making cremation optional. No action has been taken in Austria, it is believed, although opinion was officially gathered throughout the empire so early as 1878. In England Lady Hanham and the wife of Capt. Hanham were cremated in 1882, but they set no fashion, although they brought the subject prominently forward.

Dr. Le Moyne, who built the first furnace in the United States, was a Freethinker. In 1876 Baron De Palm's body was incinerated under theosophic auspices. Since then the managers of Le Moyne's Crematory at Washington, Pa., hav been obliged to refuse to receive bodies from outside the limits of the county, so numerous were the applications. In 1881 was organized the New York Cremation Society, of which J. B. Brown was the president, and D. W. Craig secretary. Both these gentlemen are activ Freethinkers. From this society was organized the United States Cremation Company, which has nearly completed a building on Mount Olivet, on Long Island. In 1884 a cremation company was organized in Buffalo, with a capital of ten thousand dollars.

During the same year the New England Cremation Society was organized at Boston; at Lancaster, Pa., was built the second crematory; and the University of Pennsylvania built the third. At Pittsburg a furnace using natural gas is expected to be completed soon. In New Orleans the grand jury has advised cremation in cases of public charity upon the ground that burial in the neighboring lowlands is at least a possible danger to the public health.

This progress in cremation the Times calls a victory of reason over sentiment and prejudice. It is also a victory of progress over the stupidity of the church. The impossible dogma of the resurrection has been a great obstacle in the way of the cremationists. Less and less do the people now believe in a literal resurrection; to meet this growth toward rationalism, the ministers say it will be as easy for God to gather up a person from ashes and gas as it is to collect the gases from the mold of the grave or which hav gone forth into grasses and flowers. A few clergymen are possessed of common sense enough to boldly advocate cremation as the most sensible, cleanly, and healthy way of disposing of bodies. These preachers, however, are those tinctured with radicalism, if not with absolute heresy. Catholicism, of course, will oppose the method, but the fact that in Italy cremation is numerically strongest shows that the pope cannot hav everything his own way.

As sanitary science long since established the fact that earth burial near towns and cities is an evil inflicted upon the living, it is not so much a matter for wonder that cremation has made such progress during the past nine years as it is that it made so little during the preceding years. It is probable that a quarter of a century from now cremation will be the prevailing custom, and burials near cities forbidden by law to protect the health of the living.

Capel on the Wrong Track.

In lecturing recently upon the claims of the papacy as viewed in the light of the scripture, Monsignor Capel quoted the four passages depended upon by the church to establish the popeship of Peter, and argued for their sufficiency, because the doctrin of the trinity, generally accepted by Christians, has only the one passage in John to support it, and of that he said, "There is a strong probability of its being an interpolation."

The strongest argument against the dogma of the trinity is the utter impossibility of its being true. There is no proof that there exists a "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost" at the present time, and until such proof is advanced there is no use trying to prove the trinitarian dogma. With the pope, however, the case is different. We know that a pope exists to-day, claiming direct heirship from Peter. His claims to be vicegerent of God are based upon the supposed commands of a supposed Christ to a supposed Peter. But if Peter never existed, or never was authorized to act as pope, then the line is broken, and the present pope's claims are based on air.

Peter's popeship is either a historical fact or it is not. The claim that Peter was martyred in Rome is one not sustainable by any credible evidence. In the Catholic church it is a tradition supported only by manufactured testimony. It is taught to Catholic children as undoubted truth, the same as is the garden of Eden story, and like that story has not the slightest historical evidence upon which to rest. Indeed, the very existence of Peter, the writer of the two epistles in the New Testament, is seriously questioned by Christian writers. Dr. Davidson holds that Peter wrote neither of the epistles ascribed to him, assigning the authorship of the first to a date several years after Peter's alleged martyrdom at Rome, and the second to somewhere about the date 170. Who, then, was the Peter crucified with his head downward because he thought himself unworthy to die in the same position as did Christ? There was a Cephas floating around about that time whose identity with Peter has been assumed by theologians, but some of the most competent critics deny it, and there is no evidence for it. This Cephas was not an apostle, but one of the seventy, according to Eusebius. In "Revelations of Antichrist" the papal claim to Peter is discussed at length, and the conclusion of that writer is that there was no Peter. The question, therefore, for Mr. Capel to solve is not whether Peter was invested by Christ with the keys of heaven, but whether his church is a direct descendant of him. The Peter crucified under Nero, now called the first pope, could not hav been the apostle Peter.

Another burning question for him to take hold of is, whether there ever was a Christ to bequeath the keys of heaven, or any heaven with keys to be bequeathed!

Editorial Notes.

A CORRESPONDENT writes that in one of General Grant's messages to Congress he recommended the taxation of church property, and wishes us to print the passage. We hav not the copy on hand, but if any of our readers will forward it, the request will be cheerfully complied with.

THREE deacons of Denver are on trial for violating the Civil Rights bill by forcibly preventing a young colored girl from entering one of the Methodist churches of that city. The command of Christ, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not," does not seem to hav much weight with the three deacons of Denver.

TALMAGE, who is now in England, told the Pall Mall Gazette reporter that his remedy for the evil of prostitution is early marriages and small families. This is precisely what Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant hav been saying for years, and for saying it the church has heaped upon them the vilest abuse. What will the Christians of England say of Talmage?

JOHN SWINTON says, "Montreal papers first fought smallpox with public prayers and processions, and then fell back on vaccination." Has it come to this, then, that cox-pox is more powerful than the God of hosts? Or did not the Montreal papers hav sufficient influence with him, or did he wish his children to die of a loathsome disease? We should like to hav some ministers' meeting settle this.

MR. THOS. P. BARROW, 31 Bath street, Belgrave, Leicester, England, writes Annie Besant: "Woman, your sins cry aloud for vengeance. Know that your accursed life has neared its end upon earth. Know that hell is anxiously waiting for your accursed . . . soul." Mrs. Besant says she cannot quote further, because the language of Mr. Barrow is so filthy that it is only fit for use by a Christian of his type. She adds: "Can any sane person suppose that a letter of this sort can hav the smallest effect, save to cause a feeling of amusement at hell's anxiety, and of disgust at the foulness of the rest?"

THE London Academy publishes a new poem by Robert Buchanan on Walt Whitman, which concludes with the following lines:

"The noblest head 'neath Western skies,
The tenderest heart, the clearest eyes,
Are thine, my Socrates, whose fate
Is beautifully desolate!
As deep as hell, as high as heaven,
Thy wisdom hath this lesson given:
When all the gods that reigned and reign
Hav fallen like leaves and left no sign,
The godlike Man shall still remain
To prove Humanity divine!"

That is a funny song for Buchanan to sing!

A LONDON correspondent writes to a western paper that the "burning topic" of newspaper discussion in England at the present is disestablishment of the Church of England. The Standard predicts that disestablishment will not be in the front row of public questions in November, but will occupy a respectable position in the second row. The Standard says: "The most trusted radical leaders show little disposition to raise this question as one of the practical issues of the next Parliament." The correspondent adds: "The clergymen hav, however, shown by numerous letters to various papers their fear that the subject is more in the thoughts of the new voters than has been supposed. The writers object to giving to Cæsar those things which are God's, but point out the general feeling among agricultural laborers that their votes must win for themselvs larger wages and better living. From such a spirit clergymen fear immediate attacks on tithes and church property."

THE great number of fallen clergymen has moved the editor of the Methodist organ to giv the preachers some good advice. He warns them thus:

"If ministers will visit ladies elsewhere than in the parlor or common meeting-room of the family; if they will receive calls from those they do not know, or from any woman whatever, in their study, either at the house or in the church; if they will receive communications as to domestic discords from a wife, without a witness to the conversation; if they indulge in the compliments on personal appearance which are the breath of life to the vain; if they allow themselvs to answer a summons at night for ministerial service to an unknown house, they must expect scandal, for they court it. We hav known all these to bring a clergyman into disgrace. It is a bad spot to be in where a minister's reputation for purity can be saved only by admitting that he is a fool."

We hope the advice to keep out of equivocal positions will be heeded by the clergy. It strains our resources sometimes to keep up with the record of clerical delinquencies.

AN International Freethought Conference will be held at Antwerp, Belgium, on the 20th, 21st, 22d, and 23d of this month. Two Antwerp Freethought Associations, La Libre Pensee and Les Solidaires, are activ in connection with the arrangements. Several very eminent names appear on the Brussels committee, including some of the leading public men. The questions on the agenda for discussion are: 1. The social role of religions: Has the religious idea been of utility to society in the past? What is its utility now? What part will it play in the future? 2. Moral responsibility and the philosophic foundation of punishment. 3. Secular education: Ought it to be neutral in the sense of indifference to religious dogmas, or ought it to be distinctly hostil to religious beliefs? 4. The need for Freethinkers to make their private and domestic actions conformable to their public declarations. 5. The oath question. 6. Religious wars: Are these to be feared in the present age? There will also be a meeting of the members and friends of the International Federation of Freethinkers, in order to promote more intimate relations between the Freethinkers of various countries.

"THERE is no excuse," says a Catholic of Rochester," for any parent in this city to peril the soul of his child by sending him to the public school, as every parish has its own school fully organized and equipped, with ample accommodation for all of the children." From the above two things can be plainly seen: the unconquerable hostility of the Catholics to our public school system, and the strenuous endeavors the Romish church is making to guard its own.

A REV. C. MACDONNA tried to make a point against Charles Bradlaugh by writing to an English journal that:

"Dr. Webb, who was then resident surgeon at St. Luke's Hospital, and has since married Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt's daughter, informed me that Mr. Charles Bradlaugh was a patient at the hospital, very seriously ill, with little hope of recovery, and that he was attended by the Episcopalian chaplain of the hospital. Mr. Bradlaugh's admirers can sound him upon the subject during his visit to Birkenhead next week."

Mr. Bradlaugh explodes this story by telling the truth. He says:

"It is true, as our readers here will know, that Mr. Bradlaugh was very dangerously ill of typhoid fever in New York in November and December, 1875. It is true that he was a private and paying patient, admirably cared for in St. Luke's Hospital, Fifth Avenue. It is absolutely untrue that Mr. Bradlaugh was 'attended by the Episcopal chaplain of the hospital.' Mr. Bradlaugh never even saw the chaplain. Dr. Muhlenburg, the founder of the hospital, visited Mr. Bradlaugh once after Mr. Bradlaugh was declared convalescent. Dr. Abbe, not Dr. Webb, was then resident home surgeon. Mr. Bradlaugh never heard of Dr. Webb. Dr. Leaming was Mr. Bradlaugh's physician."

THE conversation of Theodore Davis, brother of the swindler shot last week by a Texan, and the minister who officiated at the funeral, is interesting reading for Christians. "My mother was a good woman, Mr. Stansbury," Theodore said to the clergyman, "and brought me and Tom up in the way we should go. My father was a drinking man, but he knew the force of religion. Many a time when he was tipsy he caught Tom and me by the nape of our necks and marched us off to Sunday-school. I could bear up under this if I only knew where Tom was. Where do you think Tom is?" "You know our hereafter is decided by our lives," Mr. Stansbury said to Theodore. "I am inclined to believe in the religion of election by faith," Theodore said to the minister. The report adds that though Mr. Stansbury does not follow that doctrin, he told Theodore Davis that if he believed he could be saved by the loss of his brother, he hoped he would try. If the Davis brothers had been brought up Freethinkers, there is not a Christian paper or preacher in the country who would not hav found therein the biggest kind of a moral. And somehow we think the conversation is distended with a moral. That moral, however, is not against Infidelity.

A CHICAGO paper publishes a remarkable story of the discovery of ocular evidence of the human soul at Lincoln, Neb., by a microscopist whose name is modestly withheld, but whose story was telegraphed over the country yesterday. His attention was first attracted to the matter, he says, by a man lying upon a sofa suffering with a pain in his foot, and yet there was no foot there to suffer, the leg having been amputated nearly to the hip. He procured the most powerful lenses he could find and completed an investigation of his own, and arranged the lights so as to examin the microbes of the air. He then procured a subject in a friend whose arm was amputated, and, says he, "adjusting the glass a world of revelation broke upon me. The dual hand lay beneath my glass. I asked him to make letters with his imaginary finger. He did so, and to his wonder and astonishment I spelled out the sentences he wrote." Upon this story the Washington Post has interviewed Dr. E. M. Schaefer, the well-known microscopist of Washington. He said: "This story could hav been made more ingenious if the inventor had been better acquainted with microscopical instruments. As it is it bears a lie on its face, outside the unreality of the story. With the weakest magnifying glass it is impossible to see an entire object larger than a fly. Now, this story says that with the most powerful magnifying glass he could find he saw the hand write. With a powerful glass the entire hand would appear larger than the capitol, and you can see the difficulty in seeing such an object at one time." "Did you ever hear of anyone making such an experiment?" "No, not outside an insane asylum. A magnifying glass is a material instrument, and can only magnify material objects. The nearest we hav come to seeing the human soul is in examining the cells of the brain. There we can only see matter that exists, and that is about all we will ever see. However, this discoverer may prove a blessing yet. For instance, he should be asked to examin some of our corporations that are said to be soulless. If he could discover a soul in them it would take off the reproach with which they are attended." The Post adds: "It is understood by late dispatches from Chicago that this pioneer microscopist is making preparations to examin both the Wabash railroad and its officials."

Answers to Inquiries.

MARY E. SMITH.—1. There are no traces of Solomon's temple. All there is known about it is what the Bible says. That cannot by any means be called authentic history. 2. Rome is such an ancient city, has been sacked so many times, and its finest buildings destroyed (cattle even having been pastured on the very spots where once stood princely palaces), that its soil, to a very great depth, is a mass of rubbish, consisting of the debris of old buildings and other refuse. The foundations of some of the present buildings are from forty to sixty feet below the top of the ground. It is through these accumulations of centuries that the present excavations are being made. 3. Nestor was the friend of Hercules, and was distinguished for his valor, wisdom, justice, and eloquence. In old age he was honored by those seeking advice and direction as though he were of equal authority with the gods. From this you can easily see what the saying means.

Letters from Friends.

READING, KAN., Aug. 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Each and every individual feels and knows his own inferiority and dependence.

The most noble and learned philanthropist, whose every deed and word reflects only evidence of great moral worth; the egotistic, self-conceited bigot, however much he may rant about his independence and firmness of views, faith, and beliefs, and however much he may proclaim his conformity to them, in common with the most ignorant and barbarous; and the infant in arms—all and each are held in obedience to their individual idea of action either by hope of reward or fear of condemnation from a higher and greater power.

In proportion as we comprehend that higher and greater power to which we are subjected, and in the degree in which we value or fear that power, so are our actions governed and controled.

The child in arms comprehends only its immediate wants. Having no fear of its indulgent mother, it grabs for an immediate reward and gets it.

Until that child has intelligence and is taught the fear of its mother's censure, and a desire for her approbation, with a knowledge of greater reward by obedience than disobedience, it is on the road to barbarism. The motiv of all is selfishness. The only object of any is to know how to best gratify their selfish motivs. The only difference between the child, the ignorant barbarian, and the learned philanthropist, is the different degree of comprehension of the best and surest way to control that greater and higher power to assist us to gratify that selfishness. Education alone, which givs us the power of mind to comprehend, teaches us that the best way to gratify our own selfishness is to allow all others the same privilege, and not only allow but assist them to do so. The greatest and highest power of earth is the people, and he who administers most to the wants and personal desires or the selfishness of the people upon the earth, is the greatest, the happiest, and the best, because he does the most to promote his own selfishness. He has gained the highest eminence in morality and Christianity, because Christ said, "Do unto others as ye would that others should do to you; and this is the whole of the law."

In absence of education and that enlightenment which science alone can giv, this grand and lofty view for the elevation of the moral standard of mankind is incomprehensible.

The ignorant and barbarous masses which peopled the earth when the ancient Bibles were written could only be controled by fear. The few that were educated had neither the power to educate or tyrannize them. The uneducated barbarian was just as big as Moses or Zoroaster, and they, selling their powerlessness to control the then barbarous tribes of the earth, or their regards for the rights of others, very naturally made that God which they believed did exist to appear and tell the ignorant barbarians of his mighty power and wrath with which he would visit them if they did not obey, as the mother, finding herself powerless to control her wayward boy, seeks to terrify him by reminding him of the wrath and vengeance of the absent father which will surely be visited upon him upon his coming. That boy could not and would not believe unless he had a knowledge of his father's existence, and had felt his rod and heard his angry voice.

Thus Zoroaster, Moses, & Co. very naturally, in their miscomprehension of the necessity in those times and in those barbarous ages, made each their individual imaginary God to appear, they being the medium through which he spoke to the various trihes of the severe punishments or glorious rewards with which he would surely visit them for obeying or disobeying the law.

W. H. PENFIELD.

CHEATED OUT OF LIFE.

MR. EDITOR: The above words might be appropriately written upon the tombstones and monuments of most of those who hav "lived (?), moved, and had a being" on this planet. Said the learned and pious Dr. Blair many years ago: "One science there is above all others, and that is the science of living well." I hear people saying of such a man, "He died rich, respected, honored, etc." What benefit or good is it to a man to die rich, or to be followed to his costly tomb by thousands of blind idolators dazzled by his ill-gotten possessions or titles, if he has lived poor and caused thousands around him to liv poor, by enslaving and robbing them of the proceeds of their labor? The great mass of humanity, even in civilized (?) and enlightened (?) countries, the moment they are born and begin to breathe and the human machinery begins to move, are taught, both by precept and example, human falsehoods and absurdities, bad habits and suicidal fashions and customs, and to clog, derange, impair, and poison "The-house-I-live-in," torture and torment its so-called occupant, the mind, and drive it out prematurely to a crowded hell or (if orthodoxy be true) to a sparsely occupied heaven.

I hav lived (?) sixty-six years to learn how little I know of "how to liv," although my activ and retentiv brain is a vast receptacle of facts and impressions, useless for that purpose. The vast number of males and females who pass through our schools violate the laws of life, health, and parentage, while getting their education, and after, all through life, because they were not rightly organized and hav not received the right kind of education. How much better do most of them liv—how much more do they make of life, with their sickly, diseased bodies and brains, than the ignorant who hav strong and healthy bodies, good digestion and sleep? How many of us Liberals (?) and Free(?)thinkers know how to run our machines, so as to get the most of life and enjoyment therefrom? How many of our great men and women, among Infidels and reformers, "present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to—not "the Lord," but—themselvs and humanity? How many men do not poison their systems and vitiate the atmosphere with poisons and anti-vital tobacco, or alcohol, or weaken and derange the magnetic and electric forces by shaving off the hair, when nature has developed it as a savior of life and vigor? How many of our charming and gifted speakers and writers of the "softer and sweeter sex" keep clean stomachs and sweet breaths, fully expanded lungs, and free limbs and muscles, and dress in conformity to convenience, decency, and health from head to foot? How many brilliant and inspiring men and women in the Liberal ranks hav gone to premature graves, their luminous minds suddenly eclipsed, "Broken gems whose inborn light is scattered ne'er (?) to re-unite," because they did not know how to liv—did not appreciate the value and significance of this life? "He that cannot liv well to-day will be less qualified to liv well to-morrow." Humanity hav ever been diverted from this life and its uses, grandeur, and glory, to an imaginary, fabricated "home above," or "summer land," or filled with fear, dread, and anti-vital apprehension of an awful hell and an avenging God, that kept them in their blind faith on "the ragged edge of despair," or drove them to insanity and suicide. Let the human tree of life be germinated from the best protoplasm or seed, and then let it grow naturally and healthfully; its roots in the most fertil soil, its trunk and top (brain) in pure air, and when its top is developed it will bear luscious fruit and fragrant odors, and thereon will be a spirit land in this life, and so it will be "a paying investment." Reader, I would fain be a naturalist and humanitarian, and all that those words imply, that I may, by example and precept, teach how to liv.

J. H. COOK.

HARWICH, MASS., Aug. 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I am in receipt of a paper from Seward Mitchell, of Newport, Maine, the title of which is, "Important Truths; Preparing the Way for Coming Generations." Now, I must say there are many "Important Truths" contained in that little pamphlet which, if treasured up, would make better men, better women, better families, better society, better citizens, a better country, and a better world. And I should judge Brother Mitchell to be a self-sacrificing and benevolent man, who perhaps has seen enough of fraud and chicanery, hypocrisy and corruption, in church and state to disgust even an indifferent stoic, much more such an ardent radical and lover of the right as I should judge him to be.

I admire such self-sacrificing men; I admire bravery for the right; I admire fidelity to convictions and bravery in giving expression to them, but with all I see so admirable in the sentiments expressed in the above pamphlet, I can but call in question some of the ideas advanced until evidence shall change my mind.

It is plain enough that church and state hav always been partners in crime; that the church has been assisted by the state in shedding the blood of millions, yet I cannot see the propriety of withdrawing from all participation in government and giving up to the worst portion of the people the management of the same. If we cannot hav the government as pure as we wish; if bad men will get into responsible offices and wield their influence to selfish ends, had we not better stay in it and render such service as shall neutralize by counteraction the effects of political corruption?

It seems to me we hav as good reason to get out of the world because of the depravity of the people in it as to withdraw from government because of the depravity of politicians. It is deplorable that we hav so many unprincipled villains in high places, but would it be better if all the good elements were extracted from it and government left without any redeeming features?

Of course we could indirectly bring to bear upon it a healthy influence in other ways than by voting—and indeed, more dependence is to be placed in the renovation of public sentiment, but we can ill afford to lose whatever of influence we can hav as voters, however little that may be.

Suppose all we Freethinkers and all other right-minded persons should cease voting, how soon we should all be fettered with the manacles of ecclesiastical oppression and tyranny! And only too glad would that hoary old monster of iniquity and intolerance, the church of Rome, be to run the machinery of government in the interest of its abominable religion and curtail, if not totally repress, the progressiv spirit of the age. No, my good brother Mitchell, we must not let slip from our hands our share in our government, and giv it up altogether into the hands of priests and corrupt politicians, but we will do our level best to secularize and redeem it from every vestige of religion, whether good or bad. If every man and woman was as good as Brother Mitchell, we should even then need a government. Order is necessary in every department of life, and we cannot hav order without government.

There are a few other points in Brother Mitchell's creed that appear to me questionable, but there is so little of the objectionable in his paper that I cannot but recommend it to everyone for perusal and profit.

B. F. ROBBINS.

ELGIN, ILL., Aug. 28, 285.

MR. EDITOR: After bearing with the Salvation Army until patience ceased to be a virtue, the police arrested them Sunday last as they were marching through the streets with their wild noise, beating their drums and ringing their bells; and Monday they were fined $3 and discharged, promising to be more circumspect. On Monday evening, by the permission of the mayor, they held their meeting in the court house. As the writer was passing about nine o'clock Monday evening, he was attracted by the noise of the singing, shouting, and laughing. Curiosity led him to go into the building. Being a citizen I felt at liberty to go into the court house. It was full of a lot of noisy lunatics, who were singing and shouting at the top of their voice. I stood just inside the door, looking in wonder at the natural curiosities before me. In about two minutes a young dude stepped up to me and said, "Take off your hat, sir." I said, "Who says so?" He said, "I say so." "Well, but what does the law say?" He said he didn't care what the law said; that he said, "In the name of the Salvation Army take off your hat." "I am ready to do as the law says." "Well, if you don't take off your hat I will hav you arrested." "All right," I said; "just as the law says." He spoke to a policeman to arrest me. He did so. I went with him to the lock-up. Was not there two minutes when two citizens, hearing of the arrest, stepped in and voluntarily offered to go my bail. One only being needed, one of them signed my bonds, when I was again at liberty.

I am nearly fifty years old, and this is the first time I was ever under an arrest in my life. My trial came off yesterday before one of our justices of the peace, who gave a clear and decided judgment in my favor, putting the Salvation Army in for all cost, and exonerating me from all blame in the matter. There were eight witnesses examined, and from their testimony it was plainly to be seen that they thought I was the cause of all disturbance.

I did not think to trouble you with so long a letter, but I merely wished to show how anxious they were to prosecute an Infidel, for that was clearly the cause of my arrest.

Yours truly, I. W. ARCHIBALD.

CHRISTIANITY NOT COMPULSORY.

From the Elgin Daily Courier of August 27th.

When Isaac Archibald was called upon to giv testimony at his trial, yesterday, he declined to be sworn, saying that, as he acknowledged no God, an oath could hav no significance with him. He was permitted to affirm. Mr. Archibald stated that he had been attracted to the council room as he was passing to his home, by loud and discordant noises, shouting, singing, and clapping of hands. He stepped inside the door, and presumed he had his hat on, but did nothing to create disorder. Will Spire had told him to take off his hat. He did not like to be made to do anything, and had not hastened to comply. Spire and others had then become peremptory in their demands, and, evidently wanting trouble, had called on an officer to arrest him.

The section of the ordinance on which it was thought to convict Mr. Archibald makes a person guilty of a misdemeanor who shall conduct himself in a "rude and indecent manner" while in a public assembly. Either intentionally or through a blunder, the conjunction "and" is used in the ordinance instead of "or." Attorney Irwin allowed that the wearing of a hat in any assembly, with a few well-known exceptions, was rude conduct probably, but not indecent conduct. He held that, under the ordinance, his client would hav to be guilty of both to be held. This was the main defense.

Justice Hubbard rendered a decision of no cause of action, the army to pay the costs. He took occasion to advise the defendant that it is customary to remove one's hat at any public assembly held indoors, and especially where religious services are being held. He advised Mr. Archibald to do this in the future. His honor then suggested to the Salvation Army that it get religion enough so that its services will not cease when one man with a hat on makes his appearance. He said that the trouble had not begun until the members of the Army provoked it, and that he thought they wished trouble to occur, or they would hav gone on with their worship notwithstanding. Archibald had been ordered to take off his hat or be arrested, and naturally had not liked bulldozing.

The case was prosecuted for all it was worth by the city attorney. A conviction was impossible under the ordinance and the evidence.

A FREE "AD."

BUTLER, N. J., Aug. 26, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I built a house for a man here with whom I hav made my home the past eleven years. It is about as good as it is possible to build of wood, and finished with chestnut and black walnut. There are five square rooms on the first floor, about fourteen feet square, four bedrooms above, a splendid gravel roof, heater in cellar, water in house, plenty and good. Must be seen to be appreciated. He now wants to sell it (I am sorry to say, for my heart is in it). Little malaria or musketos; within five minutes of post-office and depot; about thirty miles from New York city; four passenger trains to New York daily except Sunday; four stores; three mental slaughter-houses with their usual complement of saloons; telephone and telegraph, etc.; fruit-trees, grape-vines, shrubbery, strawberries, currants, and raspberries. Troutbrook bounds one side of the house. House, lot, and outbuildings can be bought for $2,500. Half or more can remain on bond and mortgage for a term of years to suit the buyer. I would like to hav some Liberal buy it who wants a good house at a bargain. I don't want any orthodox devils to hav it. Now, if either of you, or any other of our church, wants this, come and see it.

W. O. JACOBI.

ST. CATHERINES, ONT., CAN., Aug. 24, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: My letter you kindly published in your last number is quite correct with one exception. In the latter part where it reads, "for I had signed my name within C. B. Thompson, as usual, and Mr. Leavenworth was one of the few," it should hav read after "as usual," "and there were but few who knew my first name, and Mr. Leavenworth was one of the few."

I see that Thomas Harding, of Sturgis, Mich., has penned a candid and sensible letter upon the subject of Spiritualism. No reasonable Spiritualist or Materialist should take any exception to it. He says in one paragraph, "In my opinion the first duty of man on earth is to be happy and mind his legitimate business; and if he does that as every honest man should, he has nothing to fear from so-called 'death,' of which orthodoxy taught him to stand in dread." Those are my sentiments. I hav come to the conclusion, after investigating the subject pro and con for many years, that the better way is to enjoy this world we are in as best we can, and if there is another world and we should wake up in it some day do the same there; but if it should finally prove that so-called death ends all, so be it. This fretting, and whining, and preaching, and praying about another world is beneath the dignity of all sensible human beings; and the majority of that class are nothing more or less than pretending hypocrits, being impelled by popularity and business interests. I am naturally fond of investigation when it can be done in a reasonable manner, but when it interferes with my desired happiness I discard it

Ella E. Gibson talks in a candid manner upon this subject. In her third paragraph she givs my experience quite correctly. At that time I attributed the various manifestations to magnetism and clairvoyance. With both hands raised I am with her where she says, "It is the frauds that I know exist, and that every Spiritualist knows exist, against which I wage war, and if any Spiritualist is unwilling to work with me because of my efforts to hunt the rascals down in Spiritualism, I hav no desire to work with them them in hunting the rascals down in old theology." Bravo!

In a letter from Brattleboro, Vt., the writter says, "There are many people who prefer total annihilation to an eternity of continual consciousness in an extra-mundane sphere, and I am happy to say I am one of them." Now, I am inclined to discredit that when seriously considered. Expressions are often easier made than substantiated.

The writer says in another paragraph: "Speaking for myself, I cannot say that I know of any feeling so peaceful and blissful, so easy and calm to the body and mind, as that experienced at the moment of falling asleep after a hard day's work. To me it is heaven—in fact, it is all the heaven I want."

I will ask, Were said writer made aware at that blissful moment that said sleep would be his last, that he would never wake again, would (think ye) he feel so heavenly? I trow not.

Liberty and Freethought forever, C. B. THOMPSON.

ALEXANDRIA, MINN., Aug. 20, 285.

MR. EDITOR: For the past three weeks a couple of Adventist sky-pilots hav been holding forth in a tent erected in this village, preaching every evening, or explaining the jimjam hash of old Daniel, and distributing tracts during the day, but this is rather stony ground for their theological seed, and I do not think their harvest will pay expenses. We had a tract printed at our local printing-office, which is a sort of counter irritant. I inclose you a copy with this.

Brother Jamieson described our visit to Minneapolis to hear Colonel Ingersoll. I heard him at Minneapolis, and on the succeeding evening at St. Paul also. The lecture was the same at both places, but I should not tire to listen to him every evening for a month. I hav often seen it stated that it was only the lowest classes which attended his lectures, but after seeing the intelligent audiences which greeted the colonel at these cities, I should conclude that it is the very best brains in the country that go to listen to our "silver-tongued orator." I hav heard Beecher and Gough lecture, but they hav not that power over their audiences which the colonel has. It was a grand sight for me to see two thousand people with not the least sign of weariness after listening to the colonel for two hours. May he long be spared to proclaim the gospel of humanity!

Brother E. C. Walker gave us a lecture the 8th of this month on "The Proposed Amendment of the God-in-the-Constitution Party." A large audience listened to him, and many no doubt were surprised to hear that the Christian fanatics who compose that party are traitors to our republican institutions.

For inclosed postal note send me six pictures of "Christian History" and one copy of Remsburg's "Bible Morals."

Yours fraternally, N. J. TRENHAM.

KANSAS CITY, MO., Aug. 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: From all indications, Friday is getting to be a more legal sanctified day than Sunday. While acts of omission and commission on the Sabbath day were formerly regulated by law, in order that mortals might enter the Christian's paradise, we find, as such acts hav been dropped from Sunday, they hav been carefully preserved by being transferred to Friday, not by clerical, but by secular authority, the corporation becoming a sort of lego religo company. Excursion trains to the city of celestial happiness are made up and run on Fridays only. Criminal judges are superintendents of the various rapid-transit roads leading from earth to heaven. The conductors are appointed for life, and known as ordained priests. The engineers are elected yearly, and called county sheriffs. Whole tickets are only issued, and are never taken up or punched. The character of all adults, before going aboard the train, must be indorsed by a sufficient number of witnesses to make an election sure, as trains only run one way on this cable line.

The question naturally arises, Are we to hav two holy days in the week, or is Friday to supersede Sunday? Judging by the reports of the daily press every Saturday throughout the country, these Friday excursion trains over the rapid-transit glorified cable roads must be increasing their business at a rapid rate. In view of the fact that great changes are taking place in the secular affairs of life, it may be possible that religion is also about to wake up and make a radical change, and that the old fogy way of preparing souls to interview God, by preaching to them fifty-two days in a year for sixty or seventy years, and then running the risk, at last, of their starting on the wrong day or getting aboard the wrong train, will no longer do. A short examination, a make-ready invocation, and then a Friday's jerk-to-Jesus, in a business point of view ought to please the angels and all interested in saving souls quick and sure better than the old-fashioned, one-horse way of one parson doing all the work, and never knowing when a job was finished. W. W. JUDSON.

ALVA, FLA., Aug. 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I want to build up a Liberal community similar to that of Liberal, Mo., or better, in which there shall not be a sectarian church nor an orthodox sermon—and here is the place and now is the time. Good, high, dry land, on a beautiful navigable river, can be bought now, I think, at from $3 to $10 per acre, that will be worth five times that in less than five years. The country is healthy, and the climate "just splendid." Being almost down to the tropics, the days and nights are nearly equal the year round, with clouds and showers to cool the summers, and balmy sunshine to warm the winters; hence, we are free from those extremes of cold and heat so distressing to nervous sufferers. We hav a public school six months in the year, a weekly mail service on the river, and a post-office waiting someone to take charge of it. And the investment is safe, since the property will always be worth more than it is to-day. I would prefer people of middle age, who hav made about all the money they wish to—or, rather, expect to—moved around until they are disgusted with moving, and are now willing to settle down and enjoy life. This being a poor man's country, better adapted to truck-patches, poultry, bees, etc., than to farming, $2,000 to $3,000 would be ample for an industrious, frugal family; yet, I would advise no one to come here with less than $500.

A good representativ person should come with money to secure five hundred or one thousand acres before there is a boom.

As I hav no land to sell—not even for others—and need all my time and means in my own support, I pray no one will write me through idle curiosity.

Having spent two-thirds of my allotted time in the midst of orthodox old fogies, I wish to enjoy the remainder with independent Freethinkers. Congenial society, not filthy lucre, is the desideratum. J. L. BARKER.

STERLING CENTER, MINN., August, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to acknowledge receipt of ANNUAL. It far exceeds our expectations. Beside the calendar, we hav more good solid reading than could be obtained in any other way with the small sum of twenty-five cents. The portraits are excellent—that of Professor Jamieson is true to life. We had the pleasure of entertaining him—or being entertained by him, rather—a few days during his stay here, and found him a most enthusiastic worker for the Liberal cause. Logical, powerful, and convincing to all that will listen without prejudice are the facts so clearly brought forth by this sturdy advocate of truth. With a free and easy delivery, and true gentlemanly grace, he holds his audience in rapt attention. The friends in this vicinity hav no hesitation in recommending him to any body of Liberals in search of a speaker. LIZETTA.

FEILDING, NEW ZEALAND, July 16, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I am sorry to say that my father, W. E. Chamberlain, passed away on the 31st of January last, after a long and painful illness. But I am pleased to say that we hav found great consolation in Spiritualism. Mediums are developing in our own family, and through them my father has given us proof that he still livs in the spirit world. I am,

Yours faithfully, T. R. CHAMBERLAIN.

MINNEAPOLIS, Aug. 16, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me to express my appreciation and admiration of your skill and success in manufacturing the little pamphlet "Truth." The very superior workmanship, large type, fine, heavy paper, improved matter, splendid arrangement, and the finale, form a grand, perfect proof success, and pride of the Truth Seeker Company publications. That my highest inspiration, ambition, anticipation, aspiration, and hope may finally be realized, and the publishers be more than rewarded and indemnified for extra care and labor, is my great expectation and desire.

Just read "Deity Analyzed" and "The Devil's Defense." If it don't "beat the Jews," I don't know what does. It surely equals the best confutation of Christianity we hav yet seen. It should be owned, read, marked, learned, and inwardly digested by every poor, miserable sinner, and sincere lover of philosophy and truth, on this our little mundane planet. Get it, read it; believe, practice, and improve it.

E. N. KINGSLEY.

AINSWORTH, Aug. 9, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10, which use as follows: $2 for the Campaign Fund, $1 for the Bruno Fund, $1 for the Tent Fund, $3 for the glorious TRUTH SEEKER, the rest for the FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC, "Bible Morals," and some other papers such as you think best for superstitious fellows to read. I am a German, and a poor speller; you must excuse me for not writing any better. I hav been reading this paper nearly one year, and the more I read it the more I like it, and cannot do without it. I dispose of all my copies among my friends, and try to canvass for it, and some day I will hav some new subscribers to send in. We hav some very Liberal people here, and some very strong, superstitious fellows to combat with. FRANK SCHUNEMANN.

CATHLAMET, W. T., Aug. 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER. During the fishing season the League did not meet, but as it is over now, I think I can report more fully before long.

We started a Liberal Sunday-school at Skamokawa, W. T., July 26th, to meet the last Sunday of each month. We had an attendance of twenty-two the first Sunday.

We hope to obtain more subscribers for you soon.

LIDA I. ALBERT, Secretary Liberal League.

WAVERLY, WASH. TER., Aug. 18, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 to apply to my subscription. I want to giv you a remedy for snake-bite to publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER, for the benefit of our friends all over the world, that the medical faculties do not know anything about.

This plant is known under the various names: culver root (leftandra virginica), Culver's physic, blackroot, tall speedwell, Indian physic. Take the root and pulverize it; add a little cold water, and let it remain a few minutes. Then apply to the wound. About the best way to apply it is to chew it and spit it on the wound. From one to three applications are all that are necessary to cure almost any snake-bite. I never knew it fail in any case on man or beast.

I would like to hear from friends in India that tried my remedy, also in other countries. HARRISON HAYS.

OSCEOLA, IA., Aug. 21, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I cannot dispense with the valuable fund of information which it imparts. It is sounding the funeral chant of all orthodoxy. The arrows of superstition and religious intolerance fall harmless before the bulwark of Freethought and science. The world is composed of two classes of people—one, the orthodox, which is composed of the ignoramuses and bigoted and conceited hypocrits, who are opposed to everything which is at variance with that mythical, contradictory book called the Bible; the other class, those who are ever ready to grasp hold of new truths, without regard to inspiration or the miraculous conception of a virgin. This class is the bone and sinew of all scientific advancement, swayed not by the opinion of priest or pope, but guided only by the truth. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER! FRANK J. JONES.

PICKERING, MO., Aug. 24, 1885.

MR EDITOR: J. E Remsburg lectured here the 18th ultimo. His subject was "False Claims," and it was a severe blow struck at the hydra-headed monster, superstition. The lukewarm Infidels were aroused from their lethargy, and many of those on the fence were caused to enlist under our banner. Notwithstanding the fact that we liv in a free country, where the freedom of speech shall not be denied, a company of the "elect," armed with "the sword of the spirit," and guided by the Rev. H. Jewett, were out in ample array, remonstrating against our having the school-house for the meeting. They even censured the board of directors for giving thoir consent to use the house for such a purpose.

Now, taking into consideration the fact that the school-house is open to the public for all purposes, such as meeting, lectures, etc., we are driven to the conclusion that the orthodox here, as elsewhere, are thoroughly imbued with the persecuting spirit that characterizes the craft. Mr. Jewett, I understand, met Mr. Remsburg and gave him a hearty welcome, apparently, at the same time trying to debar him from the school-house, and yet this hypocrisy was only keeping in conformity with his Bible, which says: "I will go forth, and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And he said, Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also. Go forth and do so."

These fanatics were actuated by the same impulse that moved Calvin to defend the burning of Servetus. They were moved by the same spirit that incarcerated Galileo in a dungeon for eighteen years—that burned Bruno at the stake. It was this impulse that enacted the code authorizing the burning of heretics at every royal marriage as a part of the festivities. It was this spirit that made the history of Christianity a disgrace to the world.

Some of these monomaniacs, moved by the burning rage of malice, petitioned our county commissioner of schools to annul my certificate on account of my skepticism and debar me from teaching. Yes, cranks, if I belonged to your rank I would call upon the rocks to fall upon me and hide me from the just indignation of the scientific world. A SKEPTIC.

ANGOLA, IND., Aug. 24, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER since its publication in New York city, and am much pleased with its progress and fairness in publishing all sides of questions at issue. I am a Spiritualist, because a man cannot believe what he will, but must believe by the force of evidence he receives from his investigations. But I like to read the communications of Elmina, Winter, Wettstein, and others.

But if the belief in a future life is a delusion, and yet is a happy anticipation to those thus believing, why try to destroy it? Let them enjoy it while they can. I hav had evidence to convince me that this is not all of life. But I may be deluded. Let us watch and wait. Friends, giv us all the truths you can. I am a truth seeker and hater of superstition and dogmatism.

Yours ever, for universal mental liberty,

DR. J. H. MOORE.

ORCANA, ILL., Aug. 22, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith find money-order for amount to balance my account with THE—or I should say our—grand old TRUTH SEEKER to the close of the current year. For the additional twenty-five cents please send ANNUAL. As an Infidel Freethinker I hav not only grown to love the journal you so ably edit, but feel proud that the cause of intellectual liberty has in this country so able a champion as it has for several years past shown itself to be.

In closing you will allow me to say to, and for, Brother Remsburg that I hav read with critical care his "False Claims" and "Bible Morals," both to my pleasure and profit. They are strong impeachments, and the Liberal who has not read them has yet to enjoy one of the most substantial feasts in the field of Liberal literature. W. H. GANTZ.

ANAHEIM, CAL., Aug. 1, 285.

MR. EDITOR: YOUR TRUTH SEEKER for July 11, 1885, will render your name immortal for presenting to the world a bird's-eye view of the growth of humanity out of the great darkness of superstition and absurdity of dogmatical creeds. I am so charmed with it that I will send a list of addresses to which I wish copies sent. "Modern Balaam" comes in for a meed of praise. Liberals hav a work to do in that direction. Educate the eye to the facts of the past, for the churches hav the ears of the young and teach it is sinful to listen to Freethought ideas, and try to, and do, make their hearers believe the League is organized for the purpose of prohibiting people from enjoying religious exercises. May your artist hav visions of great wisdom to portray the tremendous wrongs in existence, and the remedy will be forthcoming.

MRS. K. PARKER.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Aug. 22, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Postal received; the ANNUAL, "Bible Myths," and cartoons to hand all right. "Balaam and Donkey" well caricatured and significant. The beautiful angel of truth, liberty, and Freethought, with the all-powerful sword of Reason, standing erect, calm, and defiant, was too much to allow donkey to go a peg further, however given hell with the whip. Poor donkey and priest are to be pitied. Donkey seems humbled, and priest defiant. He'd better repent and own up The "Short Lesson in History" as a picture is magnificent and all-telling. J. N. SEEVERS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Three Cherry-Trees.

[Lines suggested to the writer on visiting, for the first time the home of her childhood in Lancaster, Pa., and gazing once more on the old cherry-trees still full of fruit after blossoming and ripening for more than forty years.]

Long years hav come and passed away
Since I, a child so light and gay,
Hav sat beneath these cherry-trees,
And listened to the humming bees,
Wondering what they wanted there
Among the blossoms in the air;
For every branch and bough in sight
Was covered with the blossoms white,
And every flower, it seemed to me,
Contained a little honey-bee.
Their busy hum I loved to hear,
'Twas music for my childish ear,
And so I often came and played
Amid their songs beneath the shade;
And brothers, too—I see them now,
With loving eyes and thoughtful brow—
Stretched side by side, would quiet keep,
And listen till they sank to sleep,
Lulled by the sound of bees o'erhead,
While resting on that grassy bed;
Or busily, with childish glee,
Building houses, 'neath the tree,
With stones for walls and sticks for doors,
And holes for windows, grass for floors;
Our table made, and spread with white,
Covered with broken dishes quite,
All shades and colors, to be sure,
And whate'er shapes we could procure.
And when to grandpa's we would go
To spend, perhaps, a week or so,
We'd wander out in yard or shed,
And gather dishes, green and red—
For hadn't they some lovely ones,
With flowers and birds and fishes on?
And sometimes aunt would break a bowl
(For accidents we can't control),
And we, with philosophic brains,
Thought her small losses our great gains,
And won't these, thought we to ourselvs,
Look gay upon our little shelvs?
And many a happy hour we've spent
Beneath those trees in self-content;
And when the flowers and bees were gone,
And sweet, ripe fruit hung thereupon,
How many times I climbed these trees
With nimble feet and perfect ease,
And sat upon the topmost limbs,
Gathering fruit and singing hymns!
And can it be 'tis twenty years
Since I, with childish hopes and fears,
Sang on these trees and in their shade,
And with loving brothers played?
I dream I still am young, and they
Will soon be here to help me play.
But now, alas! they're far away.

Ann Arbor, Mich. ELIZABETH C. MOORE.

My Creed.

I hold that Christian peace abounds
Where charity is seen; that when
We climb to heaven, 'tis on the rounds
Of love to men.

I hold all else, named piety,
A selfish scheme, as vain pretense—
Where center is not can there be Circumference?

That I moreover hold and dare
Affirm where'er my rhyme may go
Whatever things be sweet or fair,
Love makes them so.

'Tis not the wide phylactery,
Nor stubborn taste, nor stated prayers,
That make us saints; we judge the tree
By what it bears.

And when a man may liv apart
From worlds on theologic trust,
I know the blood about his heart
Is dry as dust. —Alice Carey.

A Brave Little Girl.

Amy Barton sat on her father's knee, coaxing to go with him to wind the city clock, which was his duty every Monday. Having gained his consent she went to bed determined to rise early. She awoke with the sun, and, after a hurried breakfast, father and daughter set out on their journey.

"Don't drink anything, and come home early, John," said his wife a little anxiously, as she bade them good-bye. Merely muttering a gruff "All right," he strolled along the country road, watching Amy as she chased the butterflies and picked the flowers that bloomed along the roadside.

At last they reached the city, and Mr. Barton, after winding the clock, went around the city and picked up some odd jobs, mending clocks and watches. About noon he went to an inn for refreshments. He thought he was one of the kind that could drink and know when he had drank enough, and after dinner they went out walking. Amy had a very nice time, and Mr. Barton, finding a great deal of work, concluded to remain over night. It was dusk when he again entered the inn, and, finding many old friends assembled, he fell to drinking. He was just filling his glass for the fourth time when Amy went shyly up to him, and, taking his hand, said, pleadingly, "Come, papa, don't drink any more; you know you said you wouldn't. Come, let us leave this house of temptation."

"Here, Amy, you just hold your tongue, there's a good girl. Take this and buy some cakes," and John slipped a silver piece into her hand. Amy took the money, but did not spend it, and sitting in the corner, watched her father with tearful eyes. Toward midnight he noticed Amy sobbing in the corner. He led her to the room where they were to sleep, and, throwing himself on the couch, soon fell into a deep slumber.

Not so with Amy. She lay awake watching her father. Suddenly remembering that he had money in his pocket, and the drunken men they had left below, she crept to her father's side, and putting her hand in his pocket drew out four silver pieces. She put them with her own and crept sobbing to bed. She lay there for some time. What if he should miss it! Tremblingly she went to his side and put back two of the pieces, and when her head again touched the pillow she fell asleep.

It was late when she awoke, and, dressing quickly, ran down-stairs and found her father. They remained all day, and in the evening Mr. Barton again went to the saloon, where the same crowd was gathered. Amy watched her father from her place in the corner, but said nothing, for she was busy thinking of her mother, and how much she needed the money her father was wasting. In the midst of her melancholy thoughts she fell asleep. Toward midnight she was awakened by rough voices. The landlord was putting her father out. Amy followed, and, walking beside her intoxicated father, led him up one street and down another. At one place there were no vacant rooms; at another the landlord, seeing that Mr. Barton had got his drink somewhere else, refused them lodging.

Her heart sank as she again led her father into the chilly street. They were six miles from home, and in order to reach it they had to pass through a dense grove. They were still some distance from this grove, and before they reached it Amy was weak with the heavy weight of her father. The child shuddered as she entered the shadow of the trees. Her father stumbled and leaned more heavily on his little daughter's frail body. Her tears blinded her, and she was startled every time a frightened rabbit darted across the path. The wind moaned loudly through the trees, and the leaves blew rudely about her.

But the poor child went on bravely, with now and then a frightened glance behind her. Once she was tempted to lay her father under a tree and wait till morning. But the thought of mother—dear, kind mother—who must be waiting for them, gave her new courage, and she trudged on more bravely than before.

Every minute seemed an hour to Amy, and when, at last, they reached the road, she could not repress a cry of delight. They had not far to go now, and Amy thought of the last time she had run along the road and how happy she had been. Home! The word had never meant so much to poor Amy before, and, as she opened the gate and looked through the window at the patient mother busily sewing, her eyes filled with happy tears.

Mrs. Barton, hearing the longed-for footsteps, hastened to meet them. She saw the situation, and a burst of indignation and sorrow was her greeting. Amy threw herself sobbing into her mother's arms. Mrs. Barton led them into the warm, bright sitting-room, and leaving John to care for himself, prepared to make her daughter comfortable. As they drank their tea, Amy told her adventures, and handing the money to her mother said, with a smile, "Buy yourself a new gown, mother dear; you need it sorely." A kiss was her only answer.

And so we hear, day after day, of husbands and fathers who rob their wives and children of what is rightly theirs; brothers who bring disgrace and shame upon a sister's head; and sons who make a mother's hair gray before its time, and drag a father's proud name in the dust, by the wine-cup.

But if all, like brave little Amy, would help those whom they see going wrong, there might be less shame and sorrow in the world.

Correspondence.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Aug. 26, 1885.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: My two little boys think that Earle A. Finch is quite right about that purse which ought to be made up for Mr. Hacker. They send a dollar, which I inclose to you, not having Mr. Hacker's address, trusting to your kindness to forward it to him. I hope a great many little boys and girls who enjoy the Children's Corner as much as mine do will follow Earle's advice.

Truly yours, JOSEPHINE DUANE.

[The amount has been forwarded to "Grandpa Hacker," and, although the above letter was not intended for publication, we print it, that our readers may see the benevolent spirit of our little friends, and know also where to look for the noble men of the future. —ED. C. C.]

86 PUTNAM ST., SYRACUSE, N. Y.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I read about the prize being offered for the best story, so I thought I would try. I am fourteen years old. I would hav sent my story before, but I am learning my trade, and it is late when I get home. I am very fond of story writing, and I hope you will think mine nice enough to go in the Children's Corner. If there are any mistakes, I wish you to tell me, and if you think it nice, please say I may write again. My parents take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we could not do without it. I would like to correspond with friends of the Children's Corner.

From your friend, F. MARY E. VIDLER.

HAMBURG, N. Y., Aug. 25, 285.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I inclose 25c. for Grandpa Hacker. Will you please see that it reaches him? I hav no grandfather or grandmother. They are all in the spirit land.

Your little friend, TIMMIE H. SICKMON.

[Contribution sent. The answers to puzzles all correct.—ED. C. C.]

Book Notice.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM. The Present and the Future Republic of North America. By a Capitalist. Published by the Truth Seeker Company. Price, $1.50.

This is a remarkable book. It must win the attention of those who desire the amelioration of man's lot. It is written not by a dreamer, but by a man of action who has won success in the battle of life—who has displayed executiv ability of a high order, and the value of whose judgment is measured by practical attainments.

The style of this book is excellent. It is written in a plain, straightforward manner. We know what the author means. There are no vague phrases. It is the style of a business man who has something to say, not from his imagination, but from his experience.

Nevertheless, it is not a dry book. It sparkles with enthusiasm. It is like the clear running brook of Berkshire hills, where the author says he was born. It catches the sunshine in its quick flow. It is buoyant with out-door life. The author speaks with the glorious ardor of youth.

Rational Communism is not by any means a dreadful thing. It is not lurid or revolutionary. It is simply human fellowship and co-operation. It is a plea against the tremendous and fearful warfare of to-day, where so many are driven to the wall in the mad struggle for a mere livelihood. It means a government based on moral sentiment, and not mere force, universal in its beneficence—not reducing to a dead level, but giving play to all the varied faculties of man in a genial and beautiful combination of effort and reward, where the spirit of brotherhood prevails, and the least becomes of service to the greatest, and the greatest bends in love and nobility with the least.

Surely, this is the dream of every generous man who sees the wrong and suffering of to-day—the direful conflict, the poverty, the wretchedness, the utter depression of millions of human beings, the slavery of him who toils, the splendor of him who enjoys the fruits of another's labor. This must cease if humanity is to grow. Uncombined individual effort cannot make the supreme good. There must be co-operation. There must be a common interest, a common bond, a common wealth, a unity of government based not on compulsion, but on the noblest dictates of reason. Our author plainly shows the deformities of our present system, the hideous weakness and failure of it, its corruption, its tyranny, its piercing agonies of strife. We may not agree with all his proposed methods, but he appeals only to reason. He uses argument, and not prejudice. It is a candid statement of the case. The republic for which he aims is certainly that which should rejoice the heart of every man. It is the free and universal Republic of Humanity, where the bosom of the earth is made bountiful, and its fruits are justly distributed, and the power which enforces law is the happiness of all.

I hav read this book two or three times, and feel that I hav wasted no moment. I hav been extremely benefited. I like the ideas. I like the way in which they are put. I hav received information, and that is much to say of any book. The author has written from his own personal experience. His knowledge is not book knowledge but world knowledge. It is that which comes from actual contact with things in themselvs. It is the result of one's own life; it is not the reflex of another's thought.

I am glad that one who has fought so bravely, and won so well, who has displayed such intellectual resources and sound judgment, once a hard-working youth, now a capitalist, with all that wealth can giv, has not, amid prosperity and honor, forgotten the ardent dreams of his early manhood. Too often the battle of life makes one hard, selfish, unsympathetic, cold, and unanswering to the terrific sufferings of the world. Too often the sentiments of generosity, of justice, of benevolence, vanish in the clouds of many a mighty struggle, and only the strong arm, the determined brain, survive. In this case it is different. In this book we hav the glory of youth still—the hopes, the dreams, the unselfish thoughts, the beautiful humanities, the noble feelings, the poetic joy, the rapture which crowns to-day's work with the radiant paradise of to-morrow.

Every lover of his race, every thinker, every political student, every reformer, everyone who desires some illumination, some help, in the solution of the mighty problems of human destiny, should read this earnest and thoughtful book. It may not answer every question, nor make the way perfectly clear to this world's paradise; but its lofty purpose, its riches of experience, its candid reasoning and excellence of spirit, will be a noble stimulation, and will certainly giv us a better understanding of the possibilities of human advancement. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The object of this work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then to trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning. It contains quotations from nearly all the sacred books of heathen nations, and from other rare and valuable works which are not accessible to people in general. The chapters are so arranged that it is a perfect cyclopedia of reference. Years of research would be necessary to discover all the information it contains. It is a most searching investigation into the origin of Christianity. Every fact is verified by copious notes and authorities, so that it may be trusted as a thoroughly reliable work. It contains information which will be startling to many.

Poetry.

On an Old Song.

Little snatch of ancient song,
What has made thee liv so long?
Flying on thy wings of rhyme
Lightly down the depths of time,
Telling nothing strange or rare;
Scarce a thought or image there,
Nothing but the old, old tale
Of a hapless lover's wail;
Offspring of some idle hour,
Whence has come thy lasting power?
By what turn of rhythm or phrase,
By what subtle, careless grace,
Can thy music charm our ears
After full three hundred years?

Little song, since thou wert born
In the Reformation morn,
How much of great has passed away,
Shattered or by slow decay!
Stately piles in ruins crumbled,
Lordly houses lost or humbled,
Thrones and realms in darkness hurled,
Noble flags forever furled,
Wisest schemes of statesmen spun,
Time has seen them, one by one,
Like the leaves of autumn fall—
A little song outlived them all.

There were mighty scholars then
With the slow, laborious pen
Piling up their words of learning,
Men of solid, deep discerning,
Widely famous as they taught
Systems of connected thought,
Destined for all future ages;
Now the cobweb binds their pages;
All unread their volumes lie
Moldering so peaceably,
Coffined thoughts of coffined men;
Never more to stir again
In the passion and the strife,
In the fleeting forms of life;
All their force and meaning gone
As the streams of thought flow on.

Art thou weary, little song,
Flying through the world so long?
Canst thou on thy fairy pinions
Cleave the future's dark dominions,
And with music soft and clear
Charm the yet unfashioned ear,
Mingling with the things unborn
When perchance another morn
Great as that which gave thee birth
Dawns upon the changing earth?
It may be so, for all around,
With a heavy, crashing sound,
Like the ice of polar seas
Melting in the summer breeze,
Signs of change are gathering fast,
Nations breaking with their past.

The pulse of thought is beating quicker,
The lamp of faith begins to flicker,
The ancient reverence decays
With forms and types of other days;
And old beliefs grow faint and few
As knowledge molds the world anew,
And scatters far and wide the seeds
Of other hopes and other creeds;
And all in vain we seek to trace
The fortunes of the coming race,
Some with fear and some with hope,
None can cast its horoscope,
Vaporous lamp or rising star,
Many a light is seen afar,
And dim, shapeless figures loom
All around us in the gloom—
Forces that may rise and reign
As the old ideals wane.

Landmarks of the human mind
One by one are left behind,
And a subtle change is wrought
In the mold and cast of thought,
Modes of reasoning pass away,
Types of beauty lose their sway,
Creeds and causes that hav made
Many noble lives, must fade;
And the words that thrilled of old
Now seem nueless, dead, and cold;
Fancy's rainbow tints are flying,
Thoughts, like men, are slowly dying;
All things perish, and the strongest
Often do not last the longest;
The stately ship is seen no more,
The fragil skiff attains the shore;
And while the great and wise decay,
And all their trophies pass away,
Some sudden thought, some careless rhyme
Still floats above the wrecks of time.

—W. E. H. Leckey.

JOHN W. WASHBURN, a Baptist minister, has just fled to Canada from Lowell, Mass., to escape prosecution. He was sent from that city by the Home Missionary Society to be educated for the ministry at Waterville, Me. There he was detected in the robbery of a Catholic church and expelled. He married a Maine lady, and was subsequently married in Vermont. He was sent to prison for bigamy, duped the prison officials by his piety, and secured a pardon. He then went West, married a third wife, induced her to transfer her bank account to him, brought her to Lowell and deserted her, taking all her money. Mrs Washburn No. 3 was sent back to her Western home by her friends. With his crimes known in Lowell, the bigamist had the presumption to apply for the pastorate of the Worthen street Baptist church, and actually duped another to accept his pastoral services. His career was exposed to the church, and Washburn fled.

Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grand Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, prepaid, for $1, or either one for 25 cents.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for, and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

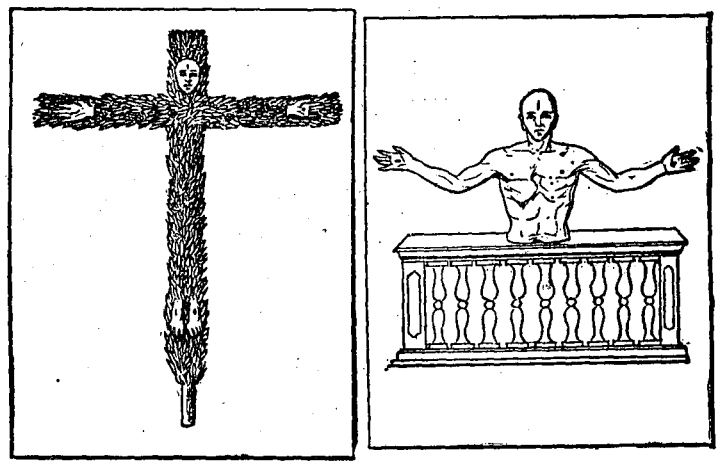
THIRD EDITION.

BIBLE MYTHS,



AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

"The volume, 'Bible Myths, and their Parallels in Other Religions,' is clearly the result of years of patient and plodding research made over a vast field of reading. The aim of the book is to show not only that nothing of the miraculous which is to be found in the Old Testament can be considered of Hebrew origin, but also that nothing of the same sort which is to be found in the New Testament can be considered of Christian origin. The author, by an overwhelming amount of evidence, proves his point. We cannot see how his positions are to be gainsaid. It is useless, in the light thrown upon the matter throughout the pages of this book, to argue that the Bible must be of special divine origin because of its contents, for here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. If the existence of such and such things in the Bible is to be accepted as proof that the Bible is of special divine origin, then the existence of the like things in other ancient books of the world must be accepted as proof that they also are of special divine origin. If not, why not? Like effects must everywhere, and at all times, come from like causes. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."—Boston Commonwealth.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent Biblical students that the Hebrew Scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly attempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification. The work is the result of a vast amount of intelligent and indefatigable research, and cannot be overlooked by any one engaged in theological study; since it is of too much acumen and authority to be ignored, even by those who most strenuously oppose the conclusions at which the author arrives."—Boston Courier.

A BEAUTIFUL HOUSE FOR $1200

* * * This marvelous house has been built more than 200 times from our plans; it is so well planned that it affords ample room even for a large family. 1st floor shown above; on 2d floor are 4 bed rooms and in attic 2 more. Plenty of Closets. The whole warmed by one chimney. Large illustrations and full description of the above as well as of 39 other houses, ranging in cost from $400 up to $6,500, may be found in "SHOPPELL'S MODERN LOW-COST HOUSES," a large quarto pamphlet, showing also how to select sites, get loans, &c. Sent postpaid on receipt of 50c. Stamps taken, or send $1 bill and we will return the change. Address, BUILDING PLAN ASSOCIATION, (Mention this Paper.) 24 Beekman St., (Box 2702,) N. Y.

A SHORT LESSON IN HISTORY.

A double-page picture contrasting science and theology, showing how the one has labored for human advancement, and how the other has always opposed it. The German-American thus describes it in detail:

The palmy days of the church witness the burning at the stake of Bruno, the pope and priests witnessing the burning of the heretic with expressions of joy. Galileo is represented sitting in his study, the pope holding the sword of inquisition over his head, and to save his life being forced to recant his philosophy. Martin Luther is represented tacking up his "Right of Private Judgment." Behind him stands the pope with the bull of excommunication drawn, and beside him the headsman's block and ax of infallibility. In their study are Morse and Stephenson applying their inventions to practical tests, and in the rear of them the Presbyterian pulpits are filled by two of the broadcloth gentlemen denouncing the inventions as "Thwarting the will of God," and branding these men and their inventions as "Heralds of Antichrist." Ingersoll stands on a platform apparently delivering his lecture "Which Way?" which he holds in his hand. Talmage approaches the platform at the colonel's back, pulling after him, by the arm, the chief of police, who holds in his hand the warrant of arrest for blasphemy. The colonel seems to take no notice of the spleeny, cadaverous form ascending the platform at his rear. Then come the modern teachers of salvation, the Salvation Army, with their drums, bones, tambourines, and streamers, (and screamers, too), also a fac simile of our crazy army. A group of likenesses of the teachers of science, Haeckel, Humboldt, Darwin, Tyndall, and Huxley, is also shown. The likenesses throughout are remarkably correct. As a pictorial history the caricatures contain volumes.

Price, six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents; twenty-five copies for $1; one hundred copies for $3. We wish that the friends of Freethought would distribute thousands of these telling pictures.

THE MODERN BALAAM.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 12. No. 38. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, September 19, 1885. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

In Newport slang a misfit wife is one who has found herself so mismated that she has had to part from her husband. They no longer speak of grass-widows or divorced persons, but always of misfits. There are a great many misfit wives and husbands in fashionable society.

The Boston Transcript says: "Dr. Herrick Johnson asks in the Homiletic Review, 'Is the power of the pulpit declining?' We hav no hesitation in saying, No. The power of the pulpit consists in accepting such things, for instance, as calls for wider fields of usefulness with incidental increase of salary, donation parties, etc."

A torpedo-boat of new invention is being constructed at Fort Lafayette, New York Harbor, which, it is claimed, can pierce the armor of any ship in the world, pull out with a retrograde movement, and retreat under water with marvelous speed. It carries a turret from which 500 pounds of dynamite can be projected with accuracy half a mile.

The New York Sun of the 8th inst. says: "If last Sunday's sermon can be a fair ground for estimate, we should say that if the Rev. John P. Newman were the historian of General Grant he would giv no more truthful a representation of the man than Jared Sparks did of Washington. Grant never swore, but there was no maudlin nonsense about him."

A St. Petersburg paper says that Russian girls are learning trades in order to make their own living. The women's industrial schools are overcrowded. The girls learn bookbinding, typesetting, shoemaking, bookkeeping, making of toys and artificial flowers, wood carving, and painting. Schools, libraries, women and children hospitals, and many private offices are now superintended by women.

The Poughkeepsie Eagle is sponsor of this: "One day last week a son of Benson J. Lossing, the historian, was riding on a mowing machine on his father's farm. In the left pocket of his overshirt was a hickory stick about four inches in length, three inches wide, and an inch thick. As he was riding along a rifle ball shot by some one struck the stick and embedded itself in it. The boy does not know from which direction the ball came nor who shot it. If the stick had not been in his pocket he would hav been instantly killed. As it was he was not injured at all." We think the Eagle must hav obtained its information from Lossing himself.

Dr. Isaac M. Atwood says in the Christian Leader: "In the interest of peace, as well as of scholarship, we suggest that Dr. Osgood, of Rochester, and Dr. Briggs, of Princeton, be suppressed. Dr. Briggs has attacked the revision of the Old Testament. Dr. Osgood, one of the revisers, attacks Dr. Briggs's attack. Then Dr. Briggs returns to the conflict, and besides damaging the revision badly, reduces to pulp the pretentious mass of Dr. Osgood's Hebrew and Greek. What will the ignorant and unlearned think of the authenticity of a text certified by scholars who can convict each other of more blunders than they make sentences?"

A German divine has created no little stir in Fatherland by a work which he has published on "The State of Belief and Morality among the Peasantry." In the N. Evangel. Kirchg. the work is reviewed by another theological professor, who admits that what the author says regarding the declining authority of the clergy is literally true, not of Thuringia only—where, it seems, the author belongs—but of Germany generally. The reviewer attributes the religious apathy which prevails to the connection which is maintained between church and state. So long, he says, as the state holds on to the church, supports and rules it, it will be difficult to lead the people in general to understand the difference between church and state, between prince and people. Until this distinction can be drawn by the popular mind he has little hope of a genuin religious revival. The state, he admits, is gradually breaking away from the church.

The Southern Bivouac tells this story of the late war: At a certain battle a Federal chaplain happened to get into the vicinity of a battery of artillery which was hotly engaged. The Confederate shells were plowing furrows about the guns, and the cannoneers were grimly and activly at work to answer shot for shot. The chaplain addressed himself to a sergeant, who was very efficient, but at the same time rather profane, in the following words: "My friend, if you go on this way can you expect the support of divine providence?" "Ain't expectin' it," said the sergeant; "the Ninth New Jersey has been ordered to support this battery."

"Russia is building a strategic railway to the Austrian frontier." You know what a strategic railway is, don't you? Buys its right of ways from the farmers for an annual pass, then gets all land condemned and takes up the passes, then gets a state grant of two or three counties for the directors, buys its iron on long time and pays for its grading with construction bonds, then issues equipment bonds to pay for rolling stock, borrows all the money in the country on the mortgages, calls in everything outstanding and exchanges it for a deficit, changes its name from the "North and South Air Line" to the "East and West Short Line," divides the swag with the directors, and runs the road with the deficit. It may be new in Russia, but it's an old thing with us. Country's just full of strategic railways.—Brooklyn Eagle.

In Prince George county, Va., a protracted meeting was brought to a close last week under curious circumstances. One of the members of the church had been followed there by a pet dog, which, after reaching the place of worship, went up behind the pulpit desk and began munching the sacramental bread. One of the ministers kicked the dog, which caused its owner to become indignant, and he left the church. His son walked up to the pulpit and had some words with the minister. The minister told the young man if he did not like what he had done he could make the most of it. The meeting, which had been begun with a view of keeping it up for several days, was brought to a close at the suggestion of one of the ministers, who said that the devil had gotten into the dog and the people, and he reckoned he had gotten into the preachers as well.

A dispatch from Middletown, N. Y., says that when "Capt." Jennie Wilson-Moore, of the Salvation Army, who is now in jail in Elizabeth, N. J., charged with bigamy, was in command of a corps of the army in that village a few months ago, the interest in her preaching which one or two well-known Middletown business men displayed was food for considerable gossip. It has now leaked out that after her arrest in New Jersey she wrote to parties here that unless they furnished means by which she could procure legal aid in her trouble she would make a further confession. The result has been that a syndicate of Middletown business men has engaged a noted New York criminal lawyer to take charge of Capt. Wilson-Moore's case. It is rumored that the sequel of the matter is likely to be the placing of a number of divorce cases on the calendar of the Orange county court.

It seems, observes the Sun, that even celestial beings can harbor rancorous feelings. Several most estimable persons, including not a few well-known and deservedly respected clergymen, hav fallen at loggerheads over the question of employing members of religious sisterhoods as nurses in the London hospitals. Anglican Sisters hav been introduced into several of these establishments, and hav been pronounced ministering angels by the majority of the medical officers and all the patients; but perfect harmony exists only in heaven, of course, and the inevitable malcontent and his backers hav rushed into print with denunciations of the proselytizing tendency of these nurses. The general public are less interested in the point at issue than they are to see deans, minor canons, rectors, and others, whose little hands were never made to tear each other's eyes, forget the fact, and most ferociously fall out and fight.

"If Paul had not invented heathen Christianity, the idea would never hav occurred to later ages that Jewish Christianity was anything else than a religion of law peculiar to the Jewish nation, containing intensified Messianic expectation and with a definit reference of those expectations to the person of a prophet who was not acknowledged while he lived and met with a violent death. Neither Jesus nor the first church advanced in religious principles beyond Judaism; the new principle of the universal religion of salvation originated with the Apostle Paul."—Hartmann.

The Indianapolis Journal reports that a "widow woman" over in Centralia, Ill., has been turned out of the church on a charge of "offensiv Christianity," preferred against her by a young lady member. The offense, the widow declares, consisted in her having mentioned that a former pastor was accustomed to salute the young lady in question with a kiss when circumstances made it convenient. She believes that there is nothing in this to justify being turned out of church, and proposes to contest by suing the minister for $10,000 who assisted in bouncing her. The pastor who has been sued has fled to Europe. What has become of the pastor who administered the kisses is not known, nor is it material. It is sufficient to know that he is still on deck somewhere.

A decision of great importance to workingmen in New Jersey has just been rendered by Judge McDermott. It defines the rights of workingmen under the Mechanics' Lien law. Joseph Wilson made a contract with Norris H. Geile to build a house. One of the conditions was that Geile should not receive his first payment until the building was roofed in. Martin Schultz was one of three journeymen carpenters employed by Contractor Geile. When $38.75 was due Schultz he gave formal notice to Wilson, in accordance with the Mechanics' Lien law, to withhold from Geile $38.75 and pay it to him. Wilson refused to do so. Schultz then brought suit against Geile, and got judgment for the full amount. This judgment was obtained on August 13th. In the mean time Geile made an assignment of his contract to R. P. Francis & Son, of Hoboken, signing a full release to Wilson from all claims in connection with the building. Schultz and the other journeymen who had brought suit, being unable to collect their judgments against Geile, brought suit against Wilson. Judge McDermott decided in their favor for the full amount and costs. In the decision the judge said: "A contractor cannot surrender a claim to money earned and thereby defeat recovery by a claimant under the Mechanics' Lien law."

Side by side with the spread of Sunday baseball playing in this country, we learn, says the Sun, that Sunday cricket is steadily growing more common in England. According to the last number of the Court Journal, "Sunday cricket is spreading from Leicester, and is now practiced in many places, the rectors thereof seeing no harm in it. Near royal Windsor it is in full force on Sundays." Leicestershire is one of the great counties for fox-hunting, and consequently it is full of vigorous and activ young men who would rather be running and jumping than sitting still. But such has been the case for hundreds of years, and yet the English Sunday there has had full observance of its recognized sanctity up to the present day. The rise of Sunday cricket cannot be attributed simply to physical restlessness. Windsor is the seat of royalty, and the queen is known to be particularly careful regarding the observance of all state or religious ceremonies; nevertheless, the Sunday in the neighborhood of the royal castle has ceased to be the day that it was at the beginning of her reign. Besides, the famous public school of Eton is near Windsor, and it is to be supposed that the masters of that institution would use every means to stop the playing of cricket on Sunday anywhere near the school precincts. Yet it is played there, and the practice is said to be growing elsewhere. There does not seem to be much difference between an established church, as in England, and a church that it is not established, as in this country.

News of the Week.

Rev. Father McDowell, pastor of St. Agnes church, N. Y., is investigating the case of the striking silk-weavers. This will be unendingly cited as an instance by those who claim the church to be the prime mover in labor reform and chief friend of the workingman.

As the outcome of the Afghan quarrel, Russia is now many hundred miles nearer Herat and the Indian frontier, and England has lost very nearly all she claimed. A large portion of the English violently denounce the peace policy of their government.

In England a stupidly worded—or else an adroitly worded—section of the Franchise act is likely to reduce the number of new voters from the expected two millions and a half to about a million in the coming election. Laborers hav gained little by the new law.

Mr. Parnell is enraged over the recent frequent occurrence of agrarian outrages in Ireland and the widespread publicity that has been given to them. He is chagrined at the inability of his lieutenants to prevent disturbances at this time, when he has good reasons for wanting Ireland represented as tranquil, and he is indignant at the avidity with which every petty quarrel is seized upon and telegraphed far and wide for effect upon the general election.

At the convention of Massachusetts Prohibitionists on the 10th, there were adopted resolutions which declare in favor of female suffrage, urge the compulsory introduction of temperance text-books in the public schools, denounce the murder of Chinese, deprecate hostility between workingmen and employers and advise arbitration, and declare that civil-service reform can best be secured by the overthrow of the great corrupting power which centers in saloons.

Five year-old Wallis Narf, of Dubois, Pa., mourned constantly for a little deceased sister, and repeatedly declared that he wanted to go to heaven to see her. His mother tried to comfort him by telling him that if he was good he would see his little sister when he died. Then he asked his mother if he was good enough then to go to heaven if he should die. She assured him that he was. Soon afterward he went upstairs and shot himself through the heart with his father's revolver.

Throughout the proceedings, in London, in the case of the Crown against Mr. Stead and others for abducting Eliza Armstrong, the popular sympathy for the Armstrongs has been exhibited in a marked degree. The police hav been barely able to prevent the mob from doing violence to Mr. Stead. The extracts from the Pall Mall Gazette which were read in court were hissed by the spectators, and the policemen present did little or nothing to prevent this demonstration. In fact, throughout the proceedings the police hav shown a vindictiv spirit in revenge for the onslaught made upon them by the Pall Mall Gazette, and, beyond preventing actual bloodshed, they hav gone to no trouble to repress insults to the defendants.

The Prohibitionists of New York state held their convention on the 8th. Delegate Shipman, of N. Y. city, bewailed the apathy of ministers toward the Prohibition movement, saying: "They havn't got their eyes open yet. They need the light more than any other class of men. As for me, I will stand by the home I love; I will stand by the Bible I love, and I will stand by the flag I love, until the motto of Prohibition is penciled in shining characters on the blue vault of heaven." J. W. Bruce created a sensation by violently arraigning the church and the ministry. A delegate sprang to his feet and charged him with unjustly assailing the holiest institutions on earth. "The church is the stronghold of prohibitionism," he said. "It is not," answered a chorus of voices. "Let him speak," roared a delegate. Confusion ensued, and the discussion was finally closed by the chairman's calling for a hymn.

The American Secular Union:

ITS NECESSITY, AND THE JUSTICE OF ITS DEMANDS.

III.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished, and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

It is not, in this instance, the Bible or religious services per se to which we object, but the introduction of either into schools and other institutions that belong to the nation. The Bible contains much that is good, but we are not allowed to make a selection. Moreover, even were a selection made, there is hardly anything in the book about which all would agree. Hence, it becomes a volume for private reading, according to choice, and not for schools, where children are to be found whose parents are of every shade of religious belief and of no religious belief. If religious services are to be held in national places, and supported by national means, why should not services of an opposit character be conducted under the same circumstances? What sound objection could be urged against Colonel Ingersoll delivering one of his famous lectures, or some other advocate of Freethought expounding the principles of Agnosticism or the fallacies of Christianity, and, having done so, to receive pay for such services? This would, of course, be immediately and most strenuously objected to. Yet it is difficult to see upon what ground, save as an act of injustice. If the use of the Bible is to be permitted in national schools, why not the writings of celebrated Freethinkers? One class of books has surely as good a right to be recognized as another. The fact is, we protest against the introduction of any sectarian books, however large the sect and however extensivly patronized, and the holding of any sectarian services, be they for or against religion. These are matters in which perfect freedom should be allowed to all. We do not ask for toleration, for that implies a right upon the part of some one to be intolerant. We ask freedom, fair play, impartiality, and no favor. We desire, in fact—and it is rather curious that the request should hav to be made by us—to be done unto as our opponents would hav us do to them, were the circumstances reversed. They should not object to this rule; it is one they profess to adhere to, and one of which they boast considerably. Men who are truly liberal should unhesitatingly approve this demand, it being the very genius of freedom. Our motto is:

> Bound to no party, to no creed confined,
> The world our home, our brothers all mankind;
> Do good, love truth, be just and fair withal,
> Exalt the right, though every ism fall.

5. We demand that the appointment by the president of the United States, or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts, shall wholly cease.

Religious fasts and festivals may be considered unobjectionable so far as concerns their practice by those who believe in them, and so far we offer no opposition. But when they are made a national obligation we hav a perfect right to enter our protest against them, because in that case the country is committed, in form at least, to their religious significance, and this is nothing short of intolerance. Suppose we, as Secularists, were in a majority, what would be thought of us if we were to set apart special days for any Freethought purpose, and demand that the religious part of the people should join us in any idea of keeping such days? An act of this kind would be, on our part, deemed intolerant in the extreme; and it would be so without a doubt. It is absurd to urge that these especial fasts and festivals hav any real meaning to the great mass of the people—even to those who are theoretically believers in the Christian religion; while to the honest Freethinkers they are nothing less than a downright insult. Great numbers of persons, who would be horrified at being designated Freethinkers, simply look upon such "sacred" days as opportunities for a little extra indulgence in dissipation and very questionable practices. Saloons and churches reap the benefit, and debauchery bears off the palm against religious exercises. The mass of men in this country are not religious in the sense that the Christian understands the term. They are what in England are called nothingarians. True, they sometimes talk in glowing terms about the benefits of religion, the advantages of Christianity, and the beauties of the Bible; but practically they know very little of either of the three. They seldom open their alleged sacred book, and if they did, they would, in all probability, fail to understand many of its curiously-worded phrases. It is said that a teacher in a Sunday-school on one occasion asked a young pupil the meaning of the words, "Quench not the spirit," to which the young hopeful replied, "Papa says it means don't put any water into it." And, no doubt, many adult Bible readers in the church would be incapable of giving a better interpretation. Now, to impose upon the country set days for religious purposes furnishes an extra opportunity for additional spirituous—not spiritual—indulgences, and tends, therefore, to promote immorality in a large degree, while, on the other hand, it is a source of oppression to the conscientious unbeliever in theological dogmas. Thus, as a matter of justice, we desire this anomaly to cease. "Let justice be done, though the heavens should fall," is a motto that we often hear in the mouths of our opponents; we ask them, for once, to put it into practice. As Shakspere has it:

> Poise the cause in justice's equal scales,
> Whose beam stands sure, whose rightful cause prevails.

6. We demand that the judicial oaths in the courts, and in all other departments of the governments, shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation, under the pains and penalties of perjury, shall be established in its stead.

It cannot for a moment be doubted that an oath can hav no binding effect on persons who do not believe in the deity sworn by, or who, with that belief, disregard this particular cult, the relic of a barbarous age and an untutored people. It will not be denied that men who believe in God and in the penalties theology provides in the hereafter for lying, do occasionally swear falsely. What they fear far more than hell is a prosecution for perjury, because the one is remote and the other near at hand. The oath is no guarantee against falsehood, as the columns of the newspapers amply testify. And that it is a source of injustice to the unbeliever few men will hav the temerity to question. Is a Freethinker to be outlawed because he refuses to swear by a deity of whom he professes to know nothing, and on a book in which he has no special belief? Surely such a course of procedure is the very mockery of justice. If a skeptic take the oath for form's sake, he is denounced as a coward who has not the courage of his opinions, or a man to whom conscientious conviction is a trifle light as air, and who cannot be sincere in the views which he professes to hold. And if, on the other hand, he refuses to be sworn, he frequently thereby sacrifices his rights as a citizen. Such a state of things is a disgrace in a civilized country and ought to be swept away.

It has been shown over and over again that the oath is no safeguard of truth. That there may be a few weak-minded persons who may attach some kind of significance to swearing, just as they do to any other form of superstition, is quite possible; but these are too unimportant to be allowed to interfere with a principle of justice. Some time ago I was amused in reading of a child who was telling her companion a somewhat improbable story in a graveyard. "Are you sure of it?" asked the listener. "Yes, indeed," said the story-teller, with an injured air; "you don't think I would tell a falsehood in a cemetery, do you?" But we know there are people—and the number is not small—who would not scruple in telling a falsehood in a cemetery, At all events, a man who has no respect for the truth will violate it anywhere, if fear of the consequences—in this world, I mean, for he will take his chance of any other—be not sufficient to deter him. A man who will sacrifice truth in every-day life will do the same on oath, unless he fear a prosecution for perjury—a safeguard we do not propose to abolish. How the defenders of oaths can consider themselvs followers of him whose emphatic command was "Swear not at all," and who said, "Let your yea be yea and your nay nay, for whatsoever is more than this cometh of evil," I cannot understand. Surely to swear is not to let your yea be yea, and nothing more; but the foolish sentence, "Yes, so help me God," is added; and the addition must, therefore, upon Christian principles, "come of evil." In this matter the members of the American Secular Union are better Christians than the church-goers themselvs.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

We do not object to a day of rest; our objection is against a day being set apart and enforced by law for religious observance. We hav no more right to be compelled to keep Sunday than we hav to be forced to attend church or chapel. To the great majority of people here, as in the old country, Sunday is simply a holiday—a day untrammeled by the cares and anxieties of business employment—a day for enjoyment and rest from the arduous duties of every-day toil. This day is the worker's own, to deal with as he pleases. Of course, the Sabbatarian maintains that the Sabbath was of divine appointment, and therefore the observance of it ought to be enforced upon all persons in a Christian land. But to this I reply: First. If so, it was Saturday, and not Sunday, that was divinely appointed to be kept, and that, therefore, the whole of the Christians, with the exception of a few—such as the Seventh-Day Baptists—violate this divine law every week. The ablest scholars on the Christian side admit that they hav no sufficient divine authority for changing the day. Now, suppose the Jews were in a majority in the government, and they should pass a law from their standpoint enforcing the "observance" of Sunday according to their view, what would Christians think of such an act of tyranny? We venture to say that on all hands such an act would be denounced as an oppression that was not for one moment to be permitted. The Christian public would be up in arms, and such an outcry would be raised as was never before heard against unprecedented despotism. Then comes a learned rabbi, who would expound the Old Testament law, and demand to know how Christians, who recognize that law as of divine authority, could find any just cause of complaint. His argument, so far, would be unanswerable. It would be useless to tell them that the day had been changed, for his religion admits of no such change; and, moreover, he would be able to show that the most learned men among the Christians themselvs had conceded that the Christian scriptures contained no record whatever of the appointment of a new Sabbath day. The Saturday, says he, is the day that we and our fathers hav always kept, and you must observe it too. The profaners of this day are threatened with divine displeasure by prophets whose inspiration you yourselvs admit, and we desire to avert those judgments from the American people, and are acting, therefore, as becomes good citizens and lovers of our country and of humanity at large. Now, we say, let Christians take this argument to heart, and for once act on their golden rule of doing to others as they would desire others to act toward them. Secondly. The Sabbath of the Bible was merely a day of rest, not of worship. Here, again, the original purpose of the day is lost sight of by those who make the loudest pretensions to keep it. With what grace and consistency can a Christian minister preach a rest-day on Sunday, when he himself does the heaviest and hardest part of his labors on that very day—labors for which he receives almost his entire income. Of course, his reply will be that the work in which he is engaged is a work of necessity. But that is a matter of opinion, for Secularists certainly do not regard it as such. Besides, even if it were so, the Mosaic law made no provision for such labor, and hence he is violating the commandment which forms the foundation of all his Sabbatarian superstructure. Thirdly. And this is the most important part of the argument from our point of view—we, who accept neither the law of Moses nor that of the New Dispensation, hav no right to be saddled with the obligations of either the one or the other. We prefer to exercise our right, and choose our own method of spending Sunday. We fail to see any "divine" authority bearing on the question, and therefore no such law can be binding on us. Our opponents are among the class described in "Hudibras," who

> Prove their doctrins orthodox
> By apostolic blows and knocks.

And to this method we object, however mild the blows and however weak the knocks may be. It is an attempt at persecution, worthy only of the times when the church was triumphant, and ought not to be, and will not be, tolerated in an age of thought and mental freedom. The battle is begun, and we mean to fight till victory crowns our efforts, believing with Byron:

> Who would be free themselvs must strike the blow.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

To some persons this demand will appear, on the face of it, rather startling, since so many people confound Christian morality with every sort of virtue, in the absence of which only vice can prevail, that we seem to them to be asking for the whole moral fabric of society to be loosened by removing its only foundation. This, however, is a great mistake. Christian ethics are not universal ethics; and, therefore, however good they may be, they can only be accepted as far as they are included in a much wider and broader scheme. It would be foreign to my present purpose to go into an elaborate exposition of ethical codes. Suffice it by saying that our moral system is known by the term Utilitarianism, its fundamental principle being "the greatest happiness for the greatest number." Such acts as conduce to this end we call moral, and such as do not we term immoral. Here is a clear and definit distinction between vice and virtue which all men can understand. The system is as broad as humanity, and of an application commensurate with the race itself. Now, Christian virtues, as they are called, although often good, are not so because they are Christian, but because they are included in, and inculcated by, this wider system of a humanitarian character. The goodness of any religion, and its applicability to life, must be decided by natural law. This is to remove morality from the region of speculation and authority into that of practice and freedom, to take it out of the field of controversy and disputed questions into that of universal agreement and nature. Hence all the real virtues of Christianity will be included in the Utilitarian scheme; and the rest, those of a fictitious character, will be dismissed as obsolete, or, at all events, as having no binding value upon mankind at large. It will hardly be disputed that some of the acts to which Christians attach the greatest importance as moral duties are simply ceremonial, and partake of rite or ceremony. In the Decalog itself, among a few good precepts, there is one which can in no sort of sense be called moral—the keeping of the Sabbath. Yet this is read every Sunday in churches as part of the moral law. Sabbath observance is nothing more than a ceremonial practice, and is far from carrying with it ethical conduct, as the history of Scotland proves. Here is a nation of strict Sabbatarians, but they are not supremely prominent as a moral people. Then, again, we object to the narrow and one-sided system of so-called Christian morality. To say the least of it, it is sectarian in the very highest degree. The Bible is not allowed to tell its own tale without note or comment. Even that would be narrow, excluding, as it would, those who did not accept the divine authority of the volume; but the ground is made much narrower than this. The Mormon discovers polygamy in the Biblical moral code, and it would be very difficult to show that he is wrong by a just and fair interpretation of the book. But Christians themselvs declare that he shall not follow his own interpretation of a record the divine authority of which they both agree to accept. Now, what we desire is to abrogate all laws enforcing any Christian morality upon the ground that it is Christian. We demand a general scheme to be adopted, about which there can be no mistake, because such a scheme would be for the good of all. We say with Pope:

> For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight,
> His can't be wrong whose life is in the right;
> In faith and hope the world will disagree,
> But all mankind concurs in charity.

The Missionary and the Heathen.

The misrepresentation of nations by foreigners is one of the proverbial injustices extant. If you were an enemy of England, there is nothing you would enjoy more than the observations of a French wit upon the grossness of John Bull and the canting tendencies of his Pecksniffian race. No one could discourse more thoroughly on French vanity and lax morals in Paris than a pseudo-moralist of Cockneydom. Berlin and Paris hav heartily abused each other for the last fifteen years, and the recriminations of London and St. Petersburg promis a rich repast for at least the next fifteen to all lovers of the malicious.

National vanity, opposition of interests and the consequent jealousies, the natural maliciousness of the average man, and the pronenesss of both nations and individuals to constitute oneself the center of the world and its guide of conduct, are the most fruitful causes of this curiosity in the literature of international reporting. Community of language and customs, instead of being a palliativ, seems only to add bitterness to the mutual jealousy of fallen-out brothers, and when two peoples can understand each other better, they are all the more assiduous in the fond work of minute fault-finding. Ever since America became a nation, the Anglo-American spite has done more to increase the cynicism of the reading public than all the other national jealousies and antipathies put together. Budding English Radicals make a six weeks' tour of the United States and return home "forever cured of republicanism," as the phrase goes, and settle down to make money by beer-brewing and similar pursuits, with a strengthened conviction that a numerous royal family with patent vices and large pensions are the surest guarantee of political morals; while Yankee travelers, bent on acquiring knowledge, get disgusted with all things in England because it makes no specialty of clams! And despite the martyr-like efforts of certain members of American cultureocracy to make things smooth, their self-sacrificing offers to bedeck their brows with the dust of John Bull's feet for the sake of peace, the misunderstandings are on the increase rather than otherwise.

Religion, however—religion as it is understood at the present time—is, as has been often observed of late, the greatest power in creating discord between man and man. And the more a religion insists upon its followers binding themselvs to an exacting God, the better it succeeds in snapping the ties of human sympathy and fellowship. The Jehovah of the Christian has been the cause of more bloodshed and bad blood between his children than all the devils, incarnate and imaginary, human and infernal. That the feeling of brotherhood of man is a necessary sequence of the idea of fatherhood of God is only a figment of the brain, and the very reverse of the fact. Apart from the common experience that brothers are not always the very model of mutual lovingness, men hav never quarreled so bitterly with one another as when filled with the love of God. And what Jehovah began has been left to his trusted servants, the ministers and missionaries, to elaborate and continue. Would you like to hate and despise the fellow-man you hav never seen? Read but the loving accounts given of the far-away heathen by your benevolent and large-hearted missionaries!

Woe to the nation that has enough life in it to resist the quack ministrations of those itinerant soul cobblers known as missionaries! For, over and above the theological spite, is there not enough to fill the evangelist's heart with gall to overflowing in the consciousness that his livelihood depends upon this questionable industry of the evangel, and that the peculiarities of his apprenticeship hav rendered him unfit for anything else, save, perhaps, the spinning of cheap yarns, and usurping other such thankless vocations of the proverbial old woman?

And how shall we pity that wretchedest of all peoples who, while treading on the corns of the evangelist, refuse to hail as benefactor his traveling companion and confederate, the rifle-bearing mercenary of "Christian" civilization, the emissary of the "interests" of commerce and monopoly? Woe, thrice woe, to a nation who, like the Hindoos of the present day, receive with a shrug the intrinsic and supernatural claims of the religion of the Bible, while they stand aghast before the unscrupulous greed and reckless injustice of a Christian rule, over whose enormities the servant of God, the bearer of the cross, is dumb! Is such a nation worthy of life, either in this world or the next? Alas, wretches, doubly doomed!

In the annals of injustices of man to man there is not one more flagrant, more heartless, than the treatment of the Hindoo at the hands of his self-constituted benefactors. Both the Christian government and the Christian mission in India hav been compelled more than once, by the force of circumstances, to make a case upon the flimsiest grounds, both are under the necessity of getting up a plea for very existence, and so truth has been regarded as no object, and humanity but a scarecrow.

Few are unacquainted with Æsop's story of the lion and the painter, in which is told how a painter depicted an encounter between a lion and himself by placing the lion prostrate under his human foe; whereupon it has been suggested by the moralist that the lion, if he know the art of painting, would giv a very different representation. The fact is that the heathen, up to this time, has been voiceless in the field of international vilification. All the talk of the world is, at the present day, monopolized by a few Western people, notoriously the Christian portion of the English and American, and those whose reputation is at their mercy hav to fare very hard indeed. No doubt the whirligig of time will change situations, as it has heretofore done, if not exactly turn the tables, and the heathen will be heard from in due course.

The dying exclamation of the Eastern monarch, "Oh, save me from my friends!" might very appropriately be put in the mouth of the modern Hindoo, who is absolutely dumb in the presence of the colossal injustices of the Christian pretenders of benevolence. What between the drastic pills of a Christian rule, and the frantic attempts of the missionary to cram down his throat a most indigestible medley of grossness and absurdity, in which, under the name of gospel, the eternal verities are set at naught, truth is haltered, and cruelty idealized, well may he again cry with his ancestors of yore that the whole world is an illusion, and nothing is real in life but pain. He gasps for breath, he cries for mercy, and his "friends" call him a blackguard, and in the glow of philanthropy fail to perceive how ungenerous it is to kick a dead dog.

Taking, as among the qualifications of a judge of foreign manners, customs, and ideas a susceptibility to impressions, an openness to ideas, a disposition to learn, and a genuin sympathy with human failings and misfortunes, the missionary can show to his credit absolutely nil, while his debit side is full of large items of false knowledge, cultivated conceit, and an arrogance which is truly divine, inasmuch as it puts Jehovah to shame. The missionaries belong to the genus "hebetudinous," for I take it that term, though not found in the dictionary, implies something awfully awful, queerly queer. They start with a fib in their heads and a padlock on their hearts, with a trunkful of the whole truth revealed, and a haze that everything else is wretched; their brains are perverted and their hearts are stale.

If, on my return to India, I were to describe the Americans as a nation of Spiritualists, freelovers, and polygamists, who preach slavery and practice Mammonism as the gospel of salvation, I should not be guilty of a hundredth fraction of the injustice done to the Hindoo in the current conceptions about his people assiduously spread and fostered by interested parties. The servant of Christ, the possessor of the last word of God, is asked by the heathen why he must accept the Bible as the word of God, and he answers, "Because it is written by the Holy Ghost." "What makes you believe it is written by the Holy Ghost?" "Because it is the word of God." Even the heathen school-boy laughs at reasonings like this from big, mustached men, and the mortified lover of truth reports to his mission at home upon the hopeless obduracy of the Hindoo heart, the horrors of idolatry and caste, the burning of widows, and the degradation of women, for the billionth time.

There was a time when I used to think that the foreign missions should be given some little credit; that, while perfectly off scent in insisting on teaching the heathen just exactly what no people either wanted or needs to learn, incidentally and unconsciously they were the means of dropping now and then a gem or two from the unknown treasures of the West, thus exciting his curiosity and setting him to work on the new mine of modern secular knowledge. For, as a matter of fact, once the sharp Hindoo has learned the alphabet of Western science, nothing can now prevent him from being near the very front door of modern thought, and Englishmen and missionaries may leave India for good, but the tree of modern learning has been planted in the East never to die. The Hindoo will surrender everything considered valuable by other peoples, aye, the very conditions of life itself, but never the conditions of thought so long as he livs, for thought, not faith, is the way of salvation in his creed. I hav, however, since changed my view. For though in the history of English education in India one or two of the most prominent actors that took the initiativ were missionaries, notably Alexander Duff, of the Scottish Free Church, their conduct was influenced more by their own personal good sense and large-heartedness than the policy of their missions, which hav all the time placed the greatest confidence for the regeneration of the heathen in the phantasmal workings of the Holy Ghost. Further, English education was organized into a system in India through the alacrity and avidity with which the hungry heathens fell upon the pabulum furnished by the University Publishing House, after being dosed almost to death with devil stories and fish stories offered by the Tract Society and the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge. The hearty co-operation of intelligent and public-spirited Hindoos with the English government has made it possible that all over India, at a hundred colleges and numberless high schools, young heathens are to-day learning the latest things in the field of knowledge and thought, free from the slightest taint of theology, pagan or Christian, to the great discomfiture of the missionaries, who never dreamed it would come to all that, aye, in the course of a quarter of a century. There are missions in China, but no modern education there. Something other than the Holy Ghost has had to do with it in India.

But what has led me specially to wish the missionaries divested of all credit in the matter is that, first, they never meant it, and secondly, their heartless vilification of Hindoo character and institutions, because of failing to make any headway with the gospel, is a proof that from their peculiar education they are incapable of true charity and human sympathy. Unwilling as the Hindoos are to accept this so-called gospel, no people are more considerate of the opinions and beliefs of others. It is a part of their creed to honor the religion of others as much as their own, all being, as they regard, but branches of the same tree of speculation. Nowhere can a proselyte hav such an agreeable audience, though nowhere is it harder to make converts; and, taking into account the handsome pecuniary compensations which the missionaries generally receive for producing the barrenest results, an Indian mission is, in vulgar phrase, one of the softest snaps one could desire.

Of course, it goes without saying that the methods of spreading a crooked gospel are necessarily crooked. As God could not hav lighted upon a scheme of salvation more difficult of acceptance, the missionaries could not, by any possibility, adopt a surer means of failure than is their wont. They start by telling the heathen that his beliefs are superstitious and his morality baseless and false, and they end by offering a story more absurd than absurdity itself, and a scheme in which morality forms the least perceptible thread.

In fact, the ways and means of the chosen of God would make one think that they trusted for success to anything else but their faith. It is a well-known fact that the handful of converts made in India during a century and over were recruited in large proportions in times of famin, and the tangible gift of rice and soup had more to do with the change of hearts than the imperceptible manipulations of the Holy Ghost. The few converts of education and talent, whose number can be counted on one's fingers, were almost all young men of poor parentage, who had ambitions to gratify and were given the means to do so at the date of their conversion. As might be expected, these distinguished converts hav been famous in all other fields but that of the service of God. They are known among their countrymen not for their degree of Christian piety or proselytizing zeal, but as being eminent in literature, science, or public life.

Bribes, coaxings, and even deceptions are among the means not unoften employed to make the heathen love the unlovable Jehovah. A young widow of the writer's acquaintance was decoyed from her home under a promis of marriage, another convert personating the would-be husband. It was not until she had been baptized that she knew herself to hav been the victim of a hoax, and the arms of the Brahma Samaj (the Theistic society of India) saved her from suicide. It were superfluous to state that in most of the missions a reward in filthy lucre is attached to every spiritual conquest into the ranks of the elect. As this paper has already drawn out long, I will reserve the story of how I myself escaped being caught in the spectral embrace of the Holy Ghost for a future occasion.

The New York State Convention.

The first Freethinker registered at the Delavan as an attendant at the coming Convention was C. B. Reynolds, who had left his Tent in the hands of Mr. Tilney and journeyed to Albany. Following him were S. P. Putnam and the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. After that they came so thick that we could not keep count. When the Convention opened, at 10:30 Friday morning, there were about two hundred present, among whom we recognized the following: T. B. Wakeman, New York; Elizur Wright, Boston; Horace Seaver, of the Boston Investigator; Lucy N. Colman, Syracuse; Amy Post, Rochester; Joseph McDonough; James Parton, Newburyport, Mass.; Courtlandt Palmer, New York; Robert Wade and wife, Troy; Lucius C. West, Kalamazoo, Mich.; A. Schell, Albany; Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Reynolds, Rochester; D. A. Blodgett, Grand Rapids; E. B. Foote, Sr., and E. B. Foote, Jr., New York; George Hartley, Massachusetts; Ernest Mendum, Boston, and W. S. Bell, Chicago.

In the absence of Dr. Brown, the Convention was called to order by S. P. Putnam, who was on motion made temporary chairman. Mrs. C. B. Reynolds was chosen temporary secretary. The only business on hand was the appointment of committees on business and nominations of officers and resolutions. Mr. Putnam was asked to name them, which he did as follows:

On business and nominations.—C. B. Reynolds, chairman; DeWitt C. Griswold, of Auburn; Hiram Wilbur, Green Island; George Hartley, Turner's Falls; E. M. Macdonald, New York.

On resolutions.—Courtlandt Palmer, New York; Helen H. Gardener, St. Louis; Robert Wade, Troy; John E. Remsburg, Atchison, Kan.; T. B. Wakeman, New York.

After music by Holding's orchestra, Mr. J. J. McCabe, president of the Albany Secular Society, addressed the assemblage, bidding them welcome to his city. Mr. McCabe was once a Catholic. Now he is the most energetic and hardest-working Freethinker in Albany. In conjunction with C. H. Luck, Joseph McDonough, Mrs. Iliohan, and Mr. Williams, he keeps the fires of Liberalism brightly shining in the city of law. Mr. McCabe is a witty speaker, well read, and gave the Convention a good speech which we shall take the earliest opportunity to print.

Following Mr. McCabe was C. B. Reynolds, who told the people what the New York State Freethinkers' Association was endeavoring to secure. As he put it, our aims are:

"First: Securing equal rights and liberty to all, regardless of religious faith, or the lack of it; the total separation of church and state, and the repeal of any and every law that infringes the rights of conscience, or favors any practices in the name of religion, or aught else that interferes with private rights or the public welfare.

"Second: Advancement in all that pertains to truth, science, and sociability."

Mr. Reynolds made one of the best speeches of his life, and deservedly secured the heartiest approbation of the Liberals present. Among other good things he said:

"How to most effectivly diffuse the light of truth, and impart knowledge of the laws of our being; how to select and perfect the best social conditions, are the problems to be solved. Our only consistent course is a constant aggressiv activity in bringing the facts before the people. This can only be effected by a thorough system of judicious distribution of Liberal and scientific literature. United, earnest, persistent efforts must be made to reach the people by the same agencies so effectivly used by the Christians. Hence the duty of organization in every school district in the state and the patient, persistent efforts of each and every Liberal, first to wake friends and neighbors to the justice of the demands of Secularism, and then to supply them with such reading matter as will best effect that purpose. Perhaps some can do but little, but if each and every one will do that little, a wondrous victory is assured. Supernatural authority is fast losing its hold. Many things which both church and Bible hav declared to be right, the best part of the Christians will now admit to be wrong. Our Christian friends tell us of the superiority of faith over works, meaning that belief in the dogmas of the church takes precedence over the works of benevolence, kindness, and love. Secularists hold that acts of kindness, goodness, and benevolence greatly outrank faith; that it matters less what a man believes than what he does. In the language of the noble D. M. Bennett, founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER: 'It is a consolation to know that acts of kindness and love produce the same happy results, whether performed by those of much or little faith, Christian or Infidel.' What most weakens the claim to supernatural authority is the fact that the most honest and devout are not agreed as to what the Bible does teach. We would giv all credit to the church for their endeavors to inculcate morality. But unfortunately they insist on wrong motivs for right doing. Christianity is a system of rewards and punishments. 'Do good for the sake of the bribe, or fear of the punishment.' Secularism teaches: 'Do right from love of right,' and would hav all act from principle, cultivating love of justice, instead of selfishness. We would teach children that to lead lives of love, benevolence, and truth—spreading lightness and joy around them, making an Eden paradise of love of their own homes and neighborhood—was the grand purpose of life; not to glorify an imaginary God and be regardless of duty to humanity, hoping only for a mythical fairy-land in an ideal heaven, in an uncertain future. Christians ask us, 'What incentiv to morality would exist if you take away Christianity, faith in Jesus, hope in heaven?' To those whose highest interest is centered in their own miserable selvs, who care only for their individual comfort and prosperity, the sacrifices made by the Secularist to spread the glorious truths of the gospel of humanity seem, doubtless, very foolish. Such creatures need bribes to do right. A work of art may thrill the sensitiv soul with rapture. Some would find greater delight in gnawing a pig's foot. A hog prefers a pail of swill to the most beautiful painting or a book of most exquisit poetry. Those educated in selfishness need promises of special blessings here on earth and of fairy homes in heaven to induce them to care for, much more diligently seek for, truth. Such persons do good only in hope of reward—as a school-boy studies his lesson, not for the sake of knowledge, but to obtain the prize. The Secularist regards truth as priceless, loves justice, seeks to reform errors of life as well as errors of faith, and, desiring to promote the happiness of his fellow-creatures, will make great sacrifices to spread the glorious gospel of humanity. Because reveling in the delights of freedom, he desires all should be set free. Secularism declares the chief end of man to be to promote human goodness, and thus secure human happiness. Instead of going through the world with sad faces, sighs, and mournings, we should strive to fill the hearts of all around us with gladness, until we in our turn rejoice. Keep the heart pure and it will overflow with sweet melodies of love. Secularism desires to educate, refine, establish the purest, closest brotherhood; it seeks to gain for all equal rights, and since justice is the one grand aim and guiding star of all true Secularists, the New York Freethinkers' Association will work with all the power and determination of honest hearts devoted to a noble purpose, nor rest till we secure the Nine Demands of Liberalism."

Friday afternoon the committee on business and nominations reported the following ticket:

President: T. B. Wakeman, of New York.

Recording Secretary: Mrs. Frank C. Reynolds, of North Parma.

Corresponding Secretary: J. J. McCabe, of Albany.

Treasurer: E. M. Macdonald, of New York.

Executiv Committee: S. P. Putnam, New York; C. B. Reynolds, Rochester; Dr. A. Robinson, Cape Vincent; John Peck, Naples; A. C. Macdonald, New York; Clement Austin, Rochester; Amy Post, Rochester; C. Houghton, Batavia.

These officers were unanimously elected. A vice-president for each county was also elected, the list being substantially the same as last year.

At the conclusion of this business Joseph McDonough, of Albany, dwelt upon the modifications perpetually going on in the Christian beliefs, and how the history of those modifications showed the fallacy of the assumption that Christianity was a divine revelation; for if it were a divine revelation, it would hav been true when revealed, and would hav been in accord with truth for all ages. Theologians still maintain the infallibility of their various and variable doctrins, which are modified day by day as their absurdities become evident to the obtuse believers.

His address, which was liberally punctuated with hearty applause, was followed by one from Elizur Wright. The title of Mr. Wright's lecture was, "A Waste of Energy; or, Great Cry and Little Wool." It was about the revision of the Bible, and the following are some of the points he made:

"That the ecclesiastical committees in Europe and America, who hav been employed for a number of years in producing a revised edition of the Old and New Testaments, embody a large amount of trained intellectual force cannot be denied; they are doubtless naturally good and strong men whose minds hav been warped by bad training. Supposing there exists in or behind the universe a supreme personal intelligence, by whom these Testaments were originally given as a revelation of his rights and our duties to him and other persons, the revision at this late day was not only a waste of energy and precious time, but a presumptuous if not a blasphemous folly. It intimated that the divine author undertook what he was incompetent to perform, that the book as a revelation was a failure. It only revealed the maker quarreling with his own work. It belittled the infinit. Supposing the Bible simply a human production, like the Iliad of Homer or the plays of Shakspere, manifestly it needs revision more than either of those works—weeding out much that is tedious, pueril, immoral, and unreasonable from what is wise, good, and beautiful. And especially it needs so revising that no statement of an important fact in one place shall be flatly contradicted in another. But hardly a word of correction in this respect has been made, no light has been added, no absurdity has been retracted, no example or justification of tyranny or cruelty has been expunged. 'Hell' has been changed to 'sheol' or 'hades' in many places, but in at least two it is left as it was. Its locality, whether geographical, geological, or astronomical, is as doubtful as ever. In the revised text, men still liv more than nine hundred years before they die. Noah, at the age of nine hundred years, embarks in a three-story barn, four hundred and fifty feet long, seventy-five feet wide, and forty-five feet high, and takes with him his wife (who must hav been at least one hundred years old), his three sons and their wives, a pair of every species of unclean beasts on earth, and seven pairs of the clean, to say nothing of fowls and creeping things—six healthy persons, besides the old folks, to take care of a menagerie many times larger than Barnum's, for a rather tempestuous voyage of more than forty days and forty nights. What a time they must hav had with the creeping things! Shade of Munchausen, what a credibility it must take to swallow it—even as an allegory!

"The revision of the Bible so as to giv it the exact sense of its various discordant writers, if it could possibly be done, was not worth doing. It required more than human inspiration to do it, and intelligent men hav ceased to believe in inspiration, or the special inspiration claimed by the revisers. Many parts of the book are not fit to be read in schools or public assemblies. It is worth having in libraries as one of a series of writings reaching back almost to the invention of alphabets, and which, though by no means strictly historical, illustrates early history, and the way in which traditions, crude and distorted, were made to answer some of the purposes of history. The Bible poetry is still more precious and valuable, for some of it is among the grandest ever produced, because in the upward struggle of the human mind the imagination always goes foremost. The bad morals and senseless miracles, though placed in a barbarous fashion among the best maxims, unless made a part of juvenil education, as so much divine inspiration, need not corrupt the young. The barbarous origin of the book being known, the wisdom it contains will be prized by force of contrast. Its worst faults are condoned by the most religiously orthodox, because they assume that the creator of the universe was its author—assume it in spite of his setting in that book the worst possible example for moral beings to follow. As a purely human book, the revisers hav left the Bible almost precisely as they found it. It is not damaged by making it appear better than it was, except in a very few matters of literary taste. I appeal to all thinking men and women, and especially to the revisers themselvs, whether, considering the pressing wants of mankind for more knowledge of the nature of things, more justice, more kindness, and less strife of classes, this is not a waste of mental energy, scholarship, and inventiv faculty? Would not the invention of an improved soap or a better washing machine do more for the happiness of the average family than the whole of this Bible revision will ever do, seeing that its chief improvement is the substitution of the phrase 'man-child' for that by which the Hebrews distinguished between the sexes?

"We are asked by those whose palpable interest it is to check the progress of Freethought and keep mankind the dupes of an absurd religious theory, 'If you set aside the Bible and its divine inspiration, what will you put in its place?' This question, addressed to the unthinking, is by far their strongest plea. It comes too late. The Bible, as an authoritativ and infallible guide of human conduct—and in no other sense is it proposed to displace it—has already been set aside. Science, witty inventions, and better books, to say nothing of the dissensions of its advocates and interpreters, practically did it more than fifty years ago. Salvation Armies cannot replace it. Millions of money may restore the outside of the volume in every hotel, rail car, steamer, and log-cabin, but not much awe of it. There is in its place more knowledge of the universe; more reverence for its order, movements, and laws; more worship of the infinit beauty of its endless revolving and prospectiv life, than the Bible ever revealed or produced, and better rules for the conduct of human beings than were ever condensed into commandments by the imaginary God, who ordered Abraham to make burnt sacrifices of Isaac, and Moses to kill the worshipers of the golden calf. There is beginning and perceptibly advancing in this life a better salvation than that invented for the unknowable next, by the ingenious and fanatical Paul, out of the costly ritual of the Jewish priesthood and the mythical sufferings and resurrection of the Man of Nazareth. Were this not so, no revision of King James's text would hav been attempted. It indicates the expiring throes of priesthood and sovereign powers in this world. The time has come for every sane human being to be his or her own priest; the time for all priests to make themselvs as useful as possible to other people; the time for humanity to take the place of religion, and all religions to accord—what Protestant Christians never did—the right of private judgment; for men to be never enemies, but brothers. Freethought, free trade, self-government, universal co-operation—working inversely, as the square of the distance, to be sure—justice, and human kindness are the destiny of the future; and instead of destroying social organization and introducing universal brigandage, will finally make the cosmopolitan state itself better without a church than the Christian, or any other church, has ever been."

Friday evening the Convention was held in Bleecker Hall, between five hundred and six hundred people being present. Miss Wixon, who had been expected to precede Mr. Wakeman, sent a letter of regret at her enforced absence. Her place was taken by Augusta Cooper Bristol, who recited her poem, "Baucis and Philemon." Mr. Wakeman's inaugural address was upon "The Outlook of Liberalism." Mr. Wakeman dwelt at some length upon the work already accomplished by the Liberal association, and went on to develop its future work as he would hav it. The first task, he said, should be that of organization. The work of Freethinkers must no longer be of a destructiv character. It must rather be constructiv. It should be its aim to organize to secure liberty, to advance science beyond mere public school education, and to form a social union whereby the masses might enjoy intellectual intercourse. In considering the necessity for such organization he referred to the Freedom of Worship bill, claiming that the introduction of such a measure into the legislature called for vigorous action from all friends of Freethought. Protestants, he said, opposed the measure, not from considerations of public welfare, but rather to keep the appropriations for religious purposes wholly to themselvs. Let us help them to defeat the bill, he said, but let us also organize and make ourselvs felt, so that we may add to the Protestant petitions for the protection and perpetuation of the separation of church and state the word completion, thus making them read for the protection, perpetuation, and completion of the separation of church and state. The necessity for the addition would appear from the following statistics obtained in New York. There was, he said, a population there of over a million, only 375,000 of which were church-goers, yet the great majority was taxed to support the few church people. The Protestants, while they object to the claims of the Roman Catholics to introduce their services into the prisons of the state, cannot see the injustice of taxing non-believers for the support of their religious neighbors. They seem to be possessed with the same sentiments as the Romans of old, who considered everybody outside of their city to be barbarians, who had no rights. They would say to us Liberals, "You are children of hell; what is the use of your complaining?" They tell us we are bound to go to hell, and as they do not know where that place is situated, they try to fix it for us right here upon earth. We shall never get any justice from these people until we wring it from them. And how, he asked, can we do this? It is by opening to men a world where knowledge instead of mystery will rule. We cannot find a more propitious time, and a better field, than the present, and our own state of New York. Let us organize, then, from the present time, and strive to accomplish the great work.

No abstract or summary can do justice to Mr. Wakeman's effort. The speech should be issued as a campaign document for use this fall in connection with the urging of our memorial upon the legislature.

Saturday morning the lower part of the Opera House was comfortably filled with people desirous of hearing Courtlandt Palmer discourse on "The Aristocracy of Freethought." We hav only room for a very brief and inadequate synopsis of this paper—which occupied an hour and a half in delivery—but later on we hope to present it entire to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"'There is but one society on earth—the noble living and the noble dead'—Wordsworth.

"With a sneer imprinted on the lip and disdain written in the eye, the remark has not unfrequently been made to me that no gentleman could remain a gentleman and at the same time associate himself with Freethinkers, those 'long-haired men and short-haired women' (as they are pleased to characterize us), those Infidel cranks and blatant blasphemers, those disturbers of society and assailants against decency, those destroyers of religion and morality. We are all familiar enough with these delectable affronts, but the charges, contemptible, though they may be, are quite sufficient to set one thinking. It is, therefore, not surprising that in response to them I found myself inquiring, Are we reformers all a set of groundlings because we are Liberals? Am I myself a loafer and a churl because I appear at Freethought Conventions? And in revolving the question, I was led more particularly into the analysis of what a gentleman intrinsically is; what his evolution; what the lower and the higher type of him. The term 'gentleman,' though in the common acceptation taken, and quite properly taken, as signifying a combination of gentleness with manliness, seems to hav been originally derived from the Latin words gens and homo, meaning a member of the Roman gens or tribe. This is seen more clearly in the French synonym gentilhomme. Such a one in those old Roman days was n bilis, as distinguished from ignobilis—i. e., nobly instead of ignobly born, a distinction at first corresponding to that of patrician and plebeian. 'Good birth,' said Aristotle, 'is ancient, that is, long inherited wealth and virtue,' and an old writer remarks, 'Gentlemen be those whom their blood and race doth make able and known.' Thus throughout most of the past ages the appellation has been principally associated in the mind with relationship to aristocracy and nobility; and an anonymous writer provides me with this definition of nobility: 'Nobility is that distinction of rank in civil society raising a man above the condition of the mass of the people. Society has a tendency to inequality of condition arising from the natural inequality, physical, moral, and intellectual, of those who compose it. This inequality is apt to increase. The son, inheriting the faculties of his father, is more favorably situated than his father was for making use of them, and hence in almost every nation, in even early stages of civilization, we find something like a hereditary nobility.' What hav we of the United States to reply to this, we who hav asserted as fundamental the dictum of our Declaration of Independence that 'all men are created equal,' we who, regarding democracy as the noblest consummation of time, hav ostensibly repudiated aristocracy in all its forms? Are aristocracy and exclusivness prerequisits to gentility? Is gentility inconsistent with freedom and democracy? These questions, be it confessed, seem to bring us face to face with a profound dilemma. We must, as good citizens, regard our federated republic and our doctrin of human equality as the fruition of civilization, and yet, look where we will, in high life or in low, under despotism or democracy, we see some form of aristocracy—i. e., of inequality—existing. In the animal kingdom, the survival of the fittest is for them their patent of supremacy and domination. The victorious rooster becomes the cock of the walk. The big fishes devour the small ones and reign as the tyrants of the deep. I hav even seen a pet poodle whose canine lordship was the power behind the throne that was stronger than the throne. He was the practical potentate of the family, to whose dogged comfort all considerations had to yield. To the devotees of the prize-ring John L. Sullivan is the true gentleman. During the past the gentleman has been mostly associated in the mind with the aristocracy. Is aristocracy then a prerequisit to gentility? Certain it is that in all grades of life and civilization some form of aristocracy exists. Even the boss in the ward meeting is in his way an aristocrat. The leaders lead. How reconcile this with our American doctrin that all men are created equal? The only way to reconcile aristocracy with democracy is through an aristocracy or leadership of capacity and devotion. Such leadership accords also with the most gracious courtesy. The knight under chivalry was the unfoldment of the religious, political, military, social, and moral influences of his time. But his age was one of superstition and ignorance. The modern knight and gentleman must cultivate the virtues while eliminating the defects of his medieval model.

"First. As to creed, he must take truth for authority instead of authority for truth.

"Second. As to country, he must uphold the equal rights of all.

"Third. As to industry, he must insist on the rights of the many as against the privileges of the few.

"Fourth. As to womanhood, he must agree with Herbert Spencer that 'equity recognizes no distinction of sex.'

"Fifth. As to social intercourse, he must seek to abolish pretension and base sociality, not on fashion, but on culture.

"The aristocracy of birth brought art, dignity, and ease of manners. The aristocracy of commerce brought keenness, thrift, and self-reliance. The aristocracy of religion brought the spirit of devotion, self-sacrifice, and holiness. All these qualities must be conserved in the ideal gentleman of the nineteenth century. Otherwise there can be no aristocracy consistent with democracy; otherwise French Revolutions endlessly."

Mr. Watts arrived Friday night, and was upon the platform during Mr. Palmer's address. At its close, loud calls were made for him. He responded briefly, saying that he had but recently returned from England, where he had seen the two greatest impediments to human progress in that country, the bishop of the Church of England and the House of Lords. Freethought had made much advancement, and, with such champions as Charles Bradlaugh, would make still further inroads. As for himself, he was willing to renew in this country once more the battle against the superstitions of priestcraft and the dominance of theology, and invited all to come and hear him in the evening.

Saturday afternoon about five hundred of the chairs in Bleecker Hall had occupants. Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, for seven years president of the Association, opened the proceedings. A part of his address was as follows:

"Radicals, Liberals, and Friends: How to liv and improve is the question. What shall we do to improve our bodies and minds? It is by knowledge, and its application to our needs, we hav become free from the fictions and false claims of religion. We should make plain our just positions as Secularists. In doing this we but put in practice what our superstitious friends do for their faith in religion. One results in our immediate freedom and secular culture, the other looks for rewards supposed to be given us beyond the clouds. Present health and happiness are of more worth than all the speculations of religion. To know how to preserve every organ of the body until use and time actually wear them out, is a duty no one can trust to faith or belief and expect returns. It is our knowledge of things with which we daily meet that controls our successful resistance. To tell the truth and liv it, is better than all theory and speculation. To know how to possess and protect a home, in which all secular goodness can be present to each member of the family, is above all claims of musical happiness in any other world. In faith or belief we find no bread, clothing, or money to pay taxes. The good things of this life never come by prayer, praise, or preaching, except to the priests and preachers. They enjoy this life, at home, just like Infidels and other worldly persons. They must breathe pure air, eat the best food, drink proper drinks, and in everything be moral and wise like the teachers of physiology and science, or they the sooner die of disease and crime. Time or law does not favor them with any good thing not resulting from knowledge or labor.

"The farmer, the tradesman, the printer, the mechanic, the physician, like all other producers, are the persons who help most to make life worth living. Sanitary science and hygiene is of more consequence to humanity than all the religions in the universe. There is not faith or belief enough anywhere to cure poverty and disease. Our existence and its continuance depend upon law and education. Our healthy childhood depends upon healthy and wise parents living in a temperate climate. To be taught how to use and keep sound all parts of the body is the protection from evil we most need. There are no friends or enemies to meet us after death! Nothing but decay, if we are not cremated. All our enemies are here in this life. They hav imposed burdens upon us in the name of Gods, Christs, spirits, saints, and devils. We are here to clear our children from unjust religious demands. We hav been slaves to the church dictators long enough. To think and do for ourselvs just as we are willing they should, is our present object and right. We publish papers, pay lecturers, and circulate our books, with the idea of obeying law and promoting order and peace. We hav no sword but reason, and no guide but knowledge. Independent action, based upon what we know of men and things, keeps us free from the influence of evil testimony, and useless hopes of anything better than the common sense of this, the only world worth living in or laboring for. We are lessening the fears and follies imposed upon us by the religious impostors, who are still, in this age of knowledge and reason, trying to hold their impious and deceptiv positions. What does a priest or a preacher know of a God more than the child he deceives by the Bible phrase, 'Believe or be damned?' Nothing whatever! When you or I say we believe, we really acknowledge we do not know. When we do know, then we do not believe, for we lose our belief when we gain knowledge. This is the good work we are engaged in. No good man or good woman outside of the clerical profession will oppose us. They know it frees their children from the superstition and slavery of the church. We, in every way possible, aid people in thinking and laboring for themselvs. Infidels and radicals hav more to encourage them in this worthy work than at any former period. Christians hav revised their own Bible until their hell has become a 'sheol,' like a half-way place between here and the nowhere; a place wherein all that is left of us after death slowly unites with the gases as a drop of water with the ocean. By this analytical knowledge, even heaven fades into a nowhere—like the gods, devils, and spooks of the priestly past. We are above such clerical teachings, walking in the light of demonstrable truths established by scientific investigations. We are not ashamed of our progress, like the preacher or the priest, who dares not meet us in a fair discussion or scientific prayer test, like the one Professor Tyndall proposed to the Christian public. We work and teach while they preach and pray. We stand erect and laugh. They are upon their knees hopelessly in tears. When they rise to their feet, they spend much of their time calling us bad, because we are not as hopeless and miserable as they are. The children of the clergy are sometimes worse than we are in their honest efforts to show up the follies of religion, or we could never hav had our noble and generous Ingersoll, to whom we and the clergy owe so much. Col. Robert G. Ingersoll has done more to save the clergy from their own errors and false claims than any other man. We would do better if we would follow his advice. He says, 'We cannot be too radical.' . . . To know how to liv and enjoy the most of this life, without the promises of corrupt religious teachers, is a progress humanity has found economical, developing, self-sustaining, favoring private judgment, intellectual individuality, and that liberty of conscience and education which increases our freedom and constitutional independence. We desire to be free Americans, independent of all myths, religious creeds, spooks, or pulpit gymnastics, and false promises of happiness or misery."

Following Dr. Brown came Mrs. Krekel. The subject of her lecture was, "The Nine Demands of Liberalism." The lecture was one of the best of the Convention, and should be printed for campaign purposes. It will appear in our columns at the earliest practicable moment.

In the evening about six hundred people gathered at Bleecker Hall to hear Charles Watts. Before the lecture Mr. Wakeman stated that he had a little business to which he wished to call the attention of the Convention. Mr. C. B. Reynolds had been engaged all summer in activ propagandist work. He had visited many towns with his Tent, had delivered several scores of lectures, and distributed thousands of copies of Freethought tracts and papers. Mr. Reynolds had received no compensation for his zealous and self-sacrificing efforts, and was, indeed, money out of pocket. He proposed, therefore, that the Convention raise a purse for Mr. Reynolds of $100. No further words were needed, and within fifteen minutes $124 were in the crown of Mr. Putnam's high white hat, to be transferred to Mr. Reynolds's pocket when his duties as doorkeeper should allow him opportunity to claim them.

Mr. Watts then took the floor. His subject was, "Our Policy: Destructiv and Constructiv." It is an unfortunate fact, he said, in connection with the development of human thought, that new truths are frequently shunned, and that theological opinions are, as a rule, estimated more by their popularity than by their intrinsic value. The result has been the perpetuation of old ideas and creeds rather than the fostering of the discoveries of modern thought. Secularism seeks to remove from our midst all creeds and dogmas that obstruct freedom of thought. So long as a mind-degrading theology seeks to rob man of this freedom, so long as it threatens him with the curse of God for striving to realize the nobility of man, so long will it be our duty to labor to remove these obstacles which hav for ages impeded the progress of the world.

Thus it is that Secularism, while enunciating positiv principles, is compelled at times to engage in a determined warfare, not one of fire and blood, it is true, but demanding moral courage and endurance far nobler and rarer than mere physical courage. In our destructiv work, he said, we make no attack upon the truth in Christianity, neither do we condemn the useful in religion. We seek only to destroy the errors and the false conceptions which hav become associated with Christian theology. The speaker then went on to enumerate certain claims of Christian theology, to which he would make objection, and said it should be the object of the destructiv policy of Liberalism to displace them. It should be the object of our constructiv policy to inculcate in their places such dogmas as these:

I. That the true guide in human actions is reason assisted by experience.

II. That supreme attention should be given to the facts and duties of existence, regardless of any considerations of a life beyond the present.

III. That science is a more trustworthy provider for man than relying for help from supernatural power.

By inculcating such principles as these we assist in making life a reality instead of a superficial existence. As Secularists, we wish each and all so to liv that when we are no more the world will hav no cause to reproach our memories. We counsel all so to act that when life's mission is over those who were bound to us by the natural ties of affection shall delight in the recollection of their association with us. If this be done, then, even if the present state be the end of all, we shall not hav lived in vain, but the world shall be the better for the part we hav played therein.

Mr. Watts's lecture is in pamphlet form, and can be obtained from this office for ten cents.

Sunday the Convention used the Opera House all day. In the morning, after music by Holding's orchestra, Mr. Putnam read a letter from Mr. G. N. Hill, of Boston, expressing regret for the writer's in-

The Philosophy of "Revivals."

Now that the camp-meeting season is over, and the harvest of religiously insane has been gathered into the churches, it is an opportune time to inquire into the pathology of "conversion," that the people may know just what ails the converts. In 1882, Dr. David W. Yandell, professor of surgery in the university of Louisville, contributed to the Popular Science Monthly a scientific paper on old-time revivals, most of them in Kentucky, some in New England. The paper is not only interesting, but instructiv enough to reprint. It ought to be circulated down South, wherever Sam Jones has turned the people crazy:

Extraordinary interest was excited in the popular mind of Kentucky, at an early day, by a form of convulsiv disease, which, though it had been witnessed elsewhere in the world, had never before assumed a shape so decidedly epidemic. Among the Camisards, or French prophets, who appeared in the mountains of the Cevennes toward the close of the seventeenth century, the subjects, when about to receive the gift of prophecy, were often affected with trembling and fell down in swoons. When the fit came, no matter where they were, they fell, smiting their breasts with their hands, crying for mercy, and imprecating curses on the pope. They were finally, after an obstinate struggle, put down by their insane persecutor, Louis XIV.

Epidemic convulsions prevailed in Scotland half a century later. Multitudes, under pungent preaching, were violently agitated, uttering loud cries, shaking, trembling, bleeding at the nose, the minister promoting the uproar by urging them not to stifle their convictions. The shriek or the shout, it is stated, never rose from one but that others joined the outcry. The early career of John Wesley is well-known to hav been marked by similar disorders. In his journal he records numerous instances of men and women dropping to the ground under his preaching "as if struck by lightning," ten or a dozen praying at once. They had also prevailed extensivly in New Zealand half a century before they became epidemic in Kentucky. The elder Edwards has left an instructiv account of the bodily agitations which accompanied the revivals of religion from 1735–'42. Many instances are given of fainting, falling, trance-numbness, outcries, and convulsions, and he relates that some of the subjects lost their reason. The epidemic of Kentucky spread more widely, and persisted for a longer time, as well as in more extravagant forms. It continued to reappear for several years, and involved a district of country extending from Ohio to the mountains of Tennessee, and even into the old settlements in the Carolinas. Lorenzo Dow relates that at a religious meeting in the court house of Knoxville, when the governor of Tennessee was present, he saw one hundred and fifty people "jerking" at one time. But at other places the frenzy reached a greater hight. It was computed that, at a religious meeting in Kentucky, not less than three thousand persons fell in convulsions to the ground.

The extraordinary religious excitement in which these nervous disorders took their rise commenced in Logan county, Ky., under the preaching of Rev. James McGready, described as a man of "hideous visage and thunder-tones," with a highly impassioned style of eloquence. The excitement abated soon, but was renewed in a more intense form three years later, and continued to grow and deepen until it reached its hight about the year 1800. Its effects were described by this fiery preacher as at that time "exceeding everything his eyes had ever beheld upon earth." Families came in wagons forty, fifty, and one hundred miles to attend the meetings, and it became necessary to establish camps for their accommodation. These camp-meetings generally continued four days, from Friday to Tuesday morning, but sometimes they lasted a week. One succeeded another in rapid succession, and thus the fervor of religious feeling was kept up. The woods and paths leading to the camp-ground seemed alive with people. "The laborer," says Dr. Davidson, in the work just quoted, "quitted his task; age snatched his crutch; youth forgot his pastimes; the plow was left in the furrow; the deer enjoyed a respit upon the mountains; business of all kinds was suspended; dwelling-houses were deserted; whole neighborhoods were emptied; bold hunters, and sober matrons, young men, maidens, and little children flocked to the common center of attraction; every difficulty was surmounted, every risk ventured to be present at the camp-meeting."

The concourse became immense. At one of these assemblages the attendance was computed at twenty thousand souls. And here were united all the elements best suited to stir the emotional nature of man, and to derange his nervous system. The spectacle at night, as Dr. Davidson depicts it, was one of the wildest grandeur. With great beauty of description he says: "The glare of the camp-fires, falling on a dense assemblage of heads simultaneously bowed in prayer, and reflected back from long ranges of tents upon every side; hundreds of candles and lamps suspended among the trees, together with numerous torches flashing to and fro, throwing an uncertain light upon the tremulous foliage; the solemn chanting of hymns swelling and falling on the night winds; the impassioned exhortations, the earnest prayers, the sobs, shrieks, or shouts, bursting from persons under intense agitation of mind; the sudden spasm which seized upon scores, and unexpectedly dashed them to the ground—all conspired not only to invest the scene with terrible interest, but to work up the feelings to the highest pitch of excitement." To these circumstances, that tended so powerfully to excite the nervous centers, we hav to add others which gave intensity to their effect. The meetings were protracted to a late hour in the night, keeping the feelings long upon the stretch. A reverent and general enthusiasm ascribed the bodily agitations to a mysterious, divine agency. The preaching was fervid and impassioned in the extreme. Many of the preachers, unable to control their emotions during the sermon, went around in "a singing ecstasy," shouting and shaking hands with others as much excited as themselvs. In this way everything was done to "heap fuel on the fire," and it was at such meetings that thousands fell in convulsions to the ground.

Some of the actors in these strange scenes hav left records of the state of their minds, which show that they were in a condition bordering on insanity, if not actually insane. One of them relates that while under conviction on account of his sins, he went about the woods for two years, through rain and snow, "roaring, howling, praying day and night." And when light and hope broke in at last upon his mind, which he describes as a "rushing, mighty wind, that descended from heaven, and filled his whole being," he went shouting over the encampment all night and a great part of the next day. He continues: "I now made the mountains, woods, and canebrakes ring louder with my shouts and praises than I once did with my howling cries; I never fell on my knees in secret but the Lord poured out his power, so that I shouted out aloud. Sometimes I shouted for two or three hours, and even fainted under the hand of the Lord. I was ready to cry out the name of Jesus. The brightness of heaven rested continually upon my soul, so that I was often prevented from sleeping, eating, reading, writing, or preaching. I would sing a song, or exhort a few minutes, and the fire would break out among the people. I hav spent nine nights out of ten (beside my day meetings, and long, hard rides) with the slain of the Lord."

Granade is the preacher who givs this description of himself, which is also descriptiv of his times. He was a stormy orator who drew great crowds wherever he went. He admits that he went by the name of "the Distracted Preacher," but says that at one of his meetings "the people fell as if slain by a mighty weapon, and lay in such piles and heaps that it was feared they would suffocate, and that in the woods." So violent was his manner, stamping with his feet and smiting with his hands, that he often broke down the stands erected for him in the woods. Once, it is told of him, he was addressing a class-meeting in the upper story of a dwelling-house, when the room below was crowded with worshipers, and, being in what the historian calls "one of his big ways," he exclaimed, "I feel like breaking the trigger of hell!" and at the same time gave a tremendous stamp with his foot which actually broke one of the joists. The people below, hearing the sudden crash, ran screaming to the door, some of them really imagining, as the writer of all these events relates, "that hell had overtaken them."

Granade was of an excitable temperament and vivid imagination. His person was commanding, and, with a sounding voice and most impassioned manner, his oratory produced startling effects.

Another feature of these excited meetings, which served still further to intensify the feelings of the people who attended them for days and nights together, was the part taken in them by children. Nothing was more affecting to the congregations than the sight of a little boy or girl on a log or stump, passionately exhorting the multitude. Thus, a boy, who appeared to be about twelve years of age, is described as having retired from the stand at Indian Creek, Ohio, during the sermon, and mounting a log and raising his voice to a high pitch, soon had nearly all the congregation with him. "With tears streaming down his cheeks, he cried aloud to the wicked, warning them of their danger; denouncing their certain doom if they persisted in their sins; expressing his love for their souls, and desire that they should turn to the Lord and be saved." A man on each side held the boy up, and he spoke for about an hour. When quite exhausted, and language failed to giv utterance to his emotions, the little orator raised his hands, and, dropping his handkerchief wet with tears and perspiration, cried out: "Thus, O sinner, shall you drop into hell, unless you forsake your sins and turn to the Lord." At that moment, the writer of this account continues: "Some fell like those who are shot in battle, and the work spread in a manner which human language cannot describe."

McNemar instances boys of eight and ten years, and the Rev. John Lyle mentions one of seven, who called on sinners to repent, with an eloquence singularly overpowering. Possessed by one dominant idea, the people gave themselvs up to the wildest enthusiasm, and it was no uncommon thing for them to spend the whole night in religious orgies such as hav been described.

The spectacle of persons falling down in a paroxysm of feeling was first exhibited at Gasper River church, in one of McGready's congregations, in the summer of 1779. The movement proved highly contagious, and spread in all directions. After a rousing appeal to the feelings of the listeners, and especially during spirited singing, one and another in the audience would fall suddenly to the ground and swoon away. Not only nervous women, but robust young men, were overpowered. Some, continues the historian, fell suddenly as if struck by lightning, while others were seized with a universal tremor before they fell shrieking. Dr. Blythe, who often witnessed scenes of this sort, assured Dr. Davidson that he had once felt the sensation himself, and only overcame the tendency to convulsion by a determined effort of his will. A few shrieks never failed to put the assembly in motion and set men and women to falling all around. A sense of "pins and needles" was complained of by many of the subjects, and others felt a numbness of body, and lost all volitional control of their muscles. It soon grew into a habit, and those who had once fallen were ready to fall again under circumstances by no means exciting. Women who had suffered repeated attacks sometimes fell from their horses on their way to or from the meeting-house, while relating their past religious exercises.

The condition in some of the subjects was cataleptic, lasting generally from a few minutes to two or three hours; but in a few cases it continued many days. Others were violently convulsed as in hysteria or epilepsy, "wrought hard in fitful nervous agonies, the eyes rolling wildly." Most were speechless, but some were capable of conversing throughout the paroxysm. The extremities were cold, the face was pale or flushed, the breathing hard. Sensibility was annulled. Mr. Lyle, one of the prominent preachers of the times, having been furnished by Dr. Warfield with a vial of hartshorn, applied it to a stout young man who was lying flat on his back and inadvertently let some of the fluid run into his nostrils; but he took not the slightest notice of it. Others who fell hard to the ground, or in running encountered stumps or trees, felt no pain from the violence. So many fell at Cabin Creek camp-meeting, it is related, that to prevent their being trodden upon "they were laid out in order on two squares of the meeting-house, covering the floor like so many corpses." At Paint Creek Sacrament two hundred were estimated to hav fallen; at Pleasant Point three hundred were prostrated; while at Cane Ridge, as has been stated, the number who fell was believed to hav reached three thousand.

The "jerks," as they were termed, presented some novel and remarkable features. Their first occurrence is reported to hav been at a sacramental meeting in east Tennessee, where several hundred people, of both sexes, were seized with this strange, convulsiv movement. The Rev. B. W. Stone has left a vivid description of it. Sometimes, he says, the subject was affected in a single member of his body, but at others the spasms were universal. When the head alone was affected, it would be jerked from side to side so quickly that the features of the face could not be distinguished. When the whole system was affected, he continues, "I hav seen the person stand in one place and jerk backward and forward in quick succession, the head nearly touching the floor behind and before. All classes, saints and sinners, the strong as well as the weak, were thus affected. I hav seen some wicked persons thus affected, and all the time cursing the jerks, while they were thrown to the earth with violence."

The first form in which these spasmodic movements made their appearance was that of a simple jerking of the arms from the elbow downward. When they involved the entire body, they are described as something terrible to behold. The head was thrown backward and forward with a celerity that alarmed spectators, causing the hair, if it was long, "to crack and snap like the lash of a whip."

The most graphic description of the "jerking exercise" was written by the Rev. Richard McNemar, an eye-witness of the frenzy, as well as an apologist, believing it to be a display of divine favor. In his "History of the Kentucky Revival" he says: "Nothing in nature could better represent this strange and unaccountable operation than for one to goad another, alternately on every side, with a piece of red-hot iron. The exercise commonly began in the head, which would fly backward and forward, and from side to side with a quick jolt, which the person would naturally labor to suppress, but in vain; and the more anyone labored to stay himself, and be sober, the more he staggered, and the more his twitches increased. He must necessarily go as he was stimulated, whether with a violent dash on the ground, and bounce from place to place like a football, or hop round with head, limbs, and trunk twitching and jolting in every direction, as if they must inevitably fly asunder. And how such could escape without injury was a wonder to spectators. By this strange operation the human frame was commonly so transformed and disfigured as to lose every trace of its natural appearance. Sometimes the head would be twitched right and left half-way around with such velocity that not a feature could be discovered, but the face appeared as much behind as before. Head-dresses were of little account among the female jerkers. Handkerchiefs, bound tight around the head, were flirted off with the first twitch, and the hair put into the utmost confusion. This was of very great inconvenience, to redress which the generality were shorn, though directly contrary to their confession of faith. Such as were seized with the jerks were wrested at once, not only from under their own government, but from that of everyone else, so that it was dangerous to attempt confining them or touching them in any manner, to whatever danger they were exposed. Yet few were hurt, except such as rebelled against the operations through wilful and deliberate enmity, and refused to comply with the injunctions which it came to enforce."

The same writer givs the history of a case of jerks as follows, and no case could illustrate more strikingly the nature of the affection:

A young man of a pious family, the son of a tanner, feigned sickness one Sunday morning to avoid going that day to camp-meeting. He kept his bed until he was assured that all the family, except a few negro children, had left the premises, and was much pleased at the success of his stratagem. As he lay quietly in his bed, his thoughts naturally turned to the camp-meeting in progress. The assembled multitude, excited, agitated, convulsed, rose up vividly before his mind. All at once, while occupied with the scene, he felt himself violently jerked out of bed, and dashed round the walls in a manner utterly beyond his control. Prayer, he remembered, was deemed efficacious in such circumstances, and he fell upon his knees in the hope that it would prove a sedativ in his case. It turned out as he hoped, and he returned to bed, happy at finding the spirit exorcised. But the enemy soon returned; the jerks were as bad as ever, but were again allayed by prayer. Dressing himself, he now went to the tan-yard, and set about currying a hide to occupy his mind. He rolled up his sleeves, and, grasping his knife, was about to commence the operation, when suddenly the knife was flirted out of his hand, and he was jerked violently backward over logs and against fences, as before. Gaining relief by resorting once more to prayer, he ventured to resume his occupation, but was again seized with convulsions, and at last forsook the tan-yard and betook himself to strong cries for mercy, at which he was found engaged by the family on their return from the meeting in the evening.

Another characteristic example is related by a writer in the Gospel Herald:

A gentleman and lady of some note in the fashionable world were attracted by curiosity to the camp-meeting at Cane Ridge. They indulged in many contemptuous remarks on their way, about the poor infatuated creatures who rolled over screaming in the mud, and promised jestingly to stand by and assist each other in case that either should be seized with the convulsions. They had not been long on the ground, looking upon the strange scene before them, when the young woman lost her consciousness and fell to the ground. Her companion, forgetting his promis of protection, instantly forsook her and ran off at the top of his speed. But flight afforded him no safety. Before he had gone two hundred yards he, too, fell down in convulsions, "while a crowd flocked round him to witness his mortification and offer prayers in his behalf."

These nervous disorders assumed many other grotesque forms besides those which hav been described. The subjects often rolled over and over on the ground, or ran violently until worn out with the exertion. Hysterical laughter was another modification. Instances of laughter were only occasional at first, but it grew, until in 1803 the "holy laugh" was introduced systematically as a part of religious worship. Sometimes half the congregation, apparently in the most devout spirit, were to be heard laughing aloud in the midst of a lively sermon. As the excitement grew, the infatuated subjects took to dancing, and at last to barking like dogs. McNemar says they actually assumed the posture of dogs, "moving about on all fours, growling, snapping the teeth, and barking with such an exactness of imitation as to deceive anyone whose eyes were not directed to the spot." Nor were the people who suffered so mortifying a transformation always of the vulgar classes; persons of the highest rank in society, on the contrary, men and women of cultivated minds and polite manners, found themselvs, by sympathy, reduced to this degrading situation. With these manifestations the insanity reached its hight in about three years after it began to show itself.

It was one of the popular beliefs of the times that certain instincts or conditions of the system would avert these nervous attacks. Thus it was held that a woman with a child in her arms, or conscious of approaching maternity, was in no danger. But there was no truth in the supposition. The maternal instinct, at least, had no protectiv efficacy. An instance is related where a woman mounted the stand, with an infant in her arms, for the sake of a better prospect, and that, being suddenly seized, she fell backward, dropping her child. Some one fortunately saw the danger in time to seize and save the child before it fell to the ground.

A large proportion of the members of every congregation had power to resist the convulsiv tendency. In a great majority, no such tendency probably existed; but where there was a conscious impulse toward the convulsions it could be restrained by most persons before it had been yielded to too long. Dr. Blythe had but little of the disorder in his church. He discountenanced the wild enthusiasm from the beginning, and threatened to hav anyone who became convulsed turned out of doors. The religious frenzy soon began to abate when the clergy set their faces against the stormy exercises. Rev. Joseph Lyle, in 1803, preached in his church a significant sermon on "Order." The congregation had come together expecting the usual displays of feeling; but though some were angered by his doctrins, and some strove to promote the confusion of intermingled exercises, only a few "fell," and, altogether, moderation triumphed. This was the first sermon preached against the fanaticism.

It is a remarkable fact that, notwithstanding the intensity and duration of this nervous disorder, no instance is recorded in which permanent insanity resulted from it. Such results were to hav been expected; insanity is mentioned by Edwards as having attended the excitement in New England, and it may be that reason was dethroned in some whose cases hav not become matters of history. In a few years, after a sounder public opinion began to assert itself, instances of the disorder had become rare, but it was many years before the epidemic entirely ceased.

As to its nature, there was but one opinion among medical men from the beginning. All referred it to a derangement of the nervous system. Dr. Felix Robertson, of Nashville, described the affection in his thesis, published in Philadelphia in 1805, as a form of chores. In some cases it took the form of that disease. In others it bore a stronger resemblance to epilepsy; while in a greater number it partook rather of the character of hysteria. It was eminently sympathetic in its nature, as has been so often remarked of these affections. The convulsions, once started in a congregation, spread quickly through it, until all the fit subjects were convulsed. Repetition greatly increased the proneness to the disorder, which was invited by the masses on the supposition that it was a true religious exercise.

These perverted muscular movements all come under the head of morbid reflex action. By the continued religious fervor, the central portions of the brain, the immediate seat of emotion and feeling, became inordinately excited. The impression, transmitted downward to the spinal cord, threw the muscles of voluntary motion into convulsions. Sensibility, which has its seat in the sensory ganglia, was generally annulled. When the hemispheres became involved, the subjects fell into a state of unconsciousness or coma. In this abnormal condition of the nervous centers, the bare recollection of the distressing scenes was sufficient in many cases to excite the convulsiv movements. The former belong to sensori-motor actions. This last is an example of ideo-motor movement, instances of which are afforded by the act of vomiting, which may be caused by the recollection of disgusting sights or odors. The principle of imitation accounts for the rest. The great nervous centers, in multitudes of people, being in a state of polarity, any unusual exhibition of feeling would throw the more excitable into spasms, and the affection would then spread by sympathy, as hysterical convulsions and chorea are known to spread among girls at boarding-schools. And, as fear has checked these, the epidemic convulsions were checked by reason and common sense, and finally ceased under the law which limits all violent action.

The Frauds in Spiritualism.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I dislike to occupy valuable space, but I do want to assure Miss Colman, and others, that some of our Spiritualists hav "a disposition to condemn fraud and expose it." Like other isms, we hav two different branches—the Christian Spiritualists, and Freethinking ones. These could again be divided, but I will not take the time. The Bible believers accept materializations because "we read about it in the Bible, you know." Some accept because they cannot account for the so-called tests sometimes received. In my opinion, lack of investigation is the real cause for accepting the idea that the growth of fifty years or more can be accomplished in fifty minutes. Some sincerely believe in the "control" being the cause of frauds, and hold the medium irresponsible.

We, who do "condemn and expose," hav found ourselvs practically "excommunicated," unless the condemnation also comes from a "control." Some of our best speakers and clairvoyants express themselvs as freely in private as I hav in public, but, for reasons best known to themselvs, evade direct conflict with this question. But, just as all errors recede, step by step, before the light of reason and investigation, so will the frauds in Spiritualism run their race and pass out of sight.

We inherit superstition. We are psychologized with it, and the law of nature is that of slow growth. So we get one idea at a time, and it will be the same old story. Geology will be squeezed into Genesis till it explodes the old shell, and the fable will dissolve into mist. I fancy that the sunshine of human progressiv thought will melt away some of the beliefs of our Spiritualists. Some of us will work for that time and hour, will faithfully investigate, but will refuse to accept what reason and natural law fail to confirm. Some of us, also, believe that there are so many important matters to be attended to on earth that it will not do to lose too much time in exploring a future heaven; among them, count

Sacraments.

The word "sacrament" in the different ages has conveyed somewhat different meanings, but in the main has always had the same meaning, viz., an outward or public expression of faith in God.

As civilization and intelligence hav advanced toward morality and Liberalism, the meaning and acceptance of the word hav gradually been modified, and now with Protestants it only means the ordinance of baptism or of the Lord's Supper.

The intention here is to speak of "sacraments" in its full and general meaning, and of its modifications.

All the gods which man has created hav ever required of their followers and superstitious dupes a public sacrifice of life as evidence of their faith. The more ignorance and superstition existing, the more and stronger evidences hav been required to prove their faith.

The Hindoo's god requires the mother to cast from her arms her loved infant into the river and herself into the grave of her dead husband, to be buried alive with him.

The God of Moses was a little improvement upon all former gods. The world was becoming more Liberal and wiser. In fact, some little doubts existed in the minds of the people, and human life was considered a little too valuable to chance it for an angelship in heaven. So he only required a sacrament, or sacrifice of the life of the herds. Thus the sacrament of the burnt offering was instituted. Doubtless Abraham thought he was but little in advance of other gods about the time Isaac was to be sent up.

As the world advanced, and reason began to create more doubts and fears, the market on cattle and sheep getting up, this God had to come down a little, and how could he do it and not show his cloven foot? A pretty nice dodge! In his loving kindness he sent his only begotten son that his life might be sacrificed, that the law should be obeyed!

This reminds us of the country merchant who made a positiv order that no goods would be sold on credit, and put a notice over his door, "Positivly Cash or No Sale." After running awhile he found that his neighbor was doing all the business, as the whole trade of the village was with the farmers, and they had money only twice a year as they sold their produce. But he had made a rule, and was too stiff to back down. So, finally, he proposed to lend money to all that would agree to pay it back for goods.

The merchant saw that he could get the trade if he would furnish the money. This God saw that he could get the faith if he would furnish the sacrifice.

All any god has ever cared for was faith in his existence. There never has been a god that would not promis anything for faith. But he has never paid, that we know anything about, and as the world grows wiser faith gets weaker, and sacraments fewer and milder in form.

In the present age, as in the past, we find faith in the blood of God most strongly proclaimed where the most ignorance exists. With the Roman Catholics penance, confessions, crucifixion, fasting, eating the actual flesh and drinking the veritable blood of Jesus, and proclaiming a belief in all mysteries as coming from God, are all held to be sacramental duties the neglect of which would send them to purgatory. This faith comes from the ignorant portion which constitutes the great mass of that church.

The forms of sacraments and differences of value of them constitute the only difference between the Roman Catholic and the Protestant churches.

In the Protestant churches, where we find the most intelligence, we find these sacraments, or public demonstrations of faith in God, held to be of the least importance. Truly, the world is growing toward morality as the true religion, and we may reasonably expect that in time, when the church shall accept Christ as only a man, and his life and teachings as only advocating that religion, to part the hair in the middle and wear it long in acknowledgement of his example will be the only sacrament.

ability to be present. Courtlandt Palmer, chairman of the committee on resolutions, then presented the following:

"The Freethinkers of the state of New York, in Convention assembled, resolve as follows:

"First, That the mother and nurse of all reforms, social, political, and moral, is universal mental liberty, and that its general extension is the condition of all future progress of the human race.

"Second, That, taking our stand on the fundamental American doctrin of the separation of church and state, we demand, in the interests of liberty, equal rights, and secular government, that such separation of church and state should be completed by the repeal of all laws exempting church and ecclesiastical property from taxation; by the prohibition by law of the appropriation of public moneys for the support of, or use by, institutions under the management and influence of sectarian denominations; by the repeal of all laws compelling the observance of any day as a Sabbath or holy day, or enforcing the payment of legislativ chaplaincies, or of establishing special religious days to be observed by public authority. We therefore call upon all of our fellow-citizens, irrespectiv of their religious opinions, to aid us in obtaining these requirements of justice.

"Third, That the object of Freethought is to extend the benign influence of science, to cultivate the spirit of fraternity, to aid in the triumph of peace, to remove brute force, and to inaugurate a government which shall express the moral power of an enlightened reason. To these ends we recommend that Liberal or Secular societies should be formed for social education and recreativ purposes; that Freethought and Secular halls, libraries, and reading-rooms should be built or obtained, and that suitable lecturers and teachers should be employed, wherever possible, in the several counties of our state.

"Fourth, That it is time for Liberal and Secular societies to take the place of churches and priests in the social recognition and celebration of those great events of human life—birth, marriage, and death.

"Fifth, That, inasmuch as the government rests upon the consent of the governed, 'equity recognizes no distinction of sex,' and that woman's complete inclusion into a common participation with man of the knowledge, the uses, and the enjoyments of this earth is her legitimate position.

"Sixth, That theology, in accounting for toil as a curse, and in proclaiming riches as a snare, has unhappily confused the relations of labor and capital, and that human social equality demands that the industry which creates the wealth of the world should enjoy a fair distribution of its benefits.

"Seventh, That in order to aid practically in the securing of these ends we request and authorize the officers of this Association to take steps for legal incorporation."

The resolutions were unanimously adopted. Mr. Remsburg then proposed this, upon Theron C. Leland's death, which was also adopted:

"Resolved, That we place upon the roll of our deceased members the name of Theron C. Leland with peculiar regret. That we recognize gratefully the very valuable work he did in the Liberal cause, particularly in the work of organization. That his faithfulness, patience, and modesty adorned, but now less than ever conceal, the ability with which he labored for our common cause. That we pledge ourselvs to urge forward to final success the efforts to which he gave his life."

Upon Mr. Remsburg's motion a vote of thanks was passed to the press of Albany and the New York Herald. After Mrs. A. C. Bristol had recited an original poem entitled, "What I Don't Know," James Parton read his paper upon Victor Hugo. No synopsis can convey an idea of its power, and we hope ere long it will be given to the press. The leading monthly of the country has applied for the manuscript, and when used we shall reprint it.

The Sunday forenoon exercises concluded with a short speech by J. E. Remsburg, on "Sunday Slavery." He said:

"We boast of the civil and religious liberty guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. But if individual states, in the interest of a particular religion, are permitted to trample this liberty under foot, of what value is it?

"The Constitution declares that 'Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.' The supreme law of the land also declares that 'the government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion.'

"To enforce the observance of the Christian Sabbath upon those who refuse to accept the religious system of which it is a part is a subversion of the principles upon which our government is based.

"The Supreme Court of Ohio and other courts hav decided that the observance of the Christian Sabbath, as such, cannot be legally enforced; that all Sunday laws must be recognized as mere police regulations, instituted because of their supposed sanitary benefits, and deriving no authority whatever from any sanctity attached to the day. All religious services conducted on Sunday, and particularly the preaching for money—and what clergyman preaches without it?—are therefore a violation of these laws.

"If these laws contain provisional clauses permitting the performance of these religious duties, then these provisos, so far as they go, relate to the establishment of a religion and are opposed to the spirit of the Constitution.

"But Christians will claim, and very properly too, that any law interfering with the free exercise of religious duties is likewise an infringement of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution. But who is to determin what are and what are not religious duties? Has the state a right to appoint a tribunal for this purpose? No more than it has to establish a state religion. The conceptions of religion and of religious duties are as various as the forms and colors reflected in the kaleidoscope. We are acquainted with the dogmas of the orthodox religion. Thousands of priests are employed to publish them. But the orthodox religion is not the only religion in this country. There are those whose religion consists not of creeds but of deeds; there are those with whom honest industry is itself religion and work is worship; there are those who believe that pleasures which for the time shall chase away dull care and fill the soul with gladness—that athletic games and sports which bring the roses to the cheek and vigor to the frame—that these, too, are religious duties.

"The orthodox Christian with his family goes to church on Sunday, where in a stifling atmosphere they sing, and pray, and listen to a prosy sermon, and perchance sleep. They believe this to be a religious duty, and the privilege of performing this duty is not denied them. And if the liberal Christian or Rationalist on a summer's Sunday desires to take his wife and children from the heat and dust of the city to the seaside or the grove, where they may watch the wild waves play or listen to the chorister of birds, where they may breathe the pure, sweet air, where they may feast on nature's beauties, may drink the overflowing cup of joy, and fill their hearts with sunshine, when by a day thus spent they are made happier and better, what right hav you, religious bigot, what right hav you, political demagog, to say that this is not a religious duty and must not be allowed?

"The laboring classes do need rest; they ought to hav far more rest than they get; and were it not for priestcraft, were it not for this vast army of priests and preachers which they hav to support, they would be able to obtain it. But who is to determin when they are tired, their neighbors or themselvs? Who knows best when I need rest, my neighbor or myself? I hav as much right to tell my Christian neighbor when he shall work, as he has to tell me when I shall rest; I hav as much right, in justice, to compel him to work on Sunday as he has to compel me to rest on Sunday.

"It is remarkable that the efforts of these men to secure rest for the working classes should be confined to Sunday. Is Sunday rest the only rest they need? Under the very eyes of the clergy, street-car drivers labor sixteen hours a day; under the very eyes of the clergy shop-girls toil from seven o'clock in morning until ten at night; under the very eyes of the clergy factory children work twelve hours a day. What hav they done to ameliorate the condition of these classes and save them from this overwork? If they paid less attention to the manner in which the toiling masses spent their Sundays and manifested more concern for their welfare during the remainder of the week, the world would giv them greater credit for sincerity.

"But what, in its true sense, is rest? To the farmer who follows the plow, and to the laborer who works in the open air all week, the observance of these laws is, in most cases, rest. But to the thousands of mechanics and laborers confined in shops and factories, to the thousands of clerks and accountants confined at the desk or behind the counter, to the thousands of teachers and to the millions of school-children confined in the school-room, these laws do not provide a rest but impose upon them an irksome task. Without these laws all might rest on Sunday who desire to; with them, millions are compelled either to abstain from what to them is rest or to seek it in defiance of law."

In the afternoon Horace Seaver was introduced by Mr. Wakeman as one to whom we all owe a great debt of gratitude. Off the platform Mr. Seaver shows signs of advancing age, but when warmed by the emotions which find rapid utterance when before an audience, no traces of age can be seen. Mr. Seaver paid well-deserved tribute to Kneeland and others, and his reference to his colleague of half a century, Mr. Mendum, was full of pathos. Fifty years ago, Mr. Seaver said, in this very city of Albany, he had been converted from ignorance by an address by Robert Dale Owen. After fifty years of experience as a heretic, he said he wanted no discharge from the ranks until the curtain was rolled down upon his life. The Revolution of a hundred years ago did but half its work if we do not in the near future become mentally as well as politically free. He contended, with much earnestness, that the hope of this republic rests entirely on Liberal principles. They must all be fully adopted or the system of government would be swept away.

At the conclusion of Mr. Seaver's remarks, Courtlandt Palmer supplemented the morning's resolutions with the following, which were passed:

"Resolved, That we rejoice that a substantial effort is being made by the friends of liberty throughout the world to erect at Rome a statue which shall worthily commemorate the life and martyrdom of Giordano Bruno. We call upon Americans to make their additions to the fund for this purpose not only substantial, but general, so that as many of our people as possible may be represented in this great act of historic justice to this hero of science and Freethought.

"Resolved, That this Convention renews its words of sympathy and cheer to Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant in their brave struggle for liberty and the right of representation in England.

"We recommend to the Liberals of this country to join with our English brethren in the contributions which are needful to make their final victory complete."

Helen H. Gardener then spoke for an hour upon "Historical Facts and Theological Fictions." It had been contemplated that Elizabeth Cady Stanton would occupy this afternoon, but for several days previous to the opening of the Convention she had been seriously ill, and Saturday she telegraphed that it would be impossible for her to fill the engagement. Helen Gardener was therefore substituted, and admirably did she rise to the requirements of the occasion. Her address occupied an hour and a half in the delivery. Our subscribers will soon hav the opportunity of reading it.

At the conclusion of her paper, Mr. Putnam announced the memorial to the coming legislature, and urged all present to obtain as many signatures upon the petition as possible. As the audience left each one was given a copy of the petition, and no doubt thousands of names will be obtained.

The evening was occupied by Colonel Ingersoll. His lecture was "Which Way?" The Opera House was full. Mr. Ingersoll spoke a little over two hours and a half. There is no use of saying anything about it. It was simply one of the grandest efforts of the greatest orator of this or any other country. It was above criticism, and praise is as superfluous as paint upon a lily's petals.

The conclusion of those who attended the Convention was that it was a good one. The attendance of the Albany public outside the Liberals of the city was meager except upon Sunday night. Apart from this, the only regrettable occurrence was the arrest of Seward Mitchell, of Newport, Maine, upon a charge of circulating obscene literature. This occurred on Friday, by direction of the chief of police, who charged that Mr. Mitchell's little sheet, the World's Reformer, was amenable to section 317 of the penal code. The article objected to was a poem by Frances Rose Mackinley. Mr. Mitchell sent for Mr. Heywood, who was also at the Convention. Mr. Heywood told Justice Clute that Mr. Mitchell's intent and purpose was not immoral, and therefore that he did not come within the provision of the code. Upon Justice Clute expressing dissent, Mr. Heywood said that then the Bible came within the meaning of the statute, as Solomon's Song is certainly more lascivious than Mackinley's poem, and other portions of the Old Testament were infinitly more vulgar. This seemed to be a new idea to Justice Clute, and his brow wrinkled in thought. He finally said that if Mr. Mitchell would stop distributing his papers, he would let him go. Mr. Mitchell promised and was discharged.

As was to be expected, some of the press of Albany made haste to lay this to the Freethinkers in the city, and draw morals therefrom. They desisted, however, upon receiving a letter from Mr. Palmer. This particular letter is from the Albany Journal:

"Editor Albany Journal: The Journal has fallen into an error in calling Seward Mitchell's organ entitled the World's Reformer the organ of the Freethinkers' Convention. Probably ninety-nine out of one hundred attendants among us never heard of the sheet, and if they did would utterly disavow its ideas. None of us wish to interfere with anyone's rights of free thought, free speech, or free press, but it is not fair to force issues on the Freethinkers as a body that do not belong to them. By making this correction you would only be doing justice to us all. We hav a hard enough fight to conduct anyhow. COURTLANDT PALMER."

We hav only time in this issue to giv the above outlines of the good time enjoyed at Albany. In future papers we shall print such of the addresses as are within the capacity of THE TRUTH SEEKER. In place of any summing-up, we find room for Mr. Putnam's poetic impressions of the event:

The Convention is over, and bright hope has become a happy memory. We hav dreamed of great things and great things hav come. In power, in influence, in harmony of action, in intellectual display, this has been the noblest of Freethought meetings. It is a great onward step in the march of our gathering forces, and hearts are thrilled as never before.

Our new secretary, J. J. McCabe, opened the Convention with an address of exceeding value, and made plain the momentous issue of intellectual freedom or slavery.

C. B. Reynolds, well-known and dear to all our hearts, fresh from pioneer conflict, made one of those brilliant addresses which, with mingled wit and pathos, swept the audience to enthusiastic applause.

Joseph McDonough's clear-cut thought and incisiv speech stripped Christianity of its divine pretensions, and demonstrated that, so far as it was anything valuable, it was the fluent response to man's advancing reason.

Also good Elizur Wright—how noble, how grand, he seemed, as with keen and vigorous mind he exposed the absurdities of the new version! Valiant still, his sword is as bright as ever.

T. B. Wakeman, in his outlook of and for Liberalism, gave one of his inspiring discourses which each time seems a new revelation of the power and possibilities of our great movement.

Courtlandt Palmer's "Aristocracy of Freethought" was a most noble and scholarly presentation of the lofty, refined, and splendid service which liberty must render in calling into action the choicest faculties of man.

Dr. Brown, as usual, overflowed with kindly good sense, and if we follow all his bountiful precepts, no doubt we shall be healthy, wealthy, and wise.

Colonel Ingersoll says that Dr. Brown's motto for God is one of the best that the wit of man has originated: "Damn others as you would damn yourself." There is indeed a deal of religion in this way of putting things, if we will deeply consider it.

Mrs. Mattie Krekel made a new and excellent point for the "Demands of Liberalism" by showing that the Constitution, by contrast with the then existing colonial governments, was a secular instrument, and that our wise forefathers who framed it had in view the very thing for which we are struggling to-day, and meant to sweep every vestige of ecclesiastical law from the administration of political affairs.

The vigorous eloquence of Charles Watts was like a trumpet summoning to battle.

What shall I say of James Parton's beautiful discourse on Victor Hugo, where every word dropped like a gem, and melted into a crystal revealing of the poet's mighty soul. The stream flowed along with charming movement and exhilaration. It was an hour of poesy and delight. It was the very enchantment of lofty thought and prevailing genius. We touched the highest world, and every moment was rhythmical.

And in accord with the orator's theme was the exquisit utterance of woman's soul in the voice of Augusta Cooper Bristol, the priestess of an emancipated race. Was ever a Sabbath morning so rich with joy and promis as this of our Convention? All that was ever dreamed of lovely and noble was in this consecrated time.

The clarion tones of John E. Remsburg brought us again to the battle front with fiery determination, and never shall the precious baptism of that glorious hour pass from the inner chambers of our spirit. Finer and sweeter evermore shall be the process of our labor.

What a tumultuous welcome greeted Horace Seaver of the Boston Investigator! More than half a century ago Albany was his camping-ground. He was then a soldier of the cross, but, happening to listen to the words of Robert Dale Owen, he enlisted in the guard of human liberty, and from that time to his honored age of to-day he has been one of the most steadfast and boldest champions of Freethought. His delightful speech was received with round after round of applause. Deeply, gratefully indeed do we hold in our memory the service of Horace Seaver and J. P. Mendum. They hav made possible the glory and promis of this memorable Convention.

With age flashed beauty, and our bright, new star, Helen H. Gardener, uttered her sparkling protest against the tyranny of the church. Amid airy fancies came her shafts of truth, and the theological assumptions of the past never received more destructiv blows. Amid the rainbow hues was the quick lightning of woman's indignant heart.

How shall I speak of the wonderful close of this symphony of Freethought—all the streams and rivers of speech swelling into a Niagara of magnificent eloquence? Was ever oratory so like music and poetry? There was the intensity of Demosthenes, the comprehensivness and art of Cicero, the sublime thought of Milton, the perfect melody of Shelley, so in harmony with nature's life, in the motion of the lark and the radiant sweep of cloud, and there was the warmheartedness of Burns. No wonder that people believe in gods, when man can be so magnificent, so heroic, so inspiring! What does Ingersoll giv in the place of Christianity? the withered priesthood asks with pale lips. He givs himself, I answer; and with this Christianity is a thousandfold replaced. He givs himself, his mighty heart and brain, and in and through them a life so radiant, so lofty, so various, so commanding, that we who listen to his marvelous speech are ready for any toil, because through his burning words the essential glory of human existence is made known, and we are happy to liv—and we are not afraid to die—because we hav looked upon the noblest form of living. In the rose's perfect bloom life and death meet in one common glory.

Like music—like some marvelous picture—this Convention, this meeting together of our best and wisest, shall linger in the memory, ever urging to nobler effort. We are not a side-current, but the forward flow of the great central force of human advancement. Truth and beauty hav shown that they are one, and from this time forth our way, though arduous, will be more attractiv, for the face of truth, to which we hav consecrated all, and for which we hav sacrificed so much of joy, now shines with the revealing graces of nature, the beautiful in art, the wonderful in poetry, the ravishing in music. Thought blends with emotion and the heart leaps to the quick perceptions of the brain. The discord ceases—the harmony evolves.

Call for the Ninth Annual Congress.

To the Auxiliary Liberal Leagues and All Citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Ninth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, to be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 9, 10, and 11, 1885.

According to a vote at the last Congress of the League notice is hereby given that an Amendment to the Constitution will be submitted, as follows: Article I. of the Constitution of the National Liberal Leauge shall be amended to read: "The name of the association shall be The American Secular Union."

Measures for the affiliation of the Freethought Societies of Canada with the National Liberal League will also come up to be acted upon.

Also measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various State Government and by the National Government as shall make the United States thoroughly Secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute books which confiict with the Nine Demand of Liberalism.

Local Auxiliary Leagues are entitled by the League Constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the President and Secretary and three Delegates. All Charter Members and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual Members are entitled to seats but not to votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every Auxiliary League will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present. Having adopted a common basis of work upon which all Liberals can combine, it is now desirable to discover the best means by which this work can be carried forward, and to this end large attendance and free expression of opinion will contribute. It is hoped that all will come to the Congress to emphasize the unity of Liberalism and to create an interest for harmonious action which shall result in the abolition of all laws that are contrary to secular government.

Per order of Board of Directors:

R. G. INGERSOLL, President.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.
COURTLANDT PALMER, Treasurer.
CHARLES B. REYNOLDS, Ch. Ex. Com.
A. C. MACDONALD, Ch. Fin. Com.

Program of Cleveland Congress.

Introductory address by the president, Robert G. Ingersoll; report of Secretary Samuel P. Putnam; report of Treasurer Courtlandt Palmer; report of Chairman of Executiv Committee C. B. Reynolds. Paper on methods of work and organization by Charles Watts, first vice-president.

Addresses during the Convention by John E. Remsburg, J. H. Burnham, Helen H. Gardener, Mrs. Krekel, Dr. T. L. Brown, Mrs. E. A. Freeman, and other representativ speakers from all parts of the country. Let us rally around our brilliant leader, and hav a crowded Congress from beginning to end. Let all auxiliary societies elect delegates at once, if they hav not already done. Let every Freethinker come, stir up his neighbors, see that mention of the Congress is made in his local newspaper. Let it be known in every corner of the land that this Congress is to be held at Cleveland, October 9th, 10th, and 11th.

Ingersoll will close the Congress on Sunday evening, October 11th, with his great lecture, "Liberty For Man, Woman, and Child."

Historical Christianity.

FORGERY OF ANCIENT WRITINGS.

Although it is true that none of the four gospels, in their present form, can be traced back prior to the year 180, yet it is possible that they were redacted many years before, when it is certain that gospels existed containing important variations from our four. Very little is known about Christianity before the middle of the second century, when Gnosticism widely prevailed. About the year 138 Marcion came to Rome and brought Paul's epistles. Marcion was the son of a bishop in Pontus. That was in the region of Paul's ministry. He preached in Asia from about 63 B.C., to 20 B.C., and probably died at Rome about 10 B.C. His fellow-apostle, Barnabas, was killed by a Jewish mob in Cyprus abont 40 B.C. Clement of Rome must hav written his epistle to the Corinthians about 1 B.C. Then comes a long interval to the death of Ignatius at Antioch (not Rome) A.D. 115. The martyrdom of Polycarp was much later—about A.D. 166. Justin wrote at Rome contemporary with Marcion, about A.D. 140–166. He denounced Marcion, and never alluded to Paul. It seems, therefore, that the orthodox church did not accept Paul until some years after Justin and Marcion were dead.

Historical Christianity is a priestly fraud. Critical research is disclosing a prodigious amount of corruption and forgery, most of which has heretofore been assigned to primitiv times. But what if it should appear that nearly all of these forgeries were done since the twelfth century.

We hav before us a little posthumous work in Latin by Jean Hardouin, a learned French Jesuit, who died in 1729, at the age of eighty-three. It was written or completed in the last year of his life. He maintains, and adduces some most cogent arguments to prove, that most of the early Latin and Greek literature, and all the early Christian writings (the sacred scriptures excepted), were fabricated by Benedictine monks after the middle of the thirteenth century.

We purpose to present to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER some extracts from Father Hardouin's book. Having satisfied ourselvs long ago that much of the early Christian literature and some of the Latin authors are fabrications, we are prepared to weigh the learned Jesuits' reasons for rejecting nearly all of them as spurious. ANTICHRIST, A. M.

Our London Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I should rather imagin it was feared by some of the faithful that the Lord was about to hibernate, as I hav noticed of late an increase of outdoor preachers, who probably believe that unless they keep up continual efforts their deity will take advantage of a moment's silence and slip off into his winter quarters, wherever they may be.

The nuisance is not so great on week-days, but on Sunday, and more particularly in the evening, at almost every street corner may be observed a small knot of people, surrounding a genuin tub-thumper, from whose discourse some little amusement may be obtained occasionally, but the thing soon gets monotonous. These individuals remind one very much of the man at country fairs who eats lighted tow and vomits flame and smoke from his mouth. The street preachers feed on Calvin's hell-fire food, and belch it out continually.

I am particularly interested in one of the fraternity, a youth of about sixteen years of age, who stands on a small platform every Sunday evening just off a main thoroughfare in the South of London. He seems to cram himself with a little red-hot Spurgeon, which he carefully retails, occasionally perpetrating some original remark which is extremely ludicrous, judging by his appearance and manner, for he gesticulates wildly and has a most delightful snuffle. He will blossom eventually into a powerful preacher, after the style of Spurgeon in his younger days, or perhaps even emulate the one and only Talmage. This latter worthy has held forth here on one occasion recently, but not with such great success as on his last visit. I presume he had no new wares to offer, or was not sufficiently advertised.

The Armstrong case has not shown the Pall Mall Gazette people in the best of colors, and this incident has done far more harm than good to them. Doubtless the ostensible object of the articles on crimes against children was good, but it now appears that Booth has been making the proprietor of the news paper a cat's-paw to pull a goodly supply of chestnuts out of the fire for him. He showed his hand rather too quickly, however, and it is very doubtful if he will get the thousands he so modestly asks for. As far as I can see, many of the subscribers to his funds consist of people who hav made immense wealth by paying starvation wages to their workpeople, and been instrumental thereby in causing the traffic in women so prevalent in all large communities.

It is wonderful how anyone possessing any degree of intelligence can suppose that prostitution will be put down by act of Parliament, but those who hav caused the stir there has been of late fancy that it can be done if assisted by a few meetings in Exeter Hall and a special prayer manufactured by a bishop.

The meeting at Hyde Park was tolerably large, estimates of the numbers ranging from 11,000 to 300,000 (there must hav been some good judges present). The object seemed merely to be for the purpose of the speakers pledging themselvs to help the authorities to carry out the new act, though how it is to be done I did not hear. The result of the agitation has borne fruit, as several individuals hav already been tried under this law and sentenced to stiff terms of imprisonment. The greater portion of the press considers the disclosures as being disgraceful, and incentivs to vice, but if the statements are true, I can scarcely see why they should not be published. But people are so highly cultured now that, while it is extremely shocking to even hint at such a thing, it is rather clever to commit a successful rape on a defenseless woman, provided the perpetrator is not caught.

It is not often I buy theistic literature, but having heard that a clergyman in Manchester had published a pamphlet completely annihilating Ingersoll's objection to the Bible, I was led to invest in a copy, but, as usual, was disappointed with the contents. There is a certain amount of ingenuity displayed in avoiding a direct answer to any objection that has been made. The usual plan is adopted of bringing up one text in opposition to another; for instance, where Ingersoll states that the Bible degrades woman, we hav a proof (?) that it does nothing of the sort by the quotation, "A woman that feareth the Lord [i. e., supporteth the priests] she shall be praised," and so on. The passages showing that woman was only looked upon as a chattel are carefully ignored. What such books are written for, except to bring money to the author, it is hard to say; certain it is that they would never convert an unbeliever.

Fraternally yours, J. D.

Lectures and Meetings.

MRS. H. S. LAKE spoke at North Collins, N. Y., Sep. 5th and 6th, and Paw Paw, Mich., Sep. 13th. Parties desiring lectures will address her at Paw Paw, Mich.

J. E. REMSBURG will lecture at Roche's Hall, corner Grove and Morgan streets, Jersey City, on the evening of the 17th. Subject: "Sunday Slavery." Friday evening, the 18th, he speaks at Vineland, N. J., on "Bible Morals."

Letters from Friends.

WANSHIP, SUMMIT CO., UTAH, Aug. 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: We wonder how the Eastern people can become so religiously fanatical as to throw themselvs under the wheels of Juggernaut and be crushed to death, to throw their babes to the crocodiles, and practice all their other cruel or absurd rites.

And some wonder at the fanatical zeal and blind faith of the Mormons. They cheerfully comply with an order from their leaders to go to Europe, the Sandwich Islands, or elsewhere, to be absent from their families and business, and without remuneration, or sell out a comfortable home and move to Arizona or Mexico. In fact, the main tenet of their religion is implicit obedience to their leaders in all things.

They believe that God—a man-like personage—used to hav confidential chats with Joseph Smith, that he told him how to organize the Mormon theory, and showed him where to dig for gold plates, on which was written, "The Book of Mormon," and when Joseph went to get the plates, the devil—another man-like personage—was there, and disputed his right to them, and Joseph—being an athlete—and Mr. Devil doing as Jacob and Jehovah are said to hav done, they had a wrestle for the possession of the gold plates, and Joseph downed the devil. They believe the United States government will be overthrown, and that they, the Mormons, will finally possess the entire earth, and a thousand other absurd and improbable things.

You wonder how intelligent men and women can be such obedient serfs, and hav such implicit faith in such unlikely occurences. But if you could see their thorough, systematical organization, you would wonder how any could escape. They hav primaries for children three to ten years old, where they are instructed and taught the Mormon doctrins; also the Young Ladies' Association, the Young Mens', the Teachers', the Relief Society, the Seventies, the High Priests, the School of the Prophets, and some others, each with a president and councilors. All of these societies, which include all classes, are constantly drilled into the faith, and if Juggernaut and the crocodiles were included in their tenets, these deities would receive as many victims as they do in India.

Before an election the priests meet and nominate those they want to fill the offices, which is virtually an election. Of course they go through the farce of voting the ticket put in their hands. In these appointments church standing is the main qualification required. And these officers hold their office only during the pleasure of the church, so you see this state is emphatically governed by the church.

The Edmunds law—prosecuting a few polygamists—will never take the control out of church hands, but makes them more fanatically zealous.

But the few Liberals scattered through Utah can make themselvs some good neighbors, and do much good by judiciously circulating all the tracts, papers, and books they can afford, which is the only way to strike at the root of the disease. All should become subscribers to some of our Secular papers, and induce their neighbors to do likewise. Then soon a blight would be noticed in this now thrifty tree of superstition, Mormonism. Yours truly, WM. REYNOLDS.

BROOKLYN, Aug. 24, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: It was my first intention to renew my subscription for a longer term, but the thought occurred to me that it will be more liberal to subscribe $4 per annum than $3. Therefore I inclose an instalment of $1, and will note the progress I hav made in Bible-ology as a pupil of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Bible, as a theology, should necessarily contain some valuable truth to giv it a color of plausibility, though, as a whole, it is so chaffy that it will hardly pay for sifting, especially not for the chaff.

Having no relish for chaff, I shall hav nothing to do with it, not even to damn it, for I don't think it worth a damn.

The preservation of the Bible, as a history, should hardly be desirable by the advocates of priestcraft and statecraft, for it represents them to hav been the most hellish of all hellcrafts, whose hellishness is only modified by their opportunity to practice it. Therefore the Bible should be a more formidable weapon against them than all the Infidel literature that has been published. Infidel literature would hav no force without the Bible.

The Bible, as a philosophy, is purely Secular and compatible with all known principles of nature from beginning to end. And it reaches a long way. It begins with matter when formless and void, and ends with the final consummation of human destiny, and promises the permanent establishment of a common brotherhood of the human race, on a basis that shall endure forever. I believe it to be compatible with intelligent human aspirations that we should accept that promise in hope, if we cannot in faith.

If my understanding of history is correct, the protest against priestcraft and statecraft that put an end to the Dark Ages, and made Freethinking and Infidelity possible, is traceable to the Bible. Therefore I cannot understand why Infidels should make the Bible an object of their especial hostility, unless a bigoted unbelief is possible. It is not fairly supposable that a slave to bigotry can be a Freethinker on the subject of his bigotry; if not a Freethinker, he cannot be a clear and correct thinker; and if not a clear and correct thinker, his conclusions will not be consistent with all the facts.

J. A. TUTTLE.

KANSAS CITY, MO., August 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: We hav it from the best of former religious authority that, at the age of the world when Voltaire, Paine, Jefferson, Franklin, and other patriots passed from the earthly stage of life, every one had to immediately stand up before Jesus, the Holy Ghost, God, and his angels, and be judged, if they were vouchsafed a hearing at all, and it is generally settled in the mind of the Christian-trained that the above-named gentlemen never had an examination, and that priesthood's general opinion was taken as prima facie evidence against them; that they simply met old Beelzebub, and to this day do not know anything more about God, Jesus, and the Holy Ghost than they did when on earth. It appears from other religious teachings that some are laid away on ice, until some great convulsion of nature, like the blowing of Gabriel's horn, shall arouse them. Exactly what class of humanity are entitled to this distinction we are not told, but probably those like Beecher, who are half their earthly life riding the horns of the altar, and the other half hanging on to the tail. To-day we hav the evidence of no less a divine than Newman that General Grant, in passing from earthly conditions, met with none of these experiences, but in place of God, Jesus, Ghost, and angels, he was received by Lincoln, McPherson, Rawlins, Washington, and cabinet. No explanation is given for this radical change in being received at the court of heaven, or whether it is general or special. If priests do get things terribly mixed guessing about receptions in a future state of life, one thing is certain, they are first-class funeral liars; but, if they are chosen by God, he may believe his own to such an extent that it will help some outside liar to a comfortable place, which will be doing some good.

Yours, etc., W. W. JUDSON.

"WHAT'S IN A NAME?"

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 8th, Mr. Clark, M.D., has fairly answered the question in respect to the name of religion, of which few people know the meaning; but from the way he has disrobed and dissected it, and analyzed its stomach, it appears to me that a more appropriate heading would be, "Religions Retrospect Damaging to the Future Crop."

A Methodist elder told me recently that the meaning of religion was "a re-binding." Then I said that religion and Christianity are two principles impossible to harmonize. They are God and Satan, that forever antagonize each other. Instead of meaning everything that is good, as the many suppose, religion is the very principle of immorality, and, with the initiated, its purposes as base as any crime. Then why talk about the development of a principle which only means the un-development of humanity?

The name of Christian has been as basely misapplied, for the gospel of Christ declared that it was to make free. It was natural morality toiling for humanity, and not for a particular set of men; not for the present, but for all time. Its kingdom was not of this world, because its only reward was the reward of virtue. But the name has been appropriated by the opposit principles of greed and selfishness, whose tricks of ambition and avarice hav ever defrauded mankind; whose legislation has ever restrained business, fined virtue, and encouraged vice with promotion and reward.

A sect were stigmatized as dogs because they were governed by natural morality, and by the truths found in nature, and their motto was "Fidelity," of which the picture of a dog on their banner was the emblem. Hence the word "dogma," with its derivations, which hav long been made odious, because it has long been unpopular to tell the truth. Has not religious custom misapplied the word "dogma" to mean an arrogant assumption, or a doctrin without evidence—since it never had its foundation in the idea of faith or belief, but in the very act of thinking, therefore in knowledge? And would not a doctrin like that of the laws of gravity, which holds the scales of justice even, be a pure dogma? But the religious saith-the-Lord principle has been held superior to the laws of gravity and mathematics. It has molded falsehoods and gilded them with truth by double meaning of words and double-sense writing, and it has been continually molding old lies into new forms, and making dust a little gilded appear of more value than gold a little dusted o'er.

One grand step in advance will be a new dictionary to disabuse the minds of the masses from many enslaving words. The names of political parties hav been the same babbles of unintelligibility. The millions of honest toilers would naturally suppose that a Republican party meant republicanism, instead of a principle ignoring the Constitution, opposed to state rights, and tending to centralization of power. And there are many men who call themselvs Democrats who are as far from being democrats as the pope is from being a Christian. And judging from the writings of some who call themselvs Liberals, they never hav crept out of the shell of intolerance. Many words hav changed their meaning, but principles never change. The principles of religion, by whatever name, hav been to stultify reason and stimulate dreams. The principles of Liberalism are to wake people out of their dreams and stimulate thought, until each individual shall stand forth a sovereign in the empire of thought. It would be profitable to take a lesson of St. Paul, and no longer go by names and professions of faith, but by works. When we are asked to contribute for building a monument "to one of the greatest of living men," is it not about the same as if we were asked to help immortalize the principle that has robbed us of our liberties, and gathered all the accumulated wealth of the United States for the last twenty-five years into the hands of three thousand men? But Mr. Beecher said, "If it were not for piling up property, man would go back to animalism." It is only religion that ever made a higher plane where wealth can be piled up, and a luxurious living enjoyed without labor. In the fable of the wise fox, when he saw all the tracks going into the lion's den, and none coming back, he did not go in. So if man would throw away his religion and go back to animalism, he might be wise enough not to let all his hard earnings be stripped away from him by these higher plane laws. But laying up against the time of need is animalism, and the insignificant ant was man's school-master that taught him honest toil. So priests and kings received their lessons from the spider and beasts and birds of prey. They love the eagle because the ostentation and the worship are about equal with them and the eagle. But there is more morality to be seen in the hog than in man, with all his boasted religion. I looked across the street one day, and saw a litter of pigs, and their mother defending them from the savage attack of dogs, and other members of their species rushed into the conflict and formed a line of battle in front of the weaker ones, without a general, that would hav done some honor to a general, and they held the enemy in check and gave no inch of ground, although they were fearfully torn and mangled in the conflict, and not one of them ever thought of applying for a pension on account of his vicariousness. This thought was developed in the higher plane, in order to make a bonded debt and sinking fund.

Bond-slaves of tradition, the hog can show you the way to wisdom too. He will not worship a flag that is a flaunting lie, or giv a traitorous kiss; he will not be devoured with parasites, but will roll them in the mire and make mudsills of them; and for a dead fellow he can mourn just as much without spending a million at his wake, or building a monument. Then there is a lesson in economy: "If it were not for piling up property, man would go back to animalism." But the money sharks understood it as well as if they were told, "Giv us preachers a reasonable portion of the swag for keeping up this infamy called religion which supports the higher plane, or you will go back to the level and toil with the toilers."

INVITATION TO A PRAYER MEETING.

"Aug 10, 1885.

"DEAR BROTHER: I take great pleasure in informing you that on Wednesday evening, the 12th inst., our former secretary, W. H. Morris, will lead the Young Men's Meeting. Every member and friend of the association should be present. We shall not hav Mr. Phillips to help us, therefore I am very anxious that the meetings shall not diminish in power or numbers. Pray over it, talk it over with your friends, and let us hav such a meeting as we hav not yet enjoyed. Let us expect great things. Remember the promis: 'If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will and it SHALL be given unto you' (John. xv. 7).

"Please do all in your power. Talk, work, pray!

"L. W. BARNES, Assistant Secretary."

MR. EDITOR: Please publish with proper comments.

LIBERTA.

OAKLAND, CAL., Aug. 16, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: This morning I attended "divine services" at the First Congregational church of this city, of which the late Dr. Buck was a prominent member. The preacher informed us that the time would come when every knee would bow—to a myth. But I hope the time will come when not one knee will bow to a mythical Jehovah, gathered up and handed down to us by our poor, ignorant ancestors.

I worship no God but that of humanity, the Ingersollian God. Some of my friends tell me that the devil has already got a good warm berth selected for me, but I lose no sleep about it. Some of my Christian friends say I am insane. Well, if a disbelief in the existence of a God, a heaven, a devil, a hell, a Holy Ghost, in the working of miracles, etc., constitutes insanity, then I am insane, but they hav made no attempt as yet to put me in an asylum.

No doubt you hav seen accounts in the California papers of the trial of H. F. Prindle for the murder of Dr. Buck. The jury are still out, and at present stand three for conviction and nine for acquittal. I feel safe in stating that seven-eighths of the people in this locality are well convinced that Dr. Buck was guilty of what Mrs. Prindle accused him of, viz., adultery and abortion. A member of Dr. Buck's own church tells me that it was his custom to get all the money he could from the poor for his savior and then get them off his hands as soon as he could.

The more of such rascals we get rid of the better it will be for society. LYMAN SMITH.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., July 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I desire to make a few remarks to my brothers and sisters throughout the world whose good fortune it is to peruse your invaluable paper. I read weekly THE TRUTH SEEKER, Nashville Liberal, Light for Thinkers, and DuQuoin Press, whose editor is a genuin Liberal. Besides, I occasionally read other papers, and recently I was favored with a package of Brother H. L. Green's Magazine, which I prize very highly. Brother Green is, and has been for many years, an energetic worker in the Liberal ranks. He is a great organizer, and has done much good in that line. Such men deserve patronage by the Liberal public. I discover so much in my perusal of Liberalism that is encouraging that I hardly know what to speak of first. The space you giv to your patrons to ventilate their peculiar thoughts to each other is beneficial to the student of human nature, and as a rule Freethinkers prefer investigating the real, the true, and the beauties of nature rather than imaginary things. In your letter department what a grand lesson is presented to the observing mind! All grades and shades of belief are there. We are able to trace the mind in its growth from the lowest strata of orthodoxy to the highest pinnacle of scientific Materialism. It is really amusing to me, and I much enjoy reading the sharp criticisms of our Liberal brothers and sisters. Now, I think this a good thing, and much benefit will accrue therefrom if so be this is conducted in a proper spirit, which I hope to see adhered to, for I maintain that we hav less excuse than any other class of people on earth to descend or occupy the persecuting plane. Discuss and criticise; that is right, for it is calculated to elicit thought and investigation, without which there can be but little progress, but for the sake of our glorious cause let us conduct this as men and women worthy of our name as Liberals. Oh, no, my friends, we cannot afford to partake of the sins and mistakes of the different Christian denominations. I, for one, who hav been there and tasted the gall of bitterness, and suffered the bonds of iniquity, do not propose to worship at that shrine any more. I am happy to see so many souls (whatever that word may mean, for really the term has been used in so many different ways that I do not know but that the word "soul" has become ambiguous) who hav lived under and been emancipated from the persecuting spirit of Christianity, are being elevated to a more ennobling status of humanity, so that they can differ in opinion with their fellow-beings without os-tracising one another. This is sufficient to teach us that Liberalism is a benefit to man, woman, and child, for where there exists toleration we hav corresponding peaceful and happy lives. Of course, none are perfect, and we are all liable to make mistakes at times, but we will be remunerated every time better for a good deed than an evil one.

In this connection I will offer a few thoughts, or rather make a suggestion to the two classes of Liberals—for it is well known there are two classes with us, Materialist and Spiritualist. Now, to my way of thinking, we should not lose sight of one very important thing—that is, we must work together with the utmost harmony in carrying out the principles of Liberalism, and as secularization is the fundamental basis of our line of operations, we should by no manner of means let any ulterior consideration take possession of our minds to impede the progress of the completion of the foundation of our work, for it does seem to me to be self-evident to all observing minds that the benefit to be derived from this grand enterprise will be equally to the advantage of not only the Spiritualists and Materialists, but every sect and ism in our land, from the fact that a secular government, such as we demand, will protect every citizen alike, no matter how humble. Consequently it is the best for all concerned. We know this to be a fact, whether Christians think so or not. We want no discrimination. Equal justice for all—anything short of that is defectiv.

Criticisms on questions of difference between us, such as immortality on one hand, and death ending all on the other, are essential in order to elicit thought, and urge the minds that are somewhat dormant to an investigation. I fully agree with Brother H. L. Green, who says in his March Magazine, page 90, "Whatever one may think of Spiritualism, there are some things relating to it that all honest persons must admit. One is that if it be true it is the most glorious revelation that was ever made to man; all others sink into insignificance when compared with it." So I say. Although there are a few among us who seem to ignore the importance of the investigation of the spiritual phenomena, I tell you that it is like Banquo's ghost, it will not down at one's bidding. Men and women will seek knowledge of matters and things pertaining to the present and future. And all the cold water that can be thrown on those who are in a legitimate way seeking for knowledge in regard to the continued existence of their loved ones who hav passed through the change called death, is not likely to stop them.

I am sorry to see a few of our brothers and sisters use such harsh words against Spiritualists and Spiritualism. I refer to some wholesale assertions I occasionally meet with, condemning the whole thing and all mediums; for I hav been acquainted with some who are thought to be and are called mediumistic, and better and more social and energetic workers in the cause of Liberalism I hav never met. Mr. William Ellison, who was the first president of St. Johns Liberal League, was a thoroughgoing Liberal and and a gentleman in every sense. He never had been contaminated with Christianity, but was an Atheist, until, as he says, he got positiv proof that those we call dead still liv; and, by the way, Brother Ellison is no crank. Of course, his word, though I think it as good as anyone's, is not sufficient to convince or satisfy me, for on similar testimony I once accepted Christianity, and with me I am confident Christianity is forever gone. However, I am, and ever expect to be, a seeker of knowledge. I wish to learn all I can here in this life, and should I be so fortunate in the journey of life as to find positiv proof of a continued existence, I most assuredly will not consult some of our good brothers and sisters who know that death ends all, whether they think it would be best for me to honestly confess, at the risk of being thought that I had an attack of softening of the brain. I refer to some expressions I hav seen, such as, "I am sorry for the loss of our dear Chainey," and again, "Our poor lamented Chainey;" then, again, some one was fearful that our editor was going over to the Spiritualists, as our former editor, Mr. Bennett, did. Oh, what a pity that we, as Liberals, should do our own thinking, and hav independence sufficient to act according to our honest convictions. I am not in the least troubled about any screws being loose in the top of Brother Chainey's head, neither do I apprehend any great danger of Brother Macdonald, so long as the THE TRUTH SEEKER is conducted so well as at present.

Let each work in his own legitimate sphere, and while wielding the pen in our criticisms of our little differences of opinions with one hand, let us not forget to take hold with the other hand of the ship of state. and bear her aloft on the basis of secularization. For, I tell you, should the party get in power that wish to recognize God and Christ in our Constitution, there will be something more serious than a leg broken. If we Infidels escape with our necks we will be more fortunate than many who lived in the past ages under similar power. In conclusion I will say, let us all concentrate effort for the benefit of humanity the world over; let the world be our country and to do good our religion, and the result will be well. I am glad there are no more bickerings among us than there are. It is true Brother Winter givs some pretty hard hits now and then with his dogmatic expressions, but let us just attribute it to his peculiar organization; we all hav our defects, and one thing we must admit—his good qualities predominate to a great extent, for I see he contributes generously toward Freethought; he helps to hold up the hands of those who are in front of the battle for mental liberty. Such are worthy of praise. Then there is our great sister Elmina, a noble soul doing much good work; and even were I a Spiritualist I could commiserate her, for I am persuaded she, like myself, has met with some discouraging experiences in the investigation of continued existence. But I hav not yet acquired as much knowledge as she seems to hav—that is, to know there is no such thing as a spirit. Neither am I blessed with a knowledge of the fact there is; so I certainly need help some way. I do not blame Elmina for hating fraud and deception, for I hav sent two sealed letters and a dollar each time to C. F. Pidgeon, of Indianapolis, Ind., for an answer, and got no answer; neither was I as fortunate as Sister Martin, of Cairo. In her book on Spiritual experiences, speaking of sending money to different mediums, she says that in all cases where the mediums could get no communication the money was refunded, but, alas! not so in my case. The first letter the medium says he did not receive; the second one he acknowledged, but was from home at the time he wrote to me, being at Colfax, Ind. He stated he had been informed that there was one received in his absence, and on his return he would giv it his attention. Now, I hav gullibility enough to believe he fulfilled that part of his promis—I mean that he gave it his attention. Yes, indeed, I am so destitute of any doubts on that part of the performance that I even believe with all my heart (or whatever organ is called into action to cause one to believe) that he opened the letter (I mean the outside one which contained the dollar), and got the coveted treasure, little as the amount was. It is not the amount that has the bearing on my mind, it is the principle. If Solomon was a little reckless in his love for women, his head was level when he said "the love of money was the root of all evil." I hav written two letters of inquiry to Mr. Pidgeon, but I get no answer. Possibly Mr. Pidgeon is like the one we read of in Noah's Ark. You recollect there were two sent out to hunt dry land and one never returned. Oh, no, they were doves—the moral is obvious. I seem to be prone to bad luck as well as Sister Elmina. However, this bit of bad luck is not sufficient to deter me from investigating for truth. neither do I yet believe all mediums to be frauds and tricksters.

By the way, from the report recently from Liberal, Mo. Brother Walser, from the position in which his name appears, seems to be getting into enchanted grounds. Well, this is getting to be a funny world, but as it is the only one I recollect seeing, I must be going, and try to find out all I can. So, wishing all peace, happiness and prosperity,

Farewell, WM. A. THOMPSON.

CINCINNATI, O., Sept. 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Once more I send a few lines, which I hope will shine upon thy page. The bright and brilliant star of Materialism is now casting its light upon the dark pages of past superstitions and groveling ignorance. More and deeper it penetrates the minds of millions who are now disgusted with the numerous deceits practiced by charlatans in the name of religion.

The great intelligences of the age are more than ever satisfied that the true and solid ground on which all can stand, and that without discord or dispute, is the grand philosophy of Materialism, which ignores every vestige of all Spiritualistic hobbyisms, and claims all nature for its temple and all humanity for its brotherhood. It repudiates all sectarianisms, and knows no other sentiment than that which nature and reason dictate. Sir, that which claims a distinction from nature and sets up a power outside and independent of nature is the cause of many evils, dividing and subdividing the great human family into carping and malignant organizations, ever ready to injure or destroy each other if not restrained by civil power.

Instead of religions giving peace to the world, they hav been and still are the most contentious and disturbing element of discord, and most destructiv of all systems.

Materialism means peace, love, union, morality, and intellectual progress in everything which administers to the happiness and prosperity of man, woman, and child.

Fraternally yours, T. WINTER.

DAVID CITY, NEB., Aug. 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I am wonderfully pleased with the books I hav bought of you, especially "The Holy Bible Abridged" and "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." Send more—especially "The Godly Women of the Bible." If the women would but read the last, there would be such a shaking up of the dry bones and stinking carcasses of bigoted and superstitious notions and beliefs that the sky-pilots' occupation would be gone. They would hav to go to digging potatoes for a living, or go hungry. I hav felt the power of their persecutions, and am branded Ingersoll No. 2, the Infidel of David City. But then, I tell them that when their sisters in the church will go the rounds soliciting alms to build a parsonage with, and bolt straight into a saloon and take money from the bartender over the bar that he took from poor devils in exchange for whisky to get drunk on (as they did in this town), they are no better than he who sold the whisky; and that if there were a house of ill-fame here, they would take the wages of their sisters' shame to build a temple to their God with. Since I gave them that shot, they hav left me alone openly, but to my backs they are plunging it into me up to the hilt. They dare not face me, but, Christian-like, shoot me from behind; and, if they dared, I would be nailed to the cross; but, thanks to the growth of Liberalism, I am out of the reach of open harm.

Truly, E. R. DEAN.

CENTERVILLE, UTAH, Aug. 30, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I am home again from the mountains, where I hav been working in a mine by where perpetual snow lies, where the sublime scenes of nature are to be seen in such magnificent grandeur that it seems out of the power of my tongue or pen to describe them. The grand scenes from those lofty peaks and ridges are sublime. Many thousands of square miles of country are to be seen in the mighty distance with the naked eye from where I hav been. The mighty sheet of the strong briny waters that compose the great Salt Lake, with high mountains jutting out in many places like islands in the ocean, is grand and sublime to behold. The lofty pines and other trees, standing like silent sentinels on the steep hillsides displaying their evergreen branches, add beauty and grandeur to the scene. Then in the mighty distance we see the divine orb of day make its glorious appearance, charging the atmosphere with the sacred principles of life, bringing all things into existence that we behold, in accordance with nature's immutable law. Here it is cause and effect, cause and effect, for evermore. My mind seems lost in wonder and admiration when I reflect on these things, and it causes me to see and understand the folly and humbug of all kinds of priestcraft, with their Bibles and Korans and all other theological trash, that keep the human mind in darkness and ignorance, of which all priestly thugs take advantage, and feast themselvs on the credulity of the people. But it seems there is a grand day dawning, which means the beginning of the final end of all this priestly, theological, humbugging, and Bible business. Here in this priest-ridden territory old Taylor, G. Q Cannon, and other beastly, treasonable thugs are skulking and hiding from the law; but I hope the United States government will take stringent measures to wipe out this treasonable, filthy, and adulterous outfit calling itself the kingdom of God, for it is a bitter curse and outrage to this delightful territory. They hav put some of the beastly, adulterous scoundrels in the penitentiary, and I hope the United States laws will be vindicated and put in full force here, and let justice hav its proper claim and demands.

Well, I must change the subject by telling you I received the three pamphlets all right, and must say they are three clinchers. Mr. O. B. Whitford's, and Mr. Babcock's, and the "Bible Anthology"—they are all three eye-openers. And now I want some more, per inclosed list.

It appears you are going to hav a grand time at the coming Albany Convention, and I say, Success to it and its noble speakers. And I hope Mrs. Cady Stanton and Miss Helen H. Gardener and other ladies will put in some telling blows in defense of truth and right. I wish they could come to this territory for a while and break the fetters and shackles that bind the mental powers of their fair sisters here. Then I often wish we had Mr. C. B. Reynolds, Mr. Remsburg, Mr. Jamieson, and the noble Ingersoll. Well, perhaps there is a mighty shaking awaiting poor priest-ridden Utah yet, for I perceive the leaven is working with effect in the world, and I suppose Utah will come in for her share.

Well, I must close this missiv, as I hav neither time nor space to say more, except that I admire the way Miss Wixon is conducting the Corner for the little folks, and I will say, Miss Wixon, you are engaged in a wider and grander field of usefulness than you are fully aware of, and in years to come many that are children now will rise up and bless you.

WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

WARREN, MO., Aug 30, 285.

MR EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which please send me one copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL; one copy of Paine's "Age of Reason;" one copy of J. E. Remsburg's "Bible Morals;" and for the balance that is left send me three cartoons of the issue of July 11th, and as many of the "Modern Balaams" as that left will pay for. After having read "Bible Morals," I intend that all shall perform missionary service, and, instead of sending my means abroad, I propose to try and open the eyes of the benighted heathen at home. I liv in the midst of a community that contains a large number of people whose religion lasts from the time they appear on Sunday for Sabbath-school until the ceremony of the day is performed. Nevertheless we hav a goodly sprinkling of Freethinkers in our midst, but many of them are moral cowards, and fear Mrs. Grundy. That old lady and myself had a rupture many years ago, and people hav found out that she slandered me, so I go on careering in my course, giving blows when assailed, and always striking a vulnerable point when I see one. I hav been a Freethinker ever since I was a child, and received my first pabulum from the spoon of the Boston Investigator thirty-three years ago, my father being then a subscriber to that journal. He still livs, and time only tends to strengthen his convictions, and he lately read with much pleasure and avidity the three copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER with "Catholicism in Ancient Mexico," by McArthur. Early impressions are lasting, and though I was but eleven years old when I began reading the Investigator, impressions were made which caused me to reason until I became a confirmed Infidel. My outspoken opinions hav many times operated against me financially, but still I manage to liv and am making some money, and I intend to spend as much as I can spare in the distribution of Freethought literature and the dissemination of truth. Every subscriber to a Liberal journal should be thoroughly alive to the importance of early mental training and reasoning, and should urge upon the young in his own family, as well as his neighbors, to peruse Liberal literature, and he should see to it that they are provided with interesting Liberal and scientific books that will interest and amuse, as well as instruct, in the right direction. We should not, for a moment, argue that we hav no right to instruct our neighbors' children. Don't the sky-pilots do this continually with your children? That is the way they propagate their religion. If we wish to make proselytes, we must begin among the young. That is the reason there is so much ignorance and superstition in the world to-day. The Catholics accomplish the most of their work through the plasticity of the infant mind. The same result is reached by the Protestants by means of the Sunday-school. When I get through with reading my TRUTH SEEKERS I giv one-half to a friend who takes the paper with me "snucks;" we felt too poor to stand the expense alone, and bear the expense equally. Hereafter, we will each take it separately. We then mail them to those whom we think will read them, and we can see that we are beginning to create a considerable diversion. There is no book or paper that has so much diversity of good and healthful reading matter, tending all in the same direction, as THE TRUTH SEEKER, and if it, and other Liberal literature, were judiciously distributed among the young men and ladies who hav inquiring minds, for some time prior to some of the distracted and protracted efforts of the sky-pilots, it would go far toward rendering nugatory their pernicious influences over the minds of those who are not in the habit of much reasoning. The great diversity of the subjects presented for consideration, the able manner in which each subject is treated, and the absolutely unanswerable argumentativness of some of them, are sure to open up the eyes of reasonable people, and direct their thoughts into modes of thought and channels of reason that they never would hav taken had not their attention been arrested in that way. But I find that I am digressing from my original intention, for I had intended being quite brief. At some future time, when I am under the "inspiration" you may hear from me in a more prolix manner.

Respectfully yours, etc., WM. W. MOORE, M.D.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Days I Love.

Not the days when glancing sunshine
Flecks the smiling fields with gold,
And the chanting warblers' music
The delighted thickets hold,
When the scented blossoms swinging
Yield their fragrance to the air—
'Tis not then my restless spirit
In the quiet joy would share.

But the days when fiercely rushing
Sweeps the wind the forest through,
And like charging war-steeds driven
Speed the clouds across the blue;
When the branches wildly tossing
To the heedless storm complain,
And the roaring of the torrent
Mingles with their wild refrain.

Then it is my spirit rises
And my quickened pulse beats fast,
With the swaying of the forest,
With the trumpet-ringing blast;
Like a sounding strain of triumph
Seem their swelling notes to me,
And in each loud blast come echoing
Pæans wild of liberty. D. L. B.

The Blind Men and the Elephant.

[The following, by George Saxe, we believe, nicely hits off quacks and theologians:]

It was six men of Industan,
To learning much inclined,
Who went to see the elephant,
Though all of them were blind,
That each by observation
Might satisfy his mind.

The first approached the animal,
And happening to fall
Against his broad and sturdy side
At once began to bawl,
"God bless me! but the elephant
Is very like a wall!"

The second, feeling of the tusk,
Cried, "Oh, what hav we here,
So very round, and smooth, and sharp?
To me 'tis mighty clear
This marvel of an elephant
Is very like a sphere!"

The third reached out his eager hand
And felt about the knee;
"What most this wondrous beast is like
Is mighty plain!" quoth he.
"This wonder of an elephant
Is very like a tree!"

The fourth approached the animal,
And happening to take
The squirming trunk within his hand,
Thus boldly up and spake,
"I see!" quoth he, "the elephant
Is very like a snake!"

The fifth, who chanced to touch the ear,
Cried, "Even the blindest man
May tell what this resembles most,
Deny the truth who can;
'Tis clear as day, the elephant
Is very like a fan!"

The sixth no sooner had begun
About the beast to grope,
Than seizing on the swinging tail,
That fell within his scope,
"I see!" quoth he, "the elephant
Is very like a rope!"

And so those men of Industan
Disputed loud and long,
Each in his own opinion
Exceeding stiff and strong;
Though each was partly in the right,
And all of them were wrong.

MORAL.

So, oft in theologic wars,
The disputants, I ween,
Rail on in utter ignorance
Of what each other mean,
And prate about an elephant
Not one of them has seen.

Founded on Fact.

"Oh, what a lovely morning!" exclaimed Rose Winters, as she, with her parents, brother, and sister, were on their way to church one Sunday morning in May.

"Yes," said her father, "almost too lovely to last, I fear. Do you see that dark cloud in the west? I hav been watching it for some time. Although quite small, I think from its motion we shall hav a young cyclone before we can reach the church."

Mr. Winters, with his family, had started quite early that morning to attend church some ten or twelve miles from home. In southern Minnesota, where they are living, storms come up quite suddenly in summer, as well as in winter. Rose was eighteen years old, her sister sixteen, and her brother fourteen; all quite smart and intelligent, but they had been taught to believe there was a ruler somewhere in the sky who ruled the winds and storms, and sent these tornadoes as punishments for some sin committed by his erring children. Therefore it is no wonder they all exclaimed, "Oh! what shall we do? Let us turn around and try to get home and into our cyclone cellar before the storm reaches us."

"I hardly think it best," said Mr. Winters, "for, if it is a cyclone, we could not reach home, and, besides, there is a large house a mile or so ahead where we would all be comfortable. Do you not see those nice, large buildings on that rise of ground yonder?"

"Yes, but that is where John White livs, and he's an Infidel, and so are all his children."

"Yes, and his wife too," said Mrs. Winters. "It is a regular hot-bed of infidelity. Can we not go somewhere else? I hav never spoken with them, and don't allow our children to notice theirs anywhere. Such abominable creatures! I don't see why God allows such people to liv."

"Well, it is the only place we can reach where ourselvs and horses can be made comfortable," replied Mr. Winters. "The most of the settlers along here hav no barns, using straw sheds in place of them, and their houses are mostly little shanties."

By this time they had reached the farm-house of Mr. White, the Infidel, and, the storm coming in the opposit direction much faster than any horses could travel, they were glad to drive into the yard, where they were met by the family of Mr. White, who had been watching the storm, and saw them approaching, the boys taking the team to the barn, and the buggy into the carriage-house, Mr. and Mrs. White ushering them into the house just as the first drops of rain came down. None of the family had ever entered the house before, and all were surprised to see things in such good order.

Everything about the house was clean and neat, and seemed fitted to its place. In a bay window in the sitting-room was a profusion of plants—some of them very rare. A few rich pictures adorned the walls, while the center table was covered with books and papers for the children. In one corner was a large book-case filled with books of all sorts, or rather books treating on a great many different subjects.

"Well," said Mr. White, after a few commonplace observations had been made, "I am almost glad the storm came up, for it, no doubt, compelled you to call. We hav lived here three years, and few except our near neighbors hav called on us. It seems lonely, as we lived in a thickly settled place in the East, where people were very social and, I might almost say, seemed to belong to one family."

"Yes; no doubt it does seem lonesome, but you do not attend our church and we hav so much to do to keep up meetings, Sunday-schools, festivals, etc., that we hav little time to go outside our own neighbourhood, and Mrs. Winters is very zealous in religious matters, doing all she can for the cause of Christ, and doing her visiting among members of our church."

"Well, for my part," said Mr. White, "I think we owe a duty to the human family, and creeds or churches should not interfere to prevent our doing that duty. For instance, if some stranger moved into our neighborhood, I should not stop to inquire what church he belonged to, or whether he belonged to any, but should think it best to make the acquaintance of himself and family. Or some one might be sick or meet some other misfortune, and I should feel it my duty to call on them and render such assistance as I am able."

This and much more conversation passed between them, and the children became so much interested in it they did not notice Mrs. White when she left the room about eleven o'clock to prepare dinner. She soon returned, however, and saying that, their callers being disappointed in going to church, a little music would perhaps be acceptable, requested her four children to sing a quartet they had lately learned, entitled, "The Joys of Home," Herbert, twenty years old, playing the organ and singing bass, his sisters the other parts, and, as they were well trained, they rendered it exceedingly well. Before they were through Mrs. Winters's head dropped, and her eyes filled with tears. Rose was thrilled through and through, being a great lover of music. After one or two more pieces, she, with brother and sister, joined them in singing some pieces from "The Gospel Hymns," these being all the pieces they were acquainted with. The ice was now fairly broken, and when they repaired to the dining-room a happier and livelier company is seldom seen. After dinner there was a general conversation for two hours or more, the young people's tongues being loosed, and the old people being drawn toward each other. The time passed so pleasantly they were all surprised to hear the clock strike four, and the Winters took their leave.

The rain had ceased about noon, the sun coming out had dried the mud with the aid of the wind, and everything was lovely again. The heaviest part of the storm had passed to the north of them, where much damage was done to buildings and timber. They drove some distance in silence, but at length Mr. Winters asked his wife how she liked the White family.

"Why," said she, "I am just delighted with them! But I feel so mean and small when I think of the injustice I hav done them! I hardly know how to meet them again; to think how prejudiced I was before knowing them! But I shall find out, for Mrs. White has promised to call on us within two weeks with her whole family."

Two years hav passed since the storm, and next week Herbert White, on his twenty-second birthday, is to be married to Rose Winters; and we all wish them much joy. I should not much wonder if some of the others in the two families were to follow suit, as they all are on the best of terms. Herbert is to hav a part of his father's farm, and will liv with his people until his house, which is now being built, is completed. Mrs. Winters has greatly modified her views on Infidelity, and admits that true manhood and womanhood do exist outside the church. I think she will turn Infidel before long, for she is reading some of Mr. White's books, and when one gets to reading and reasoning he is very apt to become Liberal-minded. She is now reading "Which Way?" by Colonel Ingersoll, and I think his way will soon be her way. As for the rest of the family, they are already outspoken Liberals. ALICE W. PEABODY.

God or Dog?

Little Lyle said the other day he saw God peeking around the corner of the house. His aunt said she guessed not. Lyle said he thought it looked like him, but it might hav been Charley, the dog! This reminds me of the story of the little girl who had been told that God is everywhere, that he followed her, and could see all she did.

The little one thought it hard to be watched all the time. She had a pet dog who followed her about a great deal. One day, as she was going out, the dog prepared to follow her as usual. "Go back, Fido," said she, "I don't want you. It is enough to hav God tagging at my heels all the time without you!"

Egyptian Superstition.

The Egyptians hav some knowledge of astronomy, that is, so far as it is connected with astrology, their principal science. Alchemy they also hav some knowledge of, but hav never been able to change base metal into gold or precious stones. Alchemy, however, I may add in this connection, is really the parent of chemistry.

If Galileo and Bruno were alive, and lived in Egypt, they would find it hard work indeed to dispose of their books, for with most of the nativs of that far-away country it is the sun and moon that move, and the earth that remains stationary. This reminds me of a story I once heard. A gentleman was traveling through the mountains of Kentucky a few years ago, and stopping one night at a tavern in a small village, the conversation turned upon planetary motion. All present believed the earth revolved except one old orthodox fellow, and he declared it was an utter impossibility for the "world to run," for the Bible strictly taught that it rested on four foundations. The gentleman tried to convince him of his error, but, finding his arguments falling on "stony ground," he concluded to withdraw from the contest, when our Christian friend spoke up, saying,

"If the world turns, as you say it does, I shall find out to-night."

"How?" asked the gentleman.

"I'll tell you to-morrow," returned the old Bible-believer.

Meeting him the next day the gentleman asked,

"Well, did you discover whether the earth revolved, as you said you were going to do last night?"

"I did, for a fact."

"Indeed! What means did you employ?"

"I just placed a potato on a stump of a tree, and when I got up this morning it was still there."

"Yes, I understand; but how could you ascertain by that," asked the gentleman, sorely puzzled to know what the man meant.

"Why," and the orthodox chap spoke very confidently, "if the earth turned round the potato would hav fallen off. I thought any fool knew that." Comment is useless.

According to their rather limited knowledge of astronomy, the Egyptians believe that the sun and moon move each day from east to west around the earth, which to them is of a disk shape, and surrounded by a circular mountain, inhabited by the ginn, or the genii, as mentioned in the "Arabian Nights."

Next week I shall tell the young folks something of the Egyptian religion and imaginary heaven, etc. D. B. COZINE.

Correspondence.

Aug. 28th.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is a long time since I wrote you a letter. I do not like to write very well, but mamma says she does lots of things that she does not like to do, but does it because she thinks it right.

One week more of vacation, then school begins. Will it make you feel bad when I tell you that I am sorry I do not like my teacher? She is not kind like my other teacher, for she was, oh, so kind! And all of the scholars loved her; but she died. I went to her funeral, as she wished all of her scholars to do. The minister said God took her to liv with him, to sing and praise him forever. Oh, dear! I should get so tired of singing all the time. Wouldn't you?

I go to Sunday-school. We hav a new minister, and he is the strangest-looking man I ever saw. When he says Jesus Christ his mouth screws 'way round almost to his ear. He never looks off from his notes while preaching, and does not tell us stories as our other minister did, so I do not go very often.

Will you please write me a little letter all my own? I will sometime tell you of my trip to the Beach, but I am tired and want to go to play. Good-bye.

From your little friend, CORA.

The Missing Link
—IN—
MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, aud since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense aud defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the realty of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. BIBLE MYTHS,

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. BIBLE MYTHS shows this.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Poetry.

'He Answers Prayer."

He rests at last; free from all pain and sorrow,
Which, through all his weary years,
Hav sat like a grim monster, ready to devour
The little happiness to him held out
By the fair hand of mercy. He rests at last,
The eternal sleep of peace. And the pale and bended wife,
Stricken down by this heaviest grief of all upon her thrust,
Gazes with madness upon the form
To her most dear of all this world's endowments,
The father of her children, her sustenance,
Her life, her all.
And standing thus, she feels to curse him
To whom before in all the life that Unto her'd been given she had poured forth
Her supplication.
For had she not, with bowed head and Contrite heart, implored of him who
"Helps in time of need" to "Save, O Lord, in pity
Save the father of my children.
Spare him unto them yet a little longer?'
Meager pittance, "A little longer." And failing now
In giving unto her this last great craving
Of her crushed and bleeding heart,
Had he not broken troth with her, and left her merciless?
And pondering thus brought back to
Memory's view the sorrows of the years gone by,
When thrice before in this same agony
The darlings of her heart were torn away,
And this same God who "hears and answers prayer"
Turned from her pleadings heartlessly,
And, while her eyes do open to the truth
So suddenly upon her thrust, exclaims she
In the deepest anguish of her heart, "There is no God!"
If, in our hours of greatest trial and of Sorest need, he does withhold his blessings from his children,
What need of him? And thus the cry of Millions rise in air.
The nation begs high heaven to "stay the hand,"
And yet has lived to see a Lincoln—
The preserver of a nation, the emancipator
Of a trodden people—cut down ere he had
Scarcely passed the noonday of his glory.
And yet another great and gifted martyr, who,
From the poor and lowly boy that toiled at Humble labor, "winning as he went
Each neighbor for a friend to cheer the way,"
High rose, a self-made man, to fill
The highest station given to man by our most Glorious nation. And when fell
The assassin's blow, the pulse of the great world
Stood still. And, prayers still unavailing,
His life "ebbed o'er the threshold of the day,"
And the waves of the wild sea mingled with
Sad voices in the requiem lullaby.
And yet again we're called upon to mourn
The loss of one who, when the call "To arms"
Was given, with quick response did hurry
To the front, and, while defeat
Oppressed the stoutest heart with the awful
Possibility of national destruction,
Did lead his army on to win great victories,
From Donaldson to Appomattox, and thus
A nation save from peril.
And when the enemy were vanquished.
And the victor's laurels were upon his brow,
How like the unassuming man he was,
To thrust the sword not deeper still into the bleeding wound,
But take it not at all, and thus bring forth
The crowning glory of his life!
And when with honors and devotions measureless
The millions crowned their chieftain,
With what modest, unostentatious pride
Accepted he the priceless treasure!
But while we, who've never known the laureled dead
Except by deeds of honor and renown,
So deeply feel the loss of our great hero, how much more
Overwhelming is the grief of those to whom
He was endeared by all the closest ties
Humanity has given!
And while the people's voices mingled with their prayers,
No answer came. And a few feet of soil
Is all that's left him now, husband, father, patriot, and friend.
Though oft called up by memories fond and sweet,
No more for him the sound of fife and drum
Shall call "to victory" or "hail the conquering hero."

LIZETTA.

A Bitter Campaign.

The excitement that has been raging for the last ten days over the election of a new leader for the Tompkinsville branch of the Salvation Army to take the place of the late captain, who died from a hereditary attack of delirium tremens, has been partially allayed at last by the elevation of the candidate of the Ananias and Sapphira division to this important position, after the most bitterly personal campaign in the history of the Army. It was evident from the beginning that no ordinary man could obtain the place, and each division of the Army therefore selected its fittest member, and prepared for a mighty struggle.

The candidate of the Ananias and Sapphira division possessed qualifications that seemed to entitle him to the first consideration, and his record was a brilliant one. He first figured before the public as a horrible example upon the temperance lecture platform, a position for which he was eminently fitted by temperament and disposition. Indeed, his entire career had been one of which he was justly proud. His friends proudly advanced the fact that he had stolen money and run away from home when he was only eight years old, and that since then he had not done a stroke of honest work save during the various terms he had served in penal institutions. They pointed with satisfaction to the fact that he had learned to smoke when only nine years of age, and boasted that he had been twice arrested for drunkenness before he reached the age of twelve.

The Tower of Babel division presented an even more illustrious early record for their candidate. They brought affidavits to prove that his father was a professional housebreaker, who was even then finishing a twenty years' sentence in Sing Sing prison, and that his mother had served several terms for shoplifting and was a habitual drunkard, whereas the parents of the other candidate were people of entire respectability. This point was bitterly contested, one party claiming that it was more creditable, from the Army's point of view, to break away from early home training than to merely grow into habits influenced by the associations of earliest youth, while the other party insisted that consideration should be shown their candidate for an illustrious parentage, and claimed that the laws of heredity proved that the vices of his ancestors were latent with him. The Tower of Babel division further showed that their candidate had been educated in the House of Refuge, and that he had committed a fairly creditable burglary upon a grocery store when he was but thirteen years old, and had been frequently in the police courts on various minor charges before he reached his majority.

Since his twenty-first year, however, his friends were obliged to admit that his career had been less creditable than that of the candidate of the Ananias and Sapphira party, since he had been sentenced to ten years for burglary, and had two years and six months added to his term for inciting a revolt in the prison, while the other candidate had never done a longer term than five years for stealing a watch from a drunken man. The tide of feeling in the Army was consequently strong in favor of the choice of the Ananias and Sapphira division, when the Tower of Babel party advanced the assertion, backed up by certified copies of the records of the court, that their candidate had been tried for mayhem, and though he had been acquitted of the charge he could hardly be considered to blame, since his lawyer had bought up the jury. The Ananias and Sapphira party at once investigated this story, but though they found that the mayhem had been committed under great provocation it turned the tide against their candidate.

There was no time to be lost, and the Ananias and Sapphira party at once issued a circular announcing that their candidate had once been tarred and feathered for robbing and beating a blind woman, that he had frequently been arrested for wife-beating, and was a bigamist. There was an instant revulsion in his favor. But on the day before the election the Tower of Babel branch sprang a story to the effect that their man had once set fire to a crowded tenement house, which scorched a child before it was subdued, and would hav caused fearful loss of life if the flames had not been discovered, and that their candidate had an uncle on his father's side hanged for murder. Again the tide of feeling in the Army was swayed back, and the election of the Tower of Babel candidate seemed assured.

But the Ananias and Sapphira party withheld their most potent argument until the last. Just before the balloting began they flooded the barracks of the Army with handbills stating that their candidate had been tried for murder, and giving the number of his portrait in the Rogues' Gallery. The result was beyond their wildest hopes, for the Army voted in a solid body for the candidate of the Ananias and Sapphira party, and it was not discovered until his election was announced that the circular was a roorbach, since the trial was for mere manslaughter, and that only in the second degree, and he was acquitted on the plea of self-defense, which was definitly proved.

However, the Army will not go back of the returns, and the new captain enters upon his term of office with the best wishes of the entire organization.—New York Times.

Stray Scraps.

The revivalist Sam Jones, speaking of ignorant ministers, says: "There's many an old air-gun shooting round over this country," never suspecting that he is one himself.

"The martyrs of one age are the prophets of the next," said Rev. Dr. Newman in his Grant funeral discourse. Well, that is no news. We reformers hav been teaching this to the clergy all these years, only substituting heroes for prophets.

The Hartford Post says: "Profane swearing has become unfashionable in England." Should this wave extend over to America the chief stock in trade of our pulpiteers, including Jo Cook, Talmage, our evangelists, Salvationists, and all other peripatetics, will be gone. Alas, alas! what would they do for the good old times of hell—sheol, and hades, I mean?

At the Cape Cod Spiritualists' camp-meeting, Harwich, Mass., July 19th, it is reported that at the close of Mr. Fuller's one-hour speech for the afternoon, "Mr. J. D. Styles followed with one hundred and sixty tests!" Pretty lively spirits those that could get off one hundred and sixty tests at the close of an afternoon's session on a camp-ground. All things may be possible with spirits as with God.

"A North Carolina editor who made a hyena-like attack on General Grant's name recently, dropped dead before the paper had been mailed to subscribers," says a religious journal. Well, what of it? Do you intend to hav us understand that God worked a miracle as in the case of preserving the life of the engineer on board the Reybold in the late Delaware cyclone, while he let the pilot perish? Truly, your God is no respector of persons if these events are special providences.

A learned Chinaman says Buddhism was introduced into China by accident. One of the emperors of the Han dynasty heard of the remarkable teachings and works of Christ, and sent an embassy to see him and bring back his teachings. The embassy, on arriving in India, heard of Buddha, and supposed he was the sage whom they were seeking. They obtained his books and returned at once to China, where the emperor cordially received Buddhism. A very fortunate mistake, for, of the two, Buddhism is the best religion. What a pity that some such accident could not hav prevented Christianity from spreading all over the world!

At Weirs, N. H, the subject for discussion by the Universalists at their General Conference, August 6th, was "God's Love to Us." Who is "us?" Surely not the toiling masses, who never know rest; not the constant sufferers from disease; not the victims of accidents, as in the late cyclones, freshets, and similar casualties; not the tyrant's slave; not the wronged and oppressed of earth and the unfortunate everywhere, who are in the majority! Then who are the "us" whom God is so good to and loves so well? Why, just we ministers who liv on the fat of the land, and a few favorits who are dandled in the lap of ease, wealth, fashion, and authority, with the laborers' earnings for their support, are the "us" whom God loves!

The New England Chautauqua Assembly, South Framingham, Mass., of which mention was made in my last Scraps, so far violated the law of Moses (God), "Thou shalt bear no burdens on the seventh day" (Saturday), as to pass stringent laws against admitting people to the grounds on the first day of the week (Sunday), compelling them to break the Sabbath (Saturday), in order that the first day (Sunday) might not be desecrated by travel, bustle, and business generally! How these consistent Christians do strain at a gnat and swallow a corn-mill in endeavoring to keep sacred a day not one hint of which is given in their God's only infallible revelation to the world, which is our only rule of faith and practice while jogging along through this mundane sphere of realities to the spiritual myths of "kingdom come!"

Evangelist Moody, during his second day's session of the convention at Northfield, Mass., Aug. 6th, said he could not understand how a person could believe in the New Testament and not in the Old. Fully two hundred prophecies in the Old Testament about Jesus Christ hav been literally fulfilled, which goes to prove its truth. Is that so? Will Rev. Mr. Moody debate that question in public, point out those two hundred prophecies, and prove their fulfilment? If so, he will render a significant triumph to his side of the contest, for it has never yet been done, and we venture to say not one of those two hundred prophecies of which he boasts can be proved to refer to Jesus Christ only as they are spurious interpolations thrust in since the person or event to which they are supposed to refer lived or occurred. Why did God so write his prophecies as to require them to be dealt with just like human twaddle—proved?

At the New England Assembly Prof. G. Stanley Hall lectured on "Children's Reading," which he summed up as follows: "As soon as the child is well out of the mere mechanical regime, its education is confined wholly to a series of myths." He said that "this system partakes largely of Plato's theory." Now, I do not like this system. A child can understand a truth as readily as a lie, for a myth and a lie are the same; and when taught a truth is in possession of a truth, but when taught a lie must unlearn that lie before it can reach the truth. For this reason I do not approve of legends, fables, fairy stories, Santa Claus lies, and the whole train of falsehoods of Gods, Christs, Holy Ghosts, angels, and devils, with the holy men and women of Bible times, stuffed into impressible little children either inside or outside of Sunday-school ignorance and fanaticism.

"LONDON, July 13th.—Rev. Mr. Spurgeon yesterday preached a powerful sermon on the patrician iniquity of London, as exposed by the Pall Mall Gazette during the past week. Mr. Spurgeon took for his text Romans ii, 16. St. Paul, the preacher said, felt it necessary to mention the hideous vices of the heathens, and left on record an exposure of the sin of his day which crimsoned the cheek of the modest when they read it. It had to be written to shame the abominations of an age almost past shame. There was judgment for sin in this world for both men and nations. Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Rome, and Egypt were empires of oppression and cruelty and full of iniquity. When the sin of these people could no longer be tolerated they were wiped off the face of the earth. Thus of nations. But no one could tell what bloodshedding and suffering came upon men for their iniquities. 'Why should London,' exclaimed the preacher, 'be more favored than Rome? What is there about our boastful race on this or the other side of the Atlantic that we should monopolize God's favor? God would judge men's secret sins, too vile to be spoken of, and which cause the nation to shudder when dragged, as they ought to be, into daylight. Deeds of night, of the closed room, done when the finger is put upon the lip, and the act committed which must never be mentioned lest the man himself be regarded as an outcast, abhorred even of his fellow-sinners, all, all, shall be revealed. All that we hav for our own comfort blinded our eyes to and averted our gaze from as things inconvenient to see—shall be revealed. We here make a difference between the secret and the public, but God does not. Every secret sin is secret only by a lying fantasy of the imagination. It is public before God. It is necessary for the church to warn men of what will happen if they continue in their sins, and not keep them in a fool's paradise until they be sent down to hell's damnation. It becomes every preacher to cry aloud and spare not." I will only add that a friend sent me the Pall Mall Gazette, and that the iniquity therein exposed is in keeping with other crimes of Christian England. Glasgow has also unearthed equal outrages. Let "England's greatest pulpit orator" speak, but why should such as he say, "We here make a difference between the secret and the public, but God does not," when God never thought of revealing the evil, and the Pall Mall editor at the hands of a Christian people came very near imprisonment for publishing it, while God was "asleep," and the Prince of Wales withdrew his patronage from the paper! Oh, Christian consistency!

Gems of Thought.

WHAT a waste of money! And how much more good it would hav done could it hav been spent for man, instead of for God, in making the wretched homes of the poor more comfortable! God does not need the house, but the poor do sadly need the wealth it cost. D. M. Bennett, on St. Fiou's Cathedral.

DISTRUSTFUL sense with modest caution speaks,
It still looks home, and short excursions makes;
But rattling nonsense in full volleys breaks,
And, never shocked, and never turned aside,
Bursts out resistless, with a thund'ring tide.
—Pope.

WHEN we read in the Bible that God made man in his own image, we may see in that statement a reflex of the fact that man makes God in his image. It is a necessity of his nature so to do. All that we converse with or think of takes its character from ourselvs. The sensible world of our experience is a texture woven on the loom of our nerves; the ideal world is a fabric fashioned in the mold of our thought. We think as we are. And so man fashions his god in his own image; endows him with the attributes he has learned to respect in the wisest and best of human kind. He is right in so doing, for what better can anyone imagin than the highest possible degree of the best known kind?—Dr. Hedge's Ways of the Spirit.

IN the estimation of good orthodox Christians, I am a criminal, because I am trying to take from loving mothers, fathers, brothers. sisters, husbands, wives, and lovers the consolations naturally arising from a belief in an eternity of grief and pain. I want to tear, break, and scatter to the winds the God that priests erected in the fields of innocent pleasure—a God made of sticks, called creeds, and of old clothes called myths. I hav tried to take from the coffin its horror, from the cradle its curse, and put out the fires of revenge kindled by the savages of the past. Is it necessary that heaven should borrow its light from the glare of hell? Infinit punishment is infinit cruelty, endless injustice, immortal meanness. To worship an eternal jailer hardens, debases, and pollutes the soul. While there is one sad and breaking heart in the universe no perfectly good being can be perfectly happy. Against the heartlessness of this doctrin every grand and generous soul should enter its solemn protest. I want no part in any heaven where the saved, the ransomed. and redeemed drown with merry shouts the cries and sobs of hell—in which happiness forgets misery—where the tears of the lost increase laughter and deepen the dimples of joy. The idea of hell was born of ignorance, brutality, fear, cowardice, and revenge. This idea tends to show that our remote ancestors were the lowest beasts. Only from dens, lairs and caves; only from mouths filled with cruel fangs; only from hearts of fear and hatred; only from the conscience of hunger and lust; only from the lowest and most debased, could come this most cruel. heartless, and absurd of all dogmas.—R. G Ingersoll.

A LARGE portion of the Protestant world hav sacrificed man's freedom of will to God's preknowledge and sovereignty, thus virtually subverting all religion, all duty, all responsibility. They hav made man a machine and destroyed the great distinct between him and the brute. There seems a fatality attending creeds. After burdening Christianity with mysteries of which it is as innocent as the unborn child, they hav generally renounced the real mystery of religion, of human nature. They hav subverted the foundation of moral government by taking from man the only capacity which makes him responsible, and in this way hav fixed on the commands and threatenings of God the character of a cruel despotism. What a lesson against man's attempting to impose his wisdom on his fellow-creatures as the truth of God!—Dr. Channing.

Is not the reflection that man has for ages been advancing from lower to higher conditions, and that there is a probability that the human race will one day be as much elevated, intellectually, above its present state as it is now superior to that of man as he existed before the historic period, more pleasing and encouraging than the thought that we are the descendants of a degenerate Adam. and that it is impossible, by reason of the depravity we hav inherited, to advance by our own efforts to a better condition? Surely one is the doctrin of hope and cheer; the other that of despondency and despair.—B. F. Underwood.

TRUTH, though now hewn, like the mangled body of Osiris, into a thousand pieces, and scattered to the four winds of heaven, shall be gathered limb to limb and molded with every joint and member into an immortal feature of loveliness and perfection.—Milton's Areopagitica.

TO pass from theological and philosophical truth to the truth of civil business, it will be acknowledged, even by those that practice it not, that clear and round dealing is the honor of man's nature, and that mixture of falsehood is like alloy in coin of gold and silver, which may make the metal work the better, but it embaseth it. For these winding and crooked courses are the goings of the serpent, which goeth basely upon the belly, and not upon the feet. There is no vice that doth so cover a man with shame as to be found false and perfidious.—Bacon's Essays.

LYING is a disgraceful vice, and one that Plutarch, an ancient writer, paints in most disgraceful colors. when he says that it is "affording testimony that one first despises God, and then fears men." It is not possible more happily to describe its horrible, disgusting, and abandoned nature; for can we imagin anything more vile than to be cowards with regard to men and brave with regard to God?—Montaigne's Essays.

TO turn away from the stony temples and petrified doctrins of supernaturalism, and read Bacon understandingly, and know Kant, and walk hand-in-hand with Spencer, is like coming out of some Druidical grove of sacrifice into the pure air and lightsome day for which we were made.—Waters's Through Rome On.

DESPAIR of nothing that you would attain;
Unwearied diligence your point will gain.

A SHORT LESSON IN HISTORY.

A double-page picture contrasting science and theology, showing how the one has labored for human advancement, and how the other has always opposed it. The German-American thus describes it in detail:

The palmy days of the church witness the burning at the stake of Bruno, the pope and priests witnessing the burning of the heretic with expressions of joy. Galileo is represented sitting in his study, the pope holding the sword of inquisition over his head, and to save his life being forced to recant his philosophy. Martin Luther is represented tacking up his "Right of Private Judgment." Behind him stands the pope with the bull of excommunication drawn, and beside him the headsman's block and ax of infallibility. In their study are Morse and Stephenson applying their inventions to practical tests, and in the rear of them the Presbyterian pulpits are filled by two of the broadcloth gentlemen denouncing the inventions as "Thwarting the will of God," and branding these men and their inventions as "Heralds of Antichrist." Ingersoll stands on a platform apparently delivering his lecture "Which Way?" which he holds in his hand. Talmage approaches the platform at the colonel's back pulling after him, by the arm, the chief of police, who holds in his hand the warrant of arrest for blasphemy. The colonel seems to take no notice of the spleeny, cadaverous form ascending the platform at his rear. Then come the modern teachers of salvation, the Salvation Army, with their drums, bones. tambourines, and streamers, (and screamers, too), also a fac simile of our crazy army. A group of likenesses of the teachers of science, Haeckel, Humboldt, Darwin, Tyndall, and Huxley, is also shown. The likenesses throughout are remarkably correct. As a pictorial history the caricatures contain volumes.

Price, six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents; twenty-five copies for $1; one hundred copies for $3. We wish that the friends of Freethought would distribute thousands of these telling pictures.

THE MODERN BALAAM.

Showing the Balaam of modern times to be the priests. It is a splendid pictorial argument. Price, per dozen, 30 cents; per hundred, $1.50.

Odds and Ends.

"ONLY one marriage in ten ends happily." It is such injudicious statements as these that giv Mormonism its boom.

"THERE is only one thing I regret about my execution," observed the condemned murderer. "What 's it?" "The suspense."

WHAT we should like to know is whether either King Alfonso or Prince Bismarck could shut his eyes and tell, off-hand, where the Caroline Islands are.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

POKER is a very old game. Satan saw the first pair in the garden of Eden and raised them. They went out. If it hadn't been for this miserable game, we might all hav been there yet.

SISTER ANNE: "Now, Ethel, be sure and pray God to make you a good girl." Ethel (praying): "Dear God, pleath twy and make me a dood 'ittle dirl, and if at firth you don't thuctheed, why, twy, twy again."—Chicago Rambler.

BANK director: "How are the cashier's accounts?" Bank President: "Why do you ask?" Director: "I heard yesterday that he had lately been vaccinated." President: "Well, what of that?" Director: "They hav small-pox in Montreal just now."

A HOUSEHOLD journal says that "a very pretty cover for a milking-stool is made of golden-brown silk serge, with a conventionalized apple-blossom in shaded pink silk, with the stamens in gold silk between the petals." Very gay; but a much brighter cover for a milking-stool is a maid of golden-brown hair, rosy cheeks, silk-fringed eye-lids and attired in a pink muslin dress. But we don't often see them—outside of fiction.—Norristown Herald.

CINCINNATI mother: "Well, my daughter, you were very good in church. Now, can you tell me what the sermon was about?" Little Cincinnati maiden: "Oh, yes, of course. It was about heaven. Won't it be nice! Nothing but music gardens, and races, and baseball games, and theatres all the time." "Mercy on us, child! where did you get that idea?" "From the preacher, of course." "The preacher! Why, what did he say?" "He said that up there it would be Sunday all the time."—Cincinnati Tribune.

"THAT was a very remarkable story about the circus clown," observed a tall, solemn-visaged man in the hotel corridor. "What was it?" asked one of the listeners. "They say he was cast away on a desert island, where there was not one particle of food or fuel. He lived there, strange as it may be, for two years before he was rescued." "What did he liv on?" "He roasted his chestnuts and ate them." "Yes," again interrupted the other; "but how did he get the fuel to cook his chestnuts?" "Young man," retorted the tall man, with dignity, after an awkward pause, 'I am not telling a wood story."

TOM OCHILTREE listened, in a group of hotel loungers, until everybody else had told an experience with musketoes, and then he said: "The pests are plenty enough at my place in Texas, but by a device of my own I escape being bitten. In my employ are ten or a dozen old darkies who used to be slaves in my father's family. Their mouths are immensely large. Whenever a swarm of musketoes comes along I set these negroes in a circle around me, with their jaws wide open and a dab of molasses on each extended tongue. They thus become just so many traps. with the combined merits of machinery and intelligence. They regard it as a diversion, a luxury, and await it every year with an impatience equaled only by their anticipations of watermelons. They hav acquired a keen relish for the musketoes, and a mouthful of them, sweetened by the molasses, is swallowed with gusto."

"I HEARS you has got a boy at your house last mumf," said Sam Johnsing to Jim Webster, both colored. "Hit am a fact." "Had him baptized yet?" "Not yet; but next Sunday I's gwinter tote him ter de Austin Blue Light Tabernacle and hab Parson Biedsoe baptize him. He does all my baptizin'." "How much does he make yer pay?" "I allers pays him a dollar a head." "Why, niggah, you is 'stravagant, you is. Why don't yer paternize my pasture, de Reverend Whangdoodle Baxter. He am de mos' reasonablest pasture in de state of Texas." "How much does he get for duckin' 'em?" "He uster charge a dollar for sprinklin' a chile, but I Jewed him down, and now he's glad ter git sebenty cents. I'se got a contrac' wid him, and you can run your chile in on my contrac'," "Sebenty cents for baptizin' a chile! No, sah. Dat sort ob cheap work don't mount ter nuffin. In de eend de cheapest am de dearest. I want hit ter last. Sebenty cents! G'way nigger wid yer cheap noshuns."

MY SIMPLE FARE.

Placid I am, content, serene;
I take my slab of gypsum bread,
And chunks of oleomargarine
Upon its tasteless side I spread.

The egg I eat was never laid
By any cackling feathered hen,
But from the Lord knows what 'tis made
In Newark, by unfeathered men.

I wash my simple breakfast down
With fragrant chicory so cheap;
Or for the best black tea in town
Dried willow leaves I calmly steep.

But if from man's vile arts I flee,
And drink pure water from the lea,
I gulp down infusoriæ,
And quarts of raw bacteriæ,
And hideous rotatoriæ,
And wriggling polygastricæ,
And slimy diatomaceæ,
And hard-shelled ophryocercinæ,
And double-barreled kolpodæ,
Non-loricated amboidæ
And various animalculæ
Of middle, high, and low degree;
For nature just beats all creation
In multiplied adulteration.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 12. No. 39. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, September 26, 1885. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

ALL the Hebrew papers last week had their annual New Year's Day editorials. Their dates this week are 5646.

THE penalty for selling a cigaret to a boy or girl under sixteen years of age in New Hampshire has been made $20 for each offense.

A CLERGYMAN at Mount Desert recently closed his prayer by saying: "O Lord, now that our summer visitors hav departed, wilt thou take their place in our hearts?"

PRINCESS BEATRICE, of England, is so pious that she has had several verses of the Bible beautifully embroidered on the linen of her much-mentioned bridal trousseau.

Two little boys, who played cards in the gallery of a Gilroy, Cal., church while the preacher drawled out a pious discourse, are the objects of much anxious consideration among the people of that town.

A PREACHER of Oshkosh, Wis., was given a pass for himself and wife to the fair held at that place, on condition that he pray for good weather. In case the weather proved bad the understanding was that the ticket was to be taken up at the gate.

THE Western Reserve University, after letting girls into its medical department many years, now excludes four candidates. The president says that the best opinion now is that feminin pupils in medicin or surgery ought to be in separate institutions.

CHOLERA failed to strike a single one of the four thousand women employed in the national tobacco factory at Valencia, Spain, though the disease raged violently in that city, and the Medical World recalls that tobacco workers were also noticed to enjoy exemption from attack during an epidemic at Amsterdam.

COLONEL INGERSOLL says: "Don't talk too much about the men. Do you know, gentlemen, we hav probably not in the American Congress a man so learned in the science of government as Harriet Martineau was? America has never produced a novelist as great as George Eliot, and we hav never had a poet equal to Elizabeth Barrett Browning." This may be true, but then, where else in the world could you find a Robert Ingersoll?—Macon Telegraph and Register.

THE University of Heidelberg is about to acquire possession of the library of the well-known bookseller, the late Mr. Trubner, who was a nativ of the city. He had purposed presenting the collection to the University on the occasion of its approaching jubilee, but death prevented the fulfilment of his wishes. His widow, however, has resolved to carry out her husband's intentions, and the library is now on its way to Heidelberg. It includes about 120 manuscripts and several thousand printed volumes.

A WISCONSIN paper of recent date prints this: "Wm. L White, of Apple River, caused quite a sensation just before the afternoon service at the Lena camp-meeting, Wednesday, by striding down the main aisle of the auditorium, shaking hands with everyone he met, and shouting, 'I'm dead!—I'm crucified!—Glory to God!' etc. He could hardly be restrained from taking the rostrum and telling the people his experience. During the sermon, however, he contented himself with shaking hands with everyone who came within reach, and shouting, 'Dead to the world!'"

RELIGIOUS circles of Gloversville, N Y., hav been on the tiptoe of excitement for several days past at the report that the Rev. W. P. Rulison, pastor of the First Methodist church, had lost $20 on the thin soap-trick operated by sharpers at the county fair. The minister had been out of town several days, thus allowing the scandal-mongers full sway, and such reports as were circulated were abominable. The preacher was openly condemned for entering into a horse-jockey game. He arrived home Thursday, and at a prayer-meeting admitted his guilt, and said there were no extenuating circumstances.

THE large pavilion at Washington Park was packed last Sunday with Germans who had gathered to see the drill of the scholars of the New York Turn Verein. Two hundred little boys in white shirts and red stockings went through calisthenics to slow music, and two hundred little girls had a dumb-bell drill after them. Then followed songs, club and stick exercises, and last of all a military drill by the cadets of the school. The parents, as they drank their beer, congratulated one another upon the sound health, firm muscles, and trained skill of their children. A daily paper inquires if this is not a good way to spend Sunday.

A MAN was lately tried in England for giving a five-weeks-old child four drops of laudanum, thereby causing its death. The examination of witnesses showed that the ideas of womankind concerning the administration of narcotics to infants are dangerously hazy. One woman thought the dose of laudanum for a child was one drop for each year of its age; another thought it was a drop for each week. A physician testified that most soothing syrups were composed of opium, and fatal results often attended their use. He thought they were unsafe at any age under one year, and that even homœopathic preparations were unsafe for infants.

JAMES DAVIS, a negro, was found by Officer Findlay last week on West street, this city, praying and shouting in the middle of a crowd that blocked the street-cars. Davis was taken to the Jefferson Market. Justice Patterson asked him where he lived. "My home is in heaven," Davis said. "Take him to a cell," said Justice Patterson. Davis was taken in charge by Court Officer C. O. Nixon, who swung a bunch of keys in his hand. "St. Peter," said Davis, "giv me a good place." Nixon locked him in a cell, and informed him that he was to be examined as to his lunacy, but Davis wouldn't hear. "This is heaven! this is heaven!" he cried, "but I've got a back seat!"

A CORRESPONDENT of the San Francisco Bulletin says that Brigham Young, Jr., and his agents are busy perfecting arrangements for Mormon colonization in Mexico, and that, too, within the zone wherein foreigners are prohibited from acquiring real estate. They lease land for ninety-nine years, and introduce a clause by which the lands are to be released to the assignees or their heirs at the expiration of the lease for a trifling sum. Had they selected land in Mexico beyond the zone, they could hav obtained better lands and better terms, and the inference is that they desire to erect a territory of their own between Mexico and the United States whereby they may, in the event of the American purchase of the northern states of Mexico, hav a location outrivaling that of Salt Lake.

AN immense chart, showing the areas of improved, forest, and unimproved (including waste) land in each state and territory of the union, has been prepared by Mr. R. W. Best, of the Forestry Division, Agricultural Department, for the Forestry Congress soon to assemble in Boston. The data were gathered very carefully by correspondents in every county in the union and verified by correspondence with state authorities. It is found that there are 285,000,000 acres of improved land, 485,000,000 acres of forest, 730,000,000 acres of unimproved and waste untimbered land. Incidentally it is found that the forests are disappearing at the rate of 25,000,000 each year. The forest product during the census year was 1,800,000,000 feet, board measure. Last year it was 2,008,000,000 feet.

THE Chicago Salvationists, who wear Amen skirts and Oh-be-joyful trousers, and march under Captain William Dean, were in the Bridewell last week for disturbing the peace. A hard-working evangelist who went to interview them was asked by one of their number if he were a Christian. He replied, evasivly, that he was a reporter, whereupon the band were troubled in spirit, and began to make prayer in his behalf. When the stern minion of the law bade them quit their "racket," Captain Dean's voice was heard in encouragement: "Sing on, lads—don't be afraid!" The angels are playing the accompaniment, and Jesus is singing tenor." The fines were ten dollars apiece; and, as the soldiers filed down to the Bridewell in default of payment, they tried to sing a little thing which the captain had composed to the air of "Yum-Yum," in "The Mikado:"

"We're goin' to the Bridewell for Jesus, Jesus,
Yes, twenty-three days for Jesus!
We are innocent men,
We won't pay the 'ten,'
We'll stay and make chairs till he frees us."

MAURICE COONEY, a well-to-do grocer of Cohoes, N. Y., has, through the influence of the Catholic church, been declared insane. His offense was that he advertised to lecture on the gospel, and invited everybody, especially the poor. Cooney is a strict Catholic, and for thirty years has been president of the St. Vincent de Paul society. He had handbills issued naming Simmons Island as the place where he would hold his meeting. As Cooney started for the place, his family tried to hold him back. He created a disturbance, and was arrested. A charge of insanity was afterward lodged against him. His book, containing the sermon he intended to deliver, assails the Catholic church, and says it is all a humbug. He claims that mass is only a money-making arrangement of the priests, and that there is really nothing else in it. The sermon is well put together, and good language is used. Cooney has never touched a drop of liquor in his life.

A WRITER in the Louisville Post shows up Sam Jones in this way: "'Why don't we hav the Rev. Samuel Jones in Louisville?' I asked of a prominent revival manager the other day. 'His terms are too high,' replied the revivalist. 'You can't touch him for less than $200 a week, and we can't afford to pay that much.' What sort of an age is this we are living in when a howling evangelist must be paid $200 a week and engaged. like any ordinary dramatic attraction to preach the gospel? In a recent speech at Eminence, Ky., I understand that Jones began his sermon this way: 'If you fool people don't stop making so much noise in the church, I'll go right away and won't speak a word to you to-night.' What a key those words are to the man's character! What a vain vulgarian he must be! And yet there are truly good people who will insist upon paying him $200 a week, and swear by him."

The Independent, after an examination of the year books of the different religious denominations, is forced to come to the conclusion that, "in spite of all that has been written to prove that the gospel is making prodigious advances among men," the actual statistics show "a painfully small number of men and women added to the Lord by confession." It apparently speaks of what are called the evangelical denominations, and means that in proportion to the extent of the agencies employed the number of conversions is alarmingly few. The aggregate may seem very considerable, but when it is divided by the number of pastors and churches engaged in the work of conversion the result fills the Independent with discouragement. It finds that in a church of one hundred members, for instance, "only one or two or half a dozen souls are saved" yearly, although one hundred sermons are preached. "and the individual effort and combined testimony of one hundred Christians" should be exerting a powerful influence to bring in converts. Even so low an average as ten converts to a church, it adds, is "far beyond the facts." That, assuredly, is a very discouraging showing for the evangelical denominations, and indicates, as the Independent argues, that there is something all wrong about them. If they fail in the conversion of souls, they fail in the great object of their existence, and the faith is cold in them. Death and backsliding are thinning out their ranks yearly, and if they do not bring in new converts to fill the vacant places at a more rapid rate, they will die of dry rot in due time. They are not even getting the natural increase of their membership, children turning away from the faith of their fathers, and either relapsing into downright Infidelity or running off to other churches.

News of the Week.

SMALL-POX is spreading alarmingly around Montreal.

THE refusal by a teetotal tailor to make clothes for rumsellers is a new cause for temperance discussion in London.

THE Knights of Labor of Butte, Mont., hav warned the immense numbers of Chinamen employed there to leave by Oct. 1st.

WILLIAM BALL, a prominent distiller of Stanford, Ky., was shot and killed by his son in the course of a drunken quarrel on the 21st.

AT Paris, on the 20th, a convention of ex-Communists was attacked by immense mobs of Anarchists, and an extended and bloody riot ensued.

ON the 20th Rev. W. F. Crafts, N. Y. city, preached on the subject, "Do God's Laws require Total Abstinence from Intoxicating Beverages?" He decided in the affirmativ.

AN unsuccessful attempt was made to throw a train filled with Republican politicians bound for Saratoga from the West Shore railroad track, near Buffalo, on the night of the 20th.

REV. DR. MORSE, of Brooklyn, delivered a lecture on the 21st on "Science and Christianity," in which he said, "Science has frequently changed its theories and beliefs, but the truths of Christianity are the same to-day as ever."

A SINGULAR disorder, producing blindness, is prevailing among the workmen at the rubber mills of South Framingham, Mass., and has already destroyed the sight of fifteen operatives. Physicians state it to be caused by the naphtha used in the manufacture of rubber cloth.

MISS SARAH BUTLER, of N. Y. city, while walking up First avenue at 9 o'clock on the night of Sunday the 20th, was seized by one of New York's numerous "corner gangs," conveyed to the East River, and assaulted. This is one of a score of such cases which hav occurred in the city in the last two weeks.

THE celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of temperance reform in America was begun yesterday and will last one week. It will be participated in by the various temperance organizations of the country. The date for the centennial is based upon the scientific exposition by Dr. Benjamin Rush, of Philadelphia, of the evils resulting from the use of intoxicating liquors, the first publication of whose work took place in September, 1785.

ON the afternoon of Sunday the 20th a crowd collected on Sixth ave., N. Y. city, to witness the antics of three intoxicated little girls. At a policeman's approach two of the girls escaped, but the third was too intoxicated and fell, and had to be carried away in the policeman's arms. She said they had bought two quart bottles of whisky early that morning and gone into a vacant house in 42d street, where they played cards till their liquor was gone.

THE Prison Association of New York are now regulating and cataloging the library of the institution, and when completed it will be the most complete collection of works on penalogy in the world. The collection includes clippings from newspapers from every section of the globe, fully indexed, and exhibiting the improvements in caring for and reforming the crimiual and the progressiv steps taken toward that end. The library will be at the disposal of the press for use at any time.

AT a Socialist meeting in London, on the 20th, rioting was caused by an attempt of the police to arrest the leaders. Dr. Edward Aveling, Mr. Hyndman, Wm. Morris, the poet, and other prominent Radicals had opened the meeting in a quiet and orderly manner, and with the statement, "What we want to do is to show the police that we respect order, but that at the same time we love liberty," when the police broke through the crowd, and in spite of all opposition succeeded in arresting two Socialist officers and six spectators. The proceedings at the police-court were a travesty upon justice, the magistrate jeering at and insulting the Socialists.

The American Secular Union:

ITS NECESSITY, AND THE JUSTICE OF ITS DEMANDS.

IV.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

This is nothing more than asking for equality in the eyes of the law—a right which few will dispute in theory, although they deny it in fact. We seek to be good citizens; we uphold the government, and pay willingly for its support; we hav a right, therefore, to equal privileges with our fellow-men, and any enforced support of a religious system with which we disagree is an interference with our rights and liberties. Every intelligent man and woman must be allowed to hold the convictions at which he or she has honestly arrived, whether they agree with the opinions of others or not. The voice of the majority is no test of truth; for majorities hav often been in error. Indeed, every new truth commences in a minority, and frequently has to remain so for a very long time, opposed and even persecuted by the majority. Our position is that "intelligent sincerity is sinless." We do not say that it can contain no error, for that would be to claim for it infallibility, in which we do not believe. But the possible presence of error can be no bar to the free exercise of the judgment, and to the right to enunciate the conclusions arrived at. We contend for and claim "the unrestricted application of the powers of the intellect to any subject; the absence of any threat or penalty, legal, spiritual, or social, for the exercise of thought." We condemn all barriers which shall separate us from our fellow-men, whether political, social, or religious. In this country caste is abolished and political emancipation achieved. In the eyes of the law, every man is equal to his fellow-man; every honest person has a voice in the government and a share in making the laws by which he is governed. This is a great point gained, a tremendous step in advance of the state of things to be met with in the old countries. America, in this respect, is the foremost nation in the world; but to maintain her proud position with consistency and justice, she must concede equality in religious matters. Theological chains are even more galling than political ones, and religious slavery is a prelude to intellectual death. We plead that all laws which giv any kind of advantage to men of one set of opinions over another are unjust laws, prejudicial to the welfare of the state, detrimental to human happiness, and contrary to the spirit of the Constitution of the country. We desire to make this grand western continent—which was not only the home of the Pilgrim Fathers, but also the land of Jefferson, Franklin, and Washington, and the scene of the heroic and useful labors of Thomas Paine—free from ecclesiastical and religious monopoly. To-day America is, in many instances, the proud center of freedom; we would strive for her to become, with her geographical vastness, her climatic advantages, and her liberal aspirations, one of the most prominent leaders in advanced thought; and then her glorious star-spangled banner will be as emblematic of intellectual freedom as it is now of political liberty.

These are our "Nine Demands," and it will be seen that there is nothing very revolutionary in their nature. Their concession is a necessity of the age in which we liv, and to secure this concession is the object of the American Secular Union. To achieve this result as readily as possible it is the duty of all Secularists to combine, to organize thoroughly, and to work together cordially. We cannot exercise our due influence; we cannot, as we ought, hearten ourselvs and dishearten our adversaries, without union and co-operation. The very essence of Secularism is social, not isolated, effort. As our end is freedom, education, health, and happiness in common, we must strive in common for this end. In many small towns there are scattered Freethinkers, who do little or nothing for the general cause; while, if they formed themselvs into societies, they could do much. It is not necessary that any man should surrender or suppress his convictions on all points for the sake of conformity with his co-workers. But all genuin Secularists hav so much that is essential in common that they can honestly act together, and so multiply their strength, both for attack and defense. Of course, there are some persons in our ranks who, while agreeing with our principles, think they dare not avow themselvs publicly, fearing to wound the feelings of their friends, or to bring injury upon themselvs in their business or social relations. No doubt, in some cases such fear is too well founded; for society is not yet free from a persecuting faith and a class of theologians whose humanity is lost in their theology. But even this evil exists more extensivly than it would do were our forces properly organized. If all the Freethinkers of the States and Canada were to take courage to declare their principles, they would find themselvs far too powerful to suffer from the social obloquy and ostracism from which they shrink severally in their isolation.

The power of orthodoxy is not in its teachings, but in the close union of its adherents. The weak point of the Freethought movement is not in its principles, but in its defectiv organization. The time has arrived when, if all will unite, this drawback can be removed. We see members of churches, prompted, perhaps, too frequently by personal fear, supporting their cause with money and labor. Granted that they expect to be rewarded for their services in another world—an incentiv as humiliating as the motiv is selfish—how much more activ and generous Secularists should be, when their inspiration is love for mankind and their desire the realization of the beneficial results of their acts here on earth! To the honor of our cause be it said that we hav men and women in our ranks who generously support their principles both with money and time. Neglect and indifference hav no favor with them. Having redeemed themselvs, they nobly assist in the redemption of others. This is the practical Secularism required to enable our principles to become popular and to be enshrined in the hearts of the people. Admitting that there are some among us who are so far the victims of poverty and theological bigotry that domestic requirements compel them to be reticent in the public avowal of their secular opinions, there are many others, known to us all, who are what is termed well-to-do—men who, having escaped from the bondage of theology, are less solicitous than they should be in rendering practical support to the very cause to which they owe their emancipation. Let me impress upon the minds of such persons that, if the influence of our principles be worth anything, if they be not dead as an inspiration to usefulness and benevolence, then every Secularist should manifest more vigor and courage than do the vulgar bondsmen of creeds and conventionalities. We are already reaping rich harvests from the fields sown in the tears and blood of the heroes and martyrs who went before; it surely behooves us, to whom by their efforts the task has been rendered so much easier and less dangerous, to plant and sow more abundantly, for the reaping and gathering of those who shall come after. This is our just debt to our ancestry, which can only be paid to our posterity. If our forefathers dared undaunted the prison and the scaffold and the stake, when the ultimate triumph of the Good Old Cause was so remote and dubious, we must be degenerate indeed if we cannot dare some annoyance of ignorant contumely, some injury to our business or social prospects, when its final victory is so much nearer and so assured.

A few words as to one important feature that should not be lost sight of in carrying on the propagandist work of our associations. On no account should any of us lack faith in our enterprise, or ignore the proper cultivation of the "virtues of the heart"—the emotions.

> True hearts are more than coronets,
> And simple faith than Norman blood.

Lectures, discussions, and readings are, of course, indispensable to the success of the movement; but, if a man simply hears a Freethought or Secular lecture, or reads Liberal works himself, leaving his family to gratify their social instincts in ordinary society, his children will probably grow up saturated with the prejudices and superstitions from which he has been freed. We want the wives and children, and other relativs of our members, to be interested and delighted in our work. We want to see our halls crowded, not only for lectures and discussions, but also for social pleasure—for amusement, not less than for mental improvement; we want to see them filled not only with men, but with women and children also, that they who will hav to carry on our work when we older ones are no more may do it heartily and unitedly, the Secular place of meeting having been always associated in their minds with friendly faces and happy hours, with music, and dance, and song, and cheerful communion, as well as with intellectual development. To this end our Secular associations must be not only schools of instruction, but also resorts for innocent recreation. We need tender hearts no less than hard heads, and must cultivate warm feeling as well as cool reasoning. With the genial spring-tide the black boughs and twigs are covered with green leaves and delicate blossoms, and resonant with the singing of birds; and why should we not clothe and adorn our lives, however stern and somber, with such abounding beauty and delight, seeing that we can all hav the source of a perpetual spring-tide in our hearts in our genial love for one another, and for everything beautiful and joyous?

In all Secular propagandism it is imperativ that consistency, earnestness, and fidelity should mark the conduct of those who take part therein. Our principles are worth little or nothing unless they be carried into practice and made to pervade and influence the whole private and public lives of those who profess them. For we can only achieve a real and lasting triumph by proving ourselvs, not simply more intelligent than our opponents, but also more courageous, honest, humane, zealous, and consistent.

In our great Liberal work it should be distinctly borne in mind that we countenance no sudden revolution in recklessly overturning the social equilibrium by fire and sword. All such attempts would be cruelly disastrous; and, besides, the misery and bloodshed thereby caused would, in all probability, "put back the hands of the clock," and hand society over to the tender mercies of unprincipled tyrants and oppressors. Having established a sound system of education—having secured a knowledge of the power and duty of man; of the value of truth; of the recognition of the rights of others; of the impotency of all theologies as reforming agencies; of the service of science, and the nobility of self-reliance; of the necessity of intellectual disciplin and moral purity; then our attention should be directed to, and our efforts employed in, the best means of extending the usefulness of Secular principles in the practical duties of daily life.

Thus hav I endeavored to indicate the nature and necessity of "The American Secular Union," and also pleaded for the justice of its Demands. To me the work of the hour appears to be the duty of placing a knowledge of our principles before the public, explaining their nature and value, and defending them against the misrepresentations of opponents, who, either from ignorance or bigotry, might assail them. The question was once asked, "Who is on the Lord's side?" A far more important inquiry now is, Who is on the side of men and women in their just demands? It should not be forgotten that our duty is not only to individuals—it extends to society at large; it is not merely to secure advantages for to-day, but for all time. Let us each and all strive to nobly perform that duty, so that we may do our part in the consolidation of the happiness of the human race. If our success is not so great at present as we desire, let us press on to the "high calling"—the duty of contributing our share to the world's improvement. We read that centuries ago Pompeii was discovered beneath the ruins caused by the liquid fire of Vesuvius. In a niche of the entrance to the city gates rested the skeleton of the Roman guard who was on duty the fatal morning that ushered in Pompeii's doom. Safety called him far away, but duty bade him there to stay, and so he perished in the very act of performing his duty. Let us place ourselvs in a niche of the temple of Freethought, guarding it against the invasion of the armies of theological bigotry; and, if we perish in the work, we shall die in the noble act of duty. Even if the laurels of victory never adorn our age, we despair not, believing, as we do, that the day of triumph will surely come. For, just as the application of glass enabled the sun's rays to penetrate into long-neglected avenues and corners, exhibiting the accumulation of dirt, the forerunner of disease, so has the light of knowledge, science, and Freethought brought to view the long-accumulated superstitions of earlier and less informed times. And, if we are now faithful and persistent in the great battle for truth and mental freedom, we may safely believe that the theological delusions engendered during ages as dark as they were remote will largely disappear, and will be replaced by the grandest monument the world has ever seen—a cultured, an unfettered, and a happy people.

Free Trade.

Does the past teach us anything? This free trade question might easily be settled if we will think a little over history's lessons. Protectionists talk as if there never had been any experiments made to test the matter. They also say that we cannot manufacture without protection. Now, I will stand or fall by the truth or falsity of these two statements:

First, that history givs us several examples of states trying protection and then resorting to very low revenue tariff, or free trade, by general laws or by treaties;

Second, that the prosperity of manufactures and the people was greater in every case under the very low tariff or free trade experiment.

From 1847 up to 1861 the United States had a nominal tariff. That era is denounced by the protectionists as the ruinous time of free trade. From 1847 to 1861 this nation prospered as never before. The word "tramp" was unknown, a word that became well known to England under her tariffs from 1800 up to 1845, a word that became familiar to us under protection from 1873 to 1878. Factories and foundries were established all through the Middle and Western States. Old men will recall the wondrous progress made during that period. But if anyone shall question this, let him refer to the census of the United States for 1880, vol. ii, pp. 928–931. See the figures for totals at top of columns for 1850, '60, '70, '80. See how many manufacturing establishments existed in 1850, and then in 1860. You will find that the increase in the ten years was over 17,400. Now look at 1870, and then at 1880, and you will find about 1,700 to be the increase—about as many hundreds as thousands during the free trade era.

Now look at the capital invested. Observe that about 90 per cent, or $476,000,000, more was invested in 1860 than in 1850. Observe also that the increase of investment from 1870 to 1880 was about 32 per cent, or $672,000,000, on the investment of 1870. But that is not all. Compare a little. Remember how much less was our capital and population in 1850 than in 1870. While our population was about 25,000,000, and our capital small, we increased the factories over 17,000, and the investment 90 per cent. With almost double the population, and more than double the capital, we increased only about 1,700 and only 32 per cent. This ought to open men's eyes to the utter folly of trying to make people richer by high taxes to support in unprofitable business a few thousand factory employees.

Who says a tariff on iron or steel, so heavy as to keep foreign imports of it out of the United States, reduced the cost of Bessemer steel rails from $150 per ton to $25? Tariff is tax. Now, the idea! When Bessemer's process was invented, being new, it was costly. By discoveries and inventions the art of producing the steel was so cheapened that all nations enjoyed to the full this vast addition to the wealth of the world, except our own, which was prevented by a tax of some $28 per ton, or $8 1-3 per average rail. Just think of it! Every rail in the 120,000 miles of railway in the United States has cost $8 1-3 too much —merely to keep in blast some ten to fourteen rail mills owned by the railway magnates, Vanderbilt, Gould, et al. The superior cheapness was an advantage to all the world, and by so much an addition to its wealth.

Now, protectionists claim that their tariff-tax law made this cheapness—created this wealth. We thought labor alone is the source of wealth. We are mistaken. Law creates wealth, and a tax law at that. Our American Congress, away off here, by merely passing a law, has added millions upon millions to the world's wealth. Let us thank the American Congress. How absurd! And the whole system of protection is bolstered on like absurdities—just as was slavery, church and state, divine rights of kings, aristocracy, etc.

Spain tried free trade under Charles III. in 1759. When he ascended the throne, Spain was the pauper state of Europe. Under her strictly protection laws, she had dwindled down into utter inanity. Her enormous industries of the year 1600 A.D. had disappeared. Toledo alone had fifty great wool factories, and but two in 1750. Seville had sixteen thousand spindles in 1600, and but three hundred in 1759. Forty thousand people were supported in Toledo by the silk trade which was literally annihilated by 1750. These are examples of Spain's condition, caused alone by her protectiv tariff which, like our tariff, confined her trade to the "home market." Charles III., a young man educated abroad, imbued with all the advanced ideas of the age, intimate with the great minds that had created the theories under which the united provinces, under free trade, had become the grandest commercial powers the world ever saw, was called to the throne of Spain. He saw the frightful evil, knew the cause and the remedy. He proclaimed free trade. He put it into practice promptly, undeterred by the jealous whinings of the half-dozen monopolies clinging to death in life.

The transformation was startling and miraculous. Read Vol. II. of Buckle's "Civilization," chapt. i, on this. Suffice it to say that, within five years, solely by free trade, the roar and bustle of industry was heard all over the land. By 1788, when Charles died, Spain was the first power in the world. But the policy of Charles was bad because he made his sudden changes without explaining the reasons. Hence the Spanish mind was unconvinced and groping in the dark. So when he died, as all these reforms depended on him alone, his successor became the victim of the monopoly-fostering spirit. Tariffs were placed again on imports to favor rapacious speculators at home. Soon the few began to grow rich, and the masses to tramp and starve. In ten years all was back in the same condition.

Since our tariff was enacted, this nation has passed through one fearful long crisis—from 1873 to 1878. And yet, the few prosperous years from 1878 to 1883 hav caused us to forget these dreadful years when a million tramps were marching. Again, we are coming upon another long season of horrors. Prior to 1848 England, under protection, had just such terrible crises. Since 1848 not once has she experienced the like, although she suffered during our war for want of cotton. Since '48 she has practiced free trade, and every year for thirty-six years she has imported from two to eight hundred million dollars more than she exported. Just as a nation imports more than she exports, just so does she grow rich. And although the almost universal opinion is otherwise, there is not one single scientific authority but favors free trade and larger imports. And the late growth of manufacturers in the South is a proof that protection is not required. Here was the South with little capital, and deluged with manufactured goods from the North, trying to start manufactures at home. Here she had to compete against old, long-established manufactures that were fostered by protection, as it is claimed, in crowded states where labor is cheaper by much than it is at the South. To succeed, she ought to hav been protected against New England; but she bravely entered the field, and has succeeded.

By the way, how happens it that in old, crowded, free trade England wages are higher than in protected Germany and France, and also in so highly protected America? Not only are wages higher, but the price of necessaries is much lower. I might show how a free trade treaty between two nations has suddenly caused millions of dollars' worth of productions to be exchanged when very little was before, thus causing activity in many industries, for commerce is exchange of goods, not buying or selling with cash. I will end, saying tax on imports is tax on the exports to be traded for the imports. The exports, then, pay all tariff taxes; that is, the producers here pay all this great burden. HOLT.

Comte's Positiv Philosophy.

COMTE'S LAW OF THE THREE STAGES OF THOUGHT.

Comte's central and governing doctrin is that the whole human race, like the individual man, necessarily passes through three intellectual stages. The variations of human opinion, says Comte, hav never been purely arbitrary; they obey a law that causes every theoretical conception to pass through three successiv stages.

1. THE THEOLOGICAL STAGE.

The first, by a pure mental fiction, givs to the absolute cause of events concrete forms; a supernatural origin is sought for all phenomena. This is the theological stage.

2. THE METAPHYSICAL STAGE.

The second givs to the same absolute cause an abstract and purely ideal form; the sensuously supernatural is set aside as incredible, and an effort is made to demonstrate the existence of abstract forces or entities, supposed to inhere in various substances, and capable of engendering phenomena. This is the metaphysical stage.

3. THE POSITIV OR REAL STAGE.

Finally, the third abandons the search after the "origin and destiny of the universe," "the knowledge of the interior causes of phenomena," and devotes itself merely to the discovery of their "effectiv laws," that is to say, their relations of succession and similitude.

In the positiv or real stage of human intelligence (or soul) the mind affirms the futility of theological and metaphysical inquiries, abandons all vain search after the causes and essences of things; restricts itself to the observation and classification of phenomena, and to the discovery of the invariable relation of succession and similitude which things bear to each other; in a word, to the discovery of phenomena. This is the positiv or real stage.

1. The first or theological stage has gone on from concentration to concentration, and has reached the highest perfection it is susceptible of when it has substituted the providential action of a single god for the varied play of the numerous independent gods that had been imagined in primitiv times. The theological, which is the original, spontaneous form of thought, regards the facts of the universe as governed, not by invariable laws of sequence, but by single and direct volitions of Gods, real or imaginary, possessed of life, intelligence, and individuality.

In the infantil state of reason and experience individual objects were looked upon as animated.

The next step is the conception of invisible beings, each of whom superintends and governs an entire class of objects or events.

The next merges this multitude of divinities in a single God, who made the whole universe in the beginning, and guides and carries on its phenomena by his continued action, or, as others think, only modifies them from time to time by special interferences.

2. The second or metaphysical stage, which closely follows the first, substituting for a God a creation of reason, pursues in its turn the same path toward unity, and arrives at perfection when all the unities are combined in one unity, regarded as the only source of all phenomena.

The mode of thought which Comte terms the metaphysical accounts for phenomena by ascribing them not to volitions, either sublunary or celestial, but to realized abstractions.

In this stage it is no longer a God that causes and directs each of the various agencies of nature; it is a power, or a force, or an occult quality considered as real existences inherent in but distinct from the concrete bodies in which they reside, and which they in a manner animate. Instead of dryads presiding over trees, producing and regulating their phenomena, every plant or animal has now a vegetativ soul.

At a later period the vegetativ soul has become a plastic force, and still later a vital principle.

Objects now do all they do because it is their essence to do so, or by reason of an inherent virtue.

Phenomena are accounted for by supposed tendencies and propensities of the abstraction nature, which, though regarded as impersonal, is figured as acting on a sort of motiv, and in a manner more or less analogous to that of conscious beings.

Aristotle affirms a tendency of nature toward the best, which helps him to a theory of many natural phenomena. The rise of water in a pump is attributed to nature's horror of a vacuum.

The fall of heavy bodies and the ascent of flame and smoke are construed as attempts of each to get to its natural place.

Many important consequences are deduced from the doctrins that nature has no breaks.

In medicin the curativ force of nature furnishes the explanation of the recuperativ processes which modern physiologists refer each to its own particular agencies and laws. R. B. BUTLAND.

"N. G. W."

Mr. N. G. W., in the Aug. 22d number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, calls me "a true Bourbon." This shows Mr. W.'s ignorance of history. The Bourbons were kings of France; the Malcolms were kings of Scotland—but he is mistaken in thinking me related to either. I hope that in future he will cease calling me bad names and confine himself to the argument. One would think by the temper displayed in Mr. W.'s last that he must hav thought my remarks personal; and I am beginning to think he must be the owner of a large tract of vacant lands in Michigan.

Mr. W. complains that I reiterate the same statements. Why not? If Mr. W. should lose a horse, would he not, in hunting for him, reiterate the same statement? Where is the man who does not reiterate the same statements? THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the most ably conducted papers printed in any country, yet year after year it discusses the same topics. The Liberals call the Spiritualists superstitious, and the Spiritualists call the Liberals illiberal. If Mr. W. ever had a shoe pinch, he must hav noticed that it always pinched in the same spot. I am sorry I can not be more poetic and giv my friend more variety, but the thing is impossible.

Mr. W. complains that I "wilfully falsify," or something very near that. Now, I will giv the facts, taken from "Michigan and Its Resources," compiled by the state commissioner of education, and published by the state printer for 1882.

He givs the total population of the state as 1,636,937. Acres of land in state, 36,755,200. Number of farms in the state, 119,769. Number of acres of improved land, 6,374,385. United States land, 1,717,246. State lands, 861,185. Railroad and canal companies' lands, 3,430,115 acres. If we add the United States lands to the state lands, we get 2,578,431 acres. These are the public lands, most of which the commissioner admits is worthless. If we subtract the public lands from the total number of acres in the state, we get 34,176,769 acres, all of which are private lands, that is, they do not belong to the public. Now, if we subtract from this the number of acres of improved land, we get 27,801,384 acres of land not yet improved, but held by private individuals. In my article I gave this in round numbers as 28,000,000.

The above are the facts, and Mr. W. may explain them in one way and I in another. I know of no law by which he can compel me to accept his explanation. I claim that the state of Michigan has passed laws which hav enabled rich men—for aught I know, Mr. W. may be one of them—to buy up and keep out of use 27,802,384 acres of land in Michigan. They are like dogs lying on the hay, and will not use it themselvs or let others do so. I claim further that if the state would tax those lands higher, the number of acres held by private individuals in an unimproved condition would soon grow beautifully less; and that if it would tax them high enough, the whole of the unimproved land would soon belong to the state. This would be as it should be. Mr. W. might think that such a change would injure him. This only shows his ignorance. Just laws would benefit every person. Unjust laws are an injury to all. Unjust laws, in the end, bring national ruin.

Look Out for Your Girls.

A young girl of fifteen years was apprenticed to some nuns at Mont de Maison, and accustomed to come home at night. The other day she did not return. After 9 P.M., her mother, being uneasy, went to seek her at the workrooms but was refused admission. A police officer, to whom she applied, had no better success. She then sought aid from the states attorney of the French republic, and after complex proceedings and delays, she has at last recovered her daughter. Pretty saucy to defy the police, and the French police! — Republique Anticlericale.

This happened before the Pall Mall Gazette revelations, but not before Diderot brought to light similar depravities in convents previous to the Revolution. There are certain wrongs of which the victims are the last to complain, because social pity is envenomed by disgrace and ostracism. It is even more disastrous than its reprobation of the offender.

The National Liberal League.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, President.

CHARLES WATTS, First Vice-President. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary, 33 Clinton Pl., New York

COURTLANDT PALMER, Treas., 850 Broadway, New York.

Call for the Ninth Annual Congress.

To the Auxiliary Liberal Leagues and All Citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Ninth ANNUAL Congress of the National Liberal League, to be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 9, 10, and 11, 1885.

According to a vote at the last Congress of the League notice is hereby given that an Amendment to the Constitution will be submitted, as follows: Article I. of the Constitution of the National Liberal Leauge shall be amended to read: "The name of the association shall be The American Secular Union."

Measures for the affiliation of the Freethought Societies of Canada with the National Liberal League will also come up to be acted upon.

Also measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various State Governments and by the National Government as shall make the United States thoroughly Secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local Auxiliary Leagues are entitled by the League Constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the President and Secretary and three Delegates. All Charter Members and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual Members are entitled to seats but not to votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every Auxiliary League will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present. Having adopted a common basis of work upon which all Liberals can combine, it is now desirable to discover the best means by which this work can be carried forward, and to this end large attendance and free expression of opinion will contribute. It is hoped that all will come to the Congress to emphasize the unity of Liberalism and to create an interest for harmonious action which shall result in the abolition of all laws that are contrary to secular government.

Per order of Board of Directors:

R. G. INGERSOLL, President.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.
COURTLANDT PALMER, Treasurer.
CHARLES B. REYNOLDS, Ch. Ex. Com.
A. C. MACDONALD, Ch. Fin. Com.

National Liberal League Program.

Introductory address by the president, Robert G. Ingersoll; report of the secretary Samuel P. Putnam; report of the chairman of the Executiv Committee, C. B. Reynolds; report of Treasurer Courtlandt Palmer. Paper on organization and methods of work by Charles Watts, first vice-president.

Courtlandt Palmer will giv his new lecture, "The Aristocracy of Freethought," of which James Parton says: "It is one of the noblest discourses to which I hav ever listened."

John E. Remsburg will giv his great lecture, "Sabbath Breaking, or Sunday Slavery."

Mrs. M. A. Freeman, of Chicago, will be present—one of the most popular writers in the West; the author of "Somebody's Ned," which ran through several editions, "Jane Stuart," "Margaret Oakley, Stephen Grey's Wife," "Behind the Bars," and "David Harding." She has also written several plays which hav been produced with success—among them, "Gambled for Gold," "Lady Hamilton's Daughter," etc. She is a graceful speaker, and has been prominently connected with the Chicago Liberal League, and has done much to contribute to the popularity of its meetings. She will address the Congress on the new work of Liberalism.

Other representativ speakers will be present, among them J. H. Burnham, of Michigan, Mrs. Mattie Krekel, of Missouri, and Judge Krekel. It is also hoped that J. D. Shaw, the brilliant Liberal lecturer and editor of Texas, will be at the Congress, and also W. F. Jamieson, of Minnesota, who has done such valiant pioneer work during the past year.

Prof. William Seymour has been chosen to represent the Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia at the Cleveland Congress.

The work goes on. On Thursday evening, Sept. 17th, John E. Remsburg spoke to the first Liberal audience ever gathered in Jersey City. It was quite a large audience, and certainly an enthusiastic one, and gave promis of good work yet to be done. C. B. Reynolds was present, as also the secretary of the National Liberal League, and made addresses.

The Newark Liberal League opened its session for the year on Sunday afternoon, Sept. 20th. The secretary, S. P. Putnam, gave his lecture on "the New Heaven and Earth." A good audience was present, and no doubt this League will continue its valuable work and be one of the foremost champions of Liberalism in a city of 160,000 inhabitants, where it has 129 churches to contend against. It's a plucky League, and that's a fact.

Delegates were chosen to the Congress at Cleveland, whose names will be seen elsewhere. It is hoped that all the auxiliary Leagues will speedily do the same, and send names of the delegates chosen to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator for publication. Let there be a rapid gathering of forces on all sides, for the Cleveland Congress will be of vast importance to future work. The presence of Robert G. Ingersoll through all its sessions makes its success assured. The Congress will close on Sunday evening with his great lecture, "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child."

E. A. Stevens, of Chicago, is doing good and vigorous work for the League in the West. He is lecturing in various places, and the press notices are quite favorable; and by his personal activity the purposes of the National League and Congress are pretty thoroughly known. The following, from the Detroit News, shows how he is doing his level best:

E. A. Stevens has come here from Chicago, bent on seeing the Liberal League revived, in order that delegates may be sent to the Ninth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League which meets in Cleveland Oct. 9th to 11th. "We are going to hav one of the biggest Freethinkers' conventions ever held in this country," Mr. Stevens remarked. "The name of the society will doubtless be changed to the 'American Secular Union,' a common basis of work will be agreed upon, and a united effort will be made to secure the adoption of such laws by the state and national governments as shall make the United States thoroughly secular. R. G. Ingersoll will be present and sound the keynote of the campaign."

A Liberal organization has been started in Davenport, Iowa, of which one of the members writes: "We hav twenty activ members, and I think success unquestionable."

Robert Fleming, of Lehigh, Iowa, writes: "I shall do my best toward organizing a League and holding the fort against orthodoxy. Some of our most prominent men are in favor of the movement."

The following has just been received from J. D. Shaw, of Texas:

WACO, TEX., Sept. 15, 1885.

DEAR MR. PUTNAM: I now think I will go to the Congress at Cleveland in October. Very truly, J. D. SHAW.

The following vigorous letter from the South shows the interest that is felt, and the mighty work that lies before us in a land of such bountiful resources:

VICKSBURG, MISS., Aug. 25, 1885.

S. P. PUTNAM, ESQ., Dear Sir: On my return I find your valued favor, 30th ult. I wish, indeed, I could be with you at Albany and Cleveland, and beg to thank you for your invitation.

Pardon me if I again take the liberty of suggesting the South as a productiv and remunerativ field for your labors. The South is pulsing with new life; the smoke of a thousand manufactories darken her sunny sky, and our people, awakened from the old, conservativ, languid, luxurious life of antebellum times, their images shattered and the institutions of their fathers gone, the first blush of their resentment and anger dissipated by the grim lesson of twenty years' novel necessity, are just in that condition most conduciv to the reception of new truths. But it is the nick of time; for, as life becomes more and more conventional, they begin to seize, like drowning men at straws, the empty promises of the old creeds. Believing that the truths of Freethought are better and more lasting, because they are true, than these, is it probable our people now will refuse to hear them when portrayed by a master-hand like yours?

I beseech you, my dear sir, to giv your attention to the matter, and that soon. Come South, and yourself behold and be convinced. Very respectfully, H. B. THOMPSON.

The Forest City House will be the headquarters of the Congress. See the following:

CLEVELAND, O., Sept. 21, 1885.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, ESQ., Dear Sir: Your favor in regard to rooms and rates for delegates, October 9th, 10th, and 11th, has just been received. We shall be glad to do the best we can for you at $2.50 per day for single person, rear room; $3 per day for single person, front room; and $2.50 per day each for two persons, front room. The hotels in this city will be unusually full on the 7th, 8th, and 9th of October, as the Knight Templars hav a convention here. Many will not go home till the 10th, so if your body is large there may be a little crowding to those that come the 9th, but after that we shall hav no trouble. TERRILL & INGERSOLL.

Railroad Rates to Cleveland.

The following letters hav been received from the passenger agents of the lines named, and explain themselvs. The first is from the assistant passenger agent of the Pennsylvania road:

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 18, 1885.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, ESQ., Dear Sir: Replying to your favor of 17th inst., requesting reduced rates to delegates attending National Liberal League Convention, to be held at Cleveland, Ohio, Oct. 9th to 11th, I would say that if there will be twenty-five or more delegates who will use our line in going to the meeting, we are willing to arrange for the sale of tickets to Cleveland and return on our certificate plan—that is, parties who pay regular rates in going to the meeting will be returned at one-third standard limited rates. If this arrangement will be satisfactory, please advise me of the number of certificates you will require, and the address of the party who will distribute the same. Very truly, GEO. W. BOYD, A.G.P.A.

Mr. Abbott, of the Erie road, writes:

NEW YORK, Sept. 18, 1885.

MR. SAMUEL PUTNAM, Dear Sir: I hav your favor of yesterday in regard to reduced rates to Cleveland on account of the meeting of the National Liberal League at that place. We are selling tickets between Cleveland and New York, in each direction, at greatly reduced rates, and as low as we would ordinarily make for meetings of this kind. Therefore I am unable to quote you any less rate than the current to that point. If we were getting full rates, we would be pleased to make a reduction in favor of your people. Very truly,

JNO. N. ABBOTT, Gen'l Passenger Agent.

A. E. Clark, general passenger agent of the New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio railroad, writes to Mr. Green:

CLEVELAND, O., Sept. 15, 1885.

H. L. GREEN, ESQ., Salamanca, N. Y.:

Dear Sir: Yours of Sept. 14th, in regard to meeting of National Liberal League in Cleveland Oct. 9th, 10th, and 11th, at hand. Replying to same, would say that we will return all paying full fare over this line in attending this meeting at one cent a mile on certificate. Yours truly,

A. E. CLARK, G.P.A.

Mr. Green hopes to get the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern railroad to make the same arrangements.

Tax the Churches.

A few weeks since a request was made that we republish the words of General Grant recommending the taxation of church property. At that time we had no copy of the speech, but having since received one through the kindness of Mrs. H. Grinnell, we now lay it before the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. In connection, it is also appropriate to reprint General Grant's views upon education, given in the same message, also upon Mormonism and other kindred subjects:

"EDUCATION.

"From the fall of Adam, for his transgression, to the present day, no nation has ever been free from threatened danger to its prosperity and happiness. We should look to the dangers threatening us, and remedy them so far as lies in our power. We are a republic whereof one man is as good as another before the law. Under such a form of government, it is of the greatest importance that all should be possessed of education and intelligence enough to cast a vote with a right understanding of its meaning. A large association of ignorant men cannot for any considerable period oppose a successful resistance to tyranny and oppression from the educated few, but will inevitably sink into acquiescence to the will of intelligence, whether directed by the demagog, or by priestcraft. Hence the education of the masses becomes of the first necessity for the preservation of our institutions. They are worth preserving, because they hav secured the greatest good for the greatest proportion of the population of any form of government yet devised. All other forms of governments approach it just in proportion to the general diffusion of education and independence of thought and action.

"As the primary step, therefore, to our advancement in all that has marked our progress in the past century, I suggest for your earnest consideration, and most earnestly recommend it, that a Constitutional amendment be submitted to the legislatures of the several states for ratification, making it the duty of the several states to establish, and forever maintain, free public schools adequate to the education of all the children in the rudimentary branches within their respectiv limits, irrespectiv of sex, color, birthplace, or religion, forbidding the teaching in said schools of religious, Atheistic, or pagan tenets, and prohibiting the granting of any school funds or school taxes, or any part thereof, either by legislativ, municipal, or other authority, for the benefit, or in aid, directly or indirectly, of any religious sect or denomination, or in aid, or for the benefit, or any other object of any nature or kind whatever.

"UNTAXED PROPERTY.

"In connection with this important question, I would also call your attention to the importance of correcting an evil that, if permitted to continue, will probably lead to great trouble in our land before the close of the nineteenth century. It is the acquisition of vast amounts of untaxed church property. In 1850, I believe, the church property of the United States, which paid no tax, municipal or state, amounted to about $83,000,000. In 1860 the amount had doubled. In 1875 it is about $1,000,000,000. By 1900, without a check, it is safe to say this property will reach a sum exceeding $3,000,000,000. So vast a sum, receiving all the protection and benefits of government, without bearing its proportion of the burdens and expenses of the same, will not be looked upon acquiescently by those who hav to pay the taxes. In a growing country, where real estate enhances so rapidly with time as in the United States, there is scarcely a limit to the wealth that may be acquired by corporations, religious or otherwise, if allowed to retain real estate without taxation. The contemplation of so vast a property as here alluded to, without taxation, may lead to sequestration without Constitutional authority, and through blood. I would suggest the taxation of all property equally, whether church or corporation, exempting only the last resting-places of the dead, and possibly, with proper restrictions, church edifices.

"THE MORMONS AND CHINESE WOMEN.

"In nearly every annual message that I hav had the honor of transmitting to Congress, I hav called attention to the anomalous, not to say scandalous, condition of affairs existing in the territory of Utah, and hav asked for definit legislation to correct it. That polygamy should exist in a free, enlightened, and Christian country, without the power to prevent so flagrant a crime against decency and morality, seems preposterous. True, there is no law to sustain this unnatural vice; but what is needed is a law to punish it as a crime, and at the same time to fix the status of the innocent children, the offspring of this system, and of the possibly innocent plural wives. As an institution, polygamy should be banished from the land. I invite the attention of Congress to another, though perhaps no less an evil—the importation of Chinese women, but few of whom are brought to our shores to pursue honorable or useful occupations.

"RECAPITULATION.

"As this will be the last annual message which I shall hav the honor of transmitting to Congress before my successor is chosen, I will repeat or recapitulate the questions which I deem of importance, and which should be legislated upon and settled at this session:

"1. That the states shall be required to afford the opportunity of a good common school education to every child within their limits.

"2. No sectarian tenets shall ever be taught in any school supported in whole or part by the state, nation, or by the proceeds of any tax levied upon any community. Make education compulsory, so far as to deprive all persons who cannot read and write from becoming voters after the year 1890; disfranchising none whatever, on grounds of illiteracy, who may be voters at the time this amendment takes effect.

"3. Declare church and state forever separate and distinct; but each free within their proper spheres; and that all church property shall bear its own proportion of taxation.

"4. Drive out licensed immorality, such as polygamy, and the importation of women for immoral purposes.

"To recur again to the centennial year. It would seem as though now, when we are about to begin the second century of our national existence, would be a most fitting time for these reforms.

"5. Enact such laws as will insure a speedy return to a sound currency, such as will command the respect of the world.

"Believing that these views will commend themselvs to the majority of the right-thinking and patriotic citizens of the United States, I submit them to Congress. U. S. GRANT.

Lectures and Meetings.

CHARLES WATTS commenced activ work immediately on his return from England. Having lectured at the Albany and Toronto Conventions, at Hamilton and Welland, Mr. Watts proceeds to Waynesburg, Pa., to engage in a seven nights debate with Mr. Clark Braden, who is accepted as the representativ of the Christian party of the district. The dates of the discussion are as follows: Sept. 29th and 30th; Oct. 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th. From Waynesburg Mr. Watts goes to the great Convention at Cleveland, after which he lectures on Sunday, Oct. 18th, at Greenwich Village, Mass.; and on Sunday, Oct. 25th, afternoon and evening, in Memorial Hall, Boston. His address is 82 Berkeley street, Toronto, Ont.

WHEN Jersey City people wished to listen to a Liberal lecture a journey to New York has heretofore been necessary. Previous to September 17th there is no record of one having been delivered in their own town. It was mostly virgin soil, therefore, upon which the words of J. E. Remsburg fell on Thursday evening. But, judging from their reception, good fruit is likely to be the result. The meeting was free. William Rowe, one of the old land reformers who secured the passage of the Homestead law, was the organizer of the meeting, and deserves no little credit for the successful gathering. The audience nearly filled the hall, and was composed of intelligent men and women, a majority of whom apparently were in sympathy with the lecturer. On the table were two fine bouquets, indicating the presence and thoughtfulness of woman. Mr. Remsburg's subject was "Sabbath Breaking." In a few words he showed the origin of the Sabbatic idea, how the Jews regarded Saturday, and then examined the Sabbath by the light of the Christian scriptures. He set forth the arguments for the observance of the Christian Sunday, and then knocked them over; paid his respects to the originator of our Sunday, the brutal Constantine; quoted at length the testimony of the Christian fathers to show that Sunday was not regarded by them as a holy day; described the Sabbath of the Middle Ages and of the Puritans; quoted the writings of Christian reformers, scholars, and divines against the institution of any special holy day, and closed with a strong plea for the abrogation of all Sunday laws. There is no such thing, he said, as a Sunday in nature. The grass grows, the rivers run to the sea, the planets wheel ceaselessly in their orbits—Nature continues all her work. Why, then, must man lose in yawning tedium one-seventh of his time? As a day of social pleasures Sunday can be spent profitably. But as a day of enforced idleness Sunday is the result of priestly tyranny. And it is, he thinks, the last ditch from which the clergy will fight. So long as the ecclesiastics are able to monopolize one-seventh of the time they will remain in power over the people. Break up this institution, and their grasp upon the wealth and minds of the people will be broken. From the applause following the lecture, the audience seemed to agree with Mr. Remsburg. Col. Henry Beeny, of this city, whom Mr. Rowe had secured to preside, then introduced S. P. Putnam, who was upon the platform. He made only a few remarks, setting forth what Liberalism stands for—the unity of humanity, and the freeing of the race from intellectual slavery. Mr. C. B. Reynolds, who passed through this city on his way back to his Tent in Alliance, O., had also accompanied Mr. Remsburg to Jersey City. Colonel Beeny called upon him, and he responded promptly. He recommended the people to study Secularism, and find out its objects. He thought it much better, if we are to hav a heaven hereafter, that we begin to get used to it by making a little experimental one here on earth. The audience seemed to like his remarks. Mr. Remsburg received an invitation to address the New York Labor Lyceum, but his engagements prevented. He left for Vineland, N. J., where he spoke on the 18th, and Mr. Reynolds rushed off to Alliance, O., to begin in that town a ten-days' Tent meeting. The following is Mr. Remsburg's program for October:

AMRITA LAL ROY, the Hindoo, delivered a lecture on "Religion and the Labor Movement" at the Labor Lyceum at Broadway and Forty-ninth street last Sunday morning. As was the case with all new movements, he said, Socialism met with opposition from the representativs of the existing "law and order." Political economists admitted the grievauces of the Socialists, but said that their methods were fallacious aud their aims utopian. Theological professors, turning from the contemplation of the infinit, recognized the startling fact that a vast mass of humanity could not lay hold of such a small, finite, and insignificant thing as a loaf of bread, but they thought Socialism irreligious. It was right that Socialism should be irreligious in the ordinary sense. Human providence had declared all men equal and brothers; divine providence had set heathen against Christian, Catholic against Protestant, had burnt Infidels and persecuted Hebrews—all for love of God. It was plain that the Christian church, as an official body, could never believe in the labor movement. The faith of the labor movement was the conquest of the kingdom of earth, while the church sought the kingdom of heaven. Socialism was evoluting in society the true religion of human fellowship—a religion of deeds instead of creeds. The labor movement began where the church ended, and their ways lay in directions exactly opposed to each other. Christian Socialism was bosh; one might as well speak of orthodox radicalism. The church was committed to the existing order of things, while the primary idea of Socialism was revolution There were two ideas growing with the present movement, and they differed from the ideas in previous revolutions in being positiv, not negativ. One was that there is humanity, which needs all our care, and the other was that there was one thing known to be above all noble, holy, and omnipotent, and that thing was labor. Socialism had nothing to say about God one way or the other. Mr. Lal Roy said that he was a heathen in search of a religion, and thought he had found it here. "I hav found my religion," he said, "among that band of men and women who hav said, 'Humanity is our religion; this is our brother man; no tyrant shall hurt him, no God shall damn him!'"

ONLY between fifty and sixty Liberals of Newark remembered that last Sunday was the opening day of the Newark Liberal League for the fall and winter campaign. The standbys of the League were all out, however—Wm. G. Mayo, the popular president; C. A. Marshall, the critical secretary; J. W. Frankel, the convivial and beauty-loving person who engages and entertains lecturers for the League; Armand Pionnie, the honest treasurer, whom the League swears by; H. G. Avery, the venerable vice-president; James P. Cool, George Cort, and Alexander Jarvis, the substantial men who, with Frankel, form the council that has so managed the affairs of the League that it has its own hall, from which an income is derived, instead of an expense incurred; and N. Grotta, John Cooke, and others not personally known to the reporter. S. P. Putnam, the secretary of the National League, was the speaker. He told the Newarkers what he thought a new heaven ought to be like, and what he hoped a new earth would be when Liberalism should prevail. He then borrowed one of Herbert Spencer's dryest chapters on education, put it into his own poetic language, filled it with his own hope and enthusiasm, and the audience thereby received some new and good ideas they perhaps never would hav heard of if left to dig them out of the dusty pages of Spencer for themselvs.

Apparently there were no Christiaus present, for no one responded to President Mayo's cordial invitation to them to tear Mr. Putnam to pieces, and J. W. Frankel moved that discussion be dispensed with, and that the League proceed to the business of electing new officers and choosing delegates to the annual Congress to be held at Cleveland. Mr. Frankel's motion prevailed; those not members of the League left the hall, and those who were members took front seats. After the minutes had been read, the delegates were chosen as follows:

Wm. G. Mayo, president; C. A. Marshall, secretary; and H. G. Avery, J. P. Cool, Joseph W. Frankel elected delegates.

The next business was to elect new officers. On motion, the old board was unanimously re-elected. The list is:

Wm. G. Mayo, president; H. G. Avery, vice-president; C. A. Marshall, secretary; A. Pionnie, treasurer; James P. Cool, George Cort, Alexander Jarvis, J. W. Frankel, council.

To-morrow the League will discuss the proposed change of name for the national organization, and instruct its delegates or their proxies accordingly. Friday, the 25th, Mr. Putnam left for Ohio. He will help Mr. Reynolds in his Tent effort for a day or two, and then proceed to Cleveland to engage halls for the League Congress, and make railroad arrangements for excursions into the city.

For the Bruno Statue at Rome.

First instalment of $200 is paid. On second instalment I hav received the following:

Miss Caroline C. Thayer, Roxbury, Mass.,	$5.00
Mrs. A. Nichols,	5.00
S. R. Urlins,	2 00
Wm. R. Lippincott, Vernon, Iowa,	1 00
Frank Reed, Willow Creek, Nev.,	1 00
Mrs. Jacobs, Boston, Mass. (through J. P. Mendum),	4.00
W. F. Freeman, Stockton, Cal.,	2 00
A. J. Stough, Utica. Montana,	1 00
B. Thorp, Balston Spa,	1 00
Wm. Holsfall, West Troy, N. Y.,	1 00
Mrs. Iliohan, Albany,	1 00
Lyman Smith, Oakland, Cal.,	.50
Previously acknowledged,	36.30
Total, Sept. 15, 285,	$60.80

Mr. Editor, the above list shows how this subscription stands.

It will take $339.20 to make up $600, when Colonel Ingersoll, by a lecture, will raise the fund to $1,000. The money is needed to complete the work.

It can be quickly raised if Liberals, especially those who hav contributed, will ask their friends to aid in this noble cause. Let each one try, and send the result to T. B. WAKEMAN, Authorized Agent.

93 Nassau st., New York City, Sept. 15, 1885.

Mr. Mitchell Would Only Obey God.

The subjoined letter explains itself. We gave the story as we heard it, and as one of the Albany papers reported it:

PRINCETON, MASS., Sept. 19, Y.L. 13.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of to-day you do not report Judge Clute, of Albany, correctly when you say he required Mr. Mitchell to stop selling or giving his newspaper, The World's Reformer; and, of course, that bright seventy-two-year-old-farmer-from-Maine, Seward Mitchell, made no such promis as you say. He is too intelligent, brave, and sincere to promis "obedience" to anybody this side or beyond God. Judge Clute advised him (Mitchell, not God, who still circulates Bibles) to consult the district attorney before he floated more papers; whereupon I asked, "Do we understand you to say that persons resident here, or citizens from other states, cannot rightfully or safely sell newspapers—their honest, printed opinions—on these streets without first consulting a censor called district attorney?" "Oh, no," said Judge Clute. As you correctly say, though a Catholic, he was considerately thoughtful, and admitted that portions of the Bible are "obscene."

Seward Mitchell went free, but a cloud lowers on me from your section; a member of the New York bar threatens to hav me arrested for pleading cases in court without a license from the "profession." Truly yours, E. H. HEYWOOD.

Governmental Railroad Control Necessary.

As society progresses, it is plain that the state must assume to do all that is required to serve those imperious public necessities that arise, and which individuals cannot do for themselvs.

The state does not make our garments, because we can hav that done at will; the state does not navigate our streams, because we can run our own vessels. Originally each man did all for himself. He made paths, carried his own messages, weighed out his own money. When highways, mail service, currency, etc., became urgent public necessities, then the state took hold of the matter. It made canals, leaving individuals free to run their own vessels on them.

When the first railway was made, had we foreseen that it would result in the virtual abolition of the use of the common roads, and that to use the railways would become a universal public necessity, we might hav provided wisely for the new conditions that must arise. If the states refuse to own and control the railways, it will be the sole instance wherein a universal public necessity, out of the power of individuals to supply for themselvs, is left to combinations of individuals.

The objection that it would be giving to the government too much power is fallacious. It will be simply restoring to the people, en masse, that power which each person formerly had of using the highways at will. Let the people elect the railroad managers, and this power returns to them virtually.

Either the states must take this in hand, or else, after a long series of strikes, riots, and bloody insurrections, the central government must do so—a thing ever to be deplored; a thing that would forever destroy the last semblance of state rights and popular liberty. HOLT.

Jesus Christ A Fish.

One thing remarkable about the Sibylline acrostic is, that the first letters of the words Iesous Chreistos, Theou Uios, Soter, spell IChThUS, a "Fish." One of the three great prevailing sects of India is the Vaishnavas, or worshipers of Vishnu, whose astronomical symbol is the Fish, whose first incarnation was in the body of a Fish, and whose ninth and last was in the person of Christna, also called by his disciples Jezeus (Bible in India).

The early Christians were known by a great variety of names, and, among others, by a very extraordinary one, namely, Pisciculi, or little fishes. They called themselvs in their sacred mysteries by the name Ichthus, meaning I (Iesous), and Ichthus. Jesus is called a fish by Augustine, who says he found the purity of Jesus Christ in the word fish, "for he is a fish that livs in the midst of the waters." Some of the early Christian tombs hav fishes inscribed on them (Anacalypsis, Vol. II.). ANTICHRIST.

Australian Gossip.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Although one can feel, with Thomas Paine, that the world is his country, still, the dear names of home and friends must necessarily take front rank in our affections. And the sight of home papers, and The Truth Seeker and Investigator, which come to hand every four weeks, makes us feel that the link is not broken in spite of the waste of waters that lie between us and the dear land of America. And perhaps a little gossip from this far-off land may not be uninteresting to your readers.

The entrance, or Heads, to the harbor of Sydney is similar to the Golden Gate of San Francisco, and one is charmed with the beauty of the scene. After entering the Heads you are confronted by a formidable-looking fort of ancient pattern, but it is harmless, for its day of usefulness is past, only as a part of the picture, for the Heads are now supplied with defenses less conspicuous, but more effectiv in case of an attack. The harbor from any given point looks small, but, with its various indentations, it embraces fourteen hundred miles of water front. Its placid bosom is traversed with many lines of ferry boats, bringing the various suburbs in conjunction with Sydney, at Circular Quay, foot of George street, the street of the city. One's first impressions on landing in Sydney are that it has come to stay the proud mistress of these southern waters. Everything is stone—buildings, streets, walks, and walls. Solid and massiv looking, it makes one feel that they are buildings for all time. Not only are the buildings stone, but the roofs, also, are slate stone, and they are mostly plain, massiv-looking structures, with but little attempt at architectural beauty. The city was first commenced with no thought or reference to the huge dimensions it is assuming; consequently its earlier streets are narrow and irregular, but well paved, and in its muddiest seasons easily traversed. The great difficulty is the want of room for the masses who throng them. In some places in George street the sidewalks are not more than five feet wide. But it is a poorly-lighted city—not but what there are an abundance of lamp-posts, but the quality of the gas is inferior. There is only one gas company here. What they want is an enterprising American gas company, and then the city would be lighted, or, better still, an electric light company. With the city well lighted with electricity, fewer policemen would be required, for well-lighted streets and alleys are better protectors of public peace and morals than governmental officials.

For the government here covers almost every department in the industries of New South Wales—or Sydney, for at present Sydney is both center and circumference. The suburbs are numerous, and show that they are enjoying a season of prosperity, although fears were entertained of drouth and water famin earlier in the season, but rain has been abundant, removing all cause for alarm. The city is traversed through many of the principal streets with street railways, or trams, as they are called here. The trams, great, lumbering, two-story institutions, looking like woodsheds on wheels propelled by steam, run furiously through the streets, stopping at stations. The fares are reasonable, but woe to the unthinking traveler who enters one minus his two-pence ticket. He is handed over to a policeman at the first station, and £2 fine and costs is his fate, or a term in jail. The roads, tram and rail, are owned by the government, and in their fight with conductors and officials, to prevent them from getting more than their share of the profits, they hav passed laws prohibiting a conductor from selling a ticket or taking a fare in cash, but whether they hav attained to that depth of wisdom which will prevent the proverbial conductor from having his gold watch and brownstone front is a question.

One of the grand institutions of Sydney are its parks, and too great praise cannot be awarded to the wisdom that inaugurated a series of great breathing places for the masses right in the city's heart, extending from the water front to its outer limits. The Botanical Gardens, with its fine shady trees and broad, cemented walks; with plants, flowers, trees, and shrubs from every land intermingled; fine lawns with little fanciful-shaped beds filled with plants of brilliant hues, artificial lakes, summer-houses, observatories, terraces, and statues, all combine to make one imagin she has been transported to fairy-land.

Another one, called the Domain, is used for outdoor gatherings, and Sunday afternoons it is filled with thousands of people listening to speakers on any or all subjects—the political orator of the Kearney stripe; the Salvation Army; the Wesleyan, as the Methodists are called here; and every Sunday now a little man claims to be replying to Dr. York: Cranks of every line of thought can there air themselvs and find listeners.

The Garden Palace grounds are another beautiful place, in which was erected the Garden Palace, where was held the first intercolonial exhibition of Australia to commemorate the hundredth anniversary of the discovery of New South Wales by Captain Cook in 1770.

Hyde, Cook, and Albert parks are traversed with numerous broad, cemented walks, with seats at either side, shaded by the Norfolk Island fig, which locks its huge branches overhead, making a delicious shade (for it is evergreen) for the long summer months. Its grassy lawns are interspersed with little gardens surrounded with iron fences and filled with flowers and drinking-fountains. Lamp-posts through all the walks make it a health-giving resort day and night. The statues of Albert the Good, Captain Cook, and others stand guard over the scene. A pedestal has been erected for the queen, but she, or rather her statue, was burned in the Garden Palace, and another has been ordered. Still other parks, further out, include hundreds of acres, where the masses go on Saturday afternoons. For Saturday afternoon is a holiday to attend the parades, reviews, rifle practice, base-ball, cricket games, etc. And to see the trams filled with mothers and children, one would readily infer that the people did not rely wholly on immigration to settle these colonies. The zoological gardens and museums are points of interest.

Education receives its attention also. The public schools are all under the control of government, and are unsectarian or undenominational, but are having the same fight that has been fought in the United States with bigoted Christian and Catholic schools, each demanding its share of public money.

Freethought and republican principles are taking strong hold upon the rising generation. Two of the largest theaters play Sunday evenings to interested listeners. The Gayety, in which Dr. York is speaking on a Liberal platform, is crowded to its utmost limit of law, and hundreds fail to find admission; and the Theater Royal, in which Thomas Walker, of the Thomas Winter (Materialist) school, is lecturing, is also filled with men.

The women of the colonies are far behind their sisters of America in self-culture. After getting their husbands three hot meals of meat a day, with such cooking arrangements as they hav here—the colonial oven, as they call it (I wonder they can do so well as they do)—and getting on their knees to scrub floors (very little carpet is used here)—when they hav done all this every day, they hav not much time or disposition to think. But there are a few noble, brave women here who will help to lead their sisters to a higher plane of thought. But it can only be done by lifting their load of physical cares. They do not know what I mean when I tell them of a long-handled mop to clean floors with. But evolution is here in the shape of a few enterprising Americans, who will soon make a change in home comforts.

It is no uncommon thing to see notices on the churches in large type—"An Eight Days' Mission for Men Only," "A Ten Days' Mission to Be Held in the Church of the Rev. So-and-so, as Helps to Faith: For Men Only!" It would seem that they had forgotten that women hav souls. Mr. York has taken a note of this, and tells the people that he has a mission too, and that his mission is to women as well as men, and asks the great crowd of men if it is possible that they are all bachelors, and if not, where are their wives.

But this is a great country for sports, and Saturday afternoon is a holiday; and within the last hour two thousand persons, men, women, and children, hav passed our window to the cricket grounds, as the long storms hav cleared, and nature is rejoicing at the near return of spring. The hymn says,

> Though every prospect pleases,
> And only man is vile.

We say man is ignorant, and will do better when he knows more.

The men take kindly to machinery and agricultural implements, but the comforts of the home for wives and mothers are the last to be thought of. As far as my observation has gone, the women split all the wood, no matter how many men and boys are about the house.

Denton said we liv in a world of law; and this is a country of law. It seems that almost every other man has a government billet, as they say here, and wears some badge of office. But the people are a great deal better than the laws and ministry, just as churches are better than their creeds.

Every Sunday evening a government inspector visits the theaters where Liberal meetings are held, to see if there is not a man or two more than the law allows, or if there are not more in the boxes than they choose to permit.

A sad example of the working of colonial law has just been agitating the minds of the masses of this city. Several years ago a lad named Frank Johns, sixteen years of age, became acquainted with a man calling himself Scott, claiming to be a lecturer, who engaged the boy as his secretary, holding out inducements that they would travel and employ considerable time in hunting kangaroos, etc. In time Scott blossomed out into the notorious bandit, Moonlight. Johns made two ineffectual attempts to escape, and was warned that another attempt would be fatal. The gang were attacked by the police, and one policeman killed; they were taken. Moonlight and Johns were sentenced to death, although it was proved that Johns when they were attacked crept away and hid, and was upbraided by his comrades, who said if he had helped them they would not hav been taken. But owing to his youth his sentence was commuted to imprisonment for life; and for six years he was in prison, and his conduct was so exemplary that he never received a mark and received the praise of the officials. But in an evil hour he made the acquaintance of a lady Bible-reader who visited the prison in the employ of the government, and their relations became such as would hardly be expected from a Christian lady old enough to be his mother. It is said the young man became infatuated with her. She made him various presents, wrote him loving letters, etc., and then from some cause discontinued her visits. The young man became very much dejected and he and his love became the jest and byword of the prison, until in an exasperated moment he struck one of his fellow-prisoners with a table knife. He was again tried, and sentenced to death, although the wounded man is alive, well, and free.

The case has awakened much sympathy, and Mr. Thomas Walker announced that he would speak at Theater Royal, on a Sunday evening, on "Capital Punishment re the Johns case," when he was informed by the police that the Theater could not be opened that evening, but he spoke in the Domain. Various open-air meetings were held; petitions to the governor for the reprieve of the death sentence were signed by thirty thousand people; and a meeting was held at the Queen's Statue, Saturday afternoon, attended by twenty thousand people. A deputation was appointed to present this monster petition to his excellency; they proceeded to the Government House accompanied by Mrs. and Miss Johns, mother and sister of the condemned man, a band of music leading the way, and that great mass of people, orderly, well behaved, marching in solid phalanx twelve abreast. The governor received them and promised to lay the petitions before the ministry on Monday morning, and said that he was of the opinion that if the case had been properly defended the verdict would hav been different, and that extenuating circumstances had come to light since the trial, but he was informed by the clergy that the prisoner was unrepentant.

The ministry met on the Monday morning, but could see no reason to open the case, saying they were the government, not the people.

And these people boast of being free! They don't know what the word means. He was hung, and his mother and friends begged for the body for burial. They were put off on various pretexts; they were finally promised that they should hav it the next morning, but in the still hours of the night the authorities had his body taken away in a cart, and claim to hav buried it in Rookwood Cemetry. Not satisfied with committing legal murder, they must still punish the poor, heart-broken mother, after he was dead. Well for him, and many others, that their jurisdiction extends no further. Had it been in their power they would hav sent his soul to hell, for the clergy said he was unrepentant. Such is British law and justice as administered by the colonies.

Church and state are still very near neighbors. Mr. Walker advertised that a flower service would be held on the following Sunday, when two thousand persons assembled at the grave and held a service, and covered the grave with flowers—seed sown that will result in a harvest of thought in the future.

The celebration of the Fourth of July—American independence—is becoming quite popular here, having been celebrated by the American residents for several years, and this year the affair was got up in good style. A procession of carriages nearly a mile in length was formed at the American Studio, George street, and with banners flying and a band playing our national airs, they arrived at Botany Bay, where the afternoon and evening was spent in games, dancing, banquet toasts, speeches, fire-works, etc. Thus a band of free men and women on the very ground where less than a hundred years ago England sent her convicts. Westward the star of empire takes its way, and here in this grand country, rich with every thing that goes to make a prosperous nation, shall yet be a free people, who shall vie with the United States for greatness.

Here are found the great extremes of wealth and poverty—as evidenced by the long list of charitable institutions; if it were not so, they would neither be possible nor necessary. And the pen of a Dickens could here find material for another series of his quaint, comical characters.

There is much attention paid to literature. In nearly every town there is a school of arts or a mechanics' institute; also a large number of scientific societies.

The observatory, the free public library, and the Australian museum are also worthy of note in the educational aspect.

Sidney has four daily papers—of which the Evening News has the largest circulation and takes the lead—eighteen weekly, one fortnightly, and seven monthly.

Most of the suburbs in the metropolitan districts hav their journals.

The population of Sidney is about two hundred and fifty thousand.

The business of New South Wales, outside Sydney, is mostly mining and stock-raising. There are 1,366 miles of railroad in New South Wales, all owned by the government except 45 miles. There are 5,029 miles in Australia. The mines of New South Wales consist of gold, copper, diamonds and other gems, silver, iron, tin, coal, and kerosene shale. The wool crop is enormous. At the northern boundary of the colony is a district watered by the Tweed, Richmond, and Clarance rivers, of an area of nearly four million acres, pronounced by authorities generally suitable for the cultivation of maize, sugar, grapes, silk, cotton, arrowroot, coffee, tea, and semi-tropical fruits. Lower down are four rivers: the Bellinger, Macleay, Hastings, and Manning. These rivers water an area of three million acres, adapted to sugar and corn.

On the upper Hunter the vine and most cereals thrive; on the lower Hunter, corn and hay are grown in large quantities; from the Illawarra district, great in dairy produce, down to the Southern boundary, about two hundred miles, the coast may be said to abound in fertil land adapted to dairy farms; the extensiv district near Bega, a town two hundred and fifty-five miles from Sydney, boasts of a soil and climate which hav won for it the title of the Garden of Australia.

Thus, say the statistics, the localities destined to supply the great ports of the future with the staple productions of farm life are all within easy reach of sea or rail.

A large business is also carried on in frozen meat, shipping it to the Old World in large quantities.

The forests of New South Wales contain immense quantities, and many descriptions, of valuable woods, and the government is taking activ steps to prevent their destruction.

There are about ten thousand species of flowering plants in Australia.

Many of the eucalyptus trees reach to the hight of one hundred and twenty feet, with a girth of from twelve to twenty feet. The highest tree discovered in Australia is four hundred and eighty feet, and there are now to be seen several trees over four hundred and twenty feet high.

Numerous kinds of fish are found in both fresh and salt water, and the oyster beds yield an abundant supply for market. The most beautiful birds that can be imagined are found here. An eminent naturalist has reckoned that there are nearly seven hundred varieties of birds. Among them are the lyre bird, paradise bird, mound-builder, and a large number of parrots and pigeons, also the laughing jackass, the avowed enemy of all snakedom, of which the country has a liberal supply.

Dress and fashion hold rule here as much as on the other side of the globe, and the dance is enjoyed equally with any part of the world, and is not confined to the young either. There are many Spiritualists here, but no organizations, and I hav heard of but few mediums, or but little of the phenomena; and the manner of living amongst the masses cannot be conduciv to a high order of mediumship. Neither can a people rise above animal conditions when half-cooked meat forms the main staple of diet, and neither people nor laws will be much improved until kitchens are furnished with better facilities for cooking; but these improvements must necessarily come when this country has had, like the United States, an influx of all nationalities.

The climate of Sydney is similar to that of Santa Clara Valley, Cal.; but every climate can be found here—from the snows of Scotland to the sunny fields of Italy.

And so, Mr. Editor, I might continue to gossip, but must remember that there is a limit to even your patience. But Australia has the possibilities of a great country, with her immense ledges of sandstone for building material, and the substantial manner in which all work is performed. They are laying a foundation, broad and deep, for a great, grand nation of free men and women yet unborn, whose minds shall be broad and free—who will shake off the fetters of church and king, and found a government dedicated to justice and humanity.

We find here Brother Denton's picture on many walls, and his name is spoken with love and sorrow for his loss.

We hav found a pleasant home in Sydney in the family of the widow of John Tyerman, a, or rather the pioneer in Freethought and Spiritualism—leaving the church and a sure living for what to him was a great truth, to pave the way for others to follow. Many of your readers will remember him as he visited America and England seven or eight years ago, dying soon after his return, leaving his family to struggle for bread. But his name will grow brighter here as the years go on, for the world says he was an honest man.

Mr. York's present engagement here lasts until the middle of October, when we expect to pitch our tent in the great city of Melbourne.

Our TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS are all gone, and if we had had a thousand copies we could hav disposed of them all. MRS. J. L. YORK.

Iowa and Ohio Politics.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I sent you clippings last fall containing Governor Hoadley's Thanksgiving proclamation, with comments about it, and not long ago sent you one showing that Mr. Moore, of Iowa, fusion candidate for state superintendent of schools, was opposed to having the Bible read in the schools; and now I send you a double clipping, which I think will be of interest to your readers. It shows that another of the fusion candidates in Iowa is the kind of a man that Liberals want to hav in public offices, and it also throws some light on Governor Hoadley's standing, which was desired by Celtus Weaver in a late letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav also read that Governor Hoadley did good work in the constitutional convention by opposing strongly propositions to hav religious tests for witnesses in courts, etc. From all I can learn, he is a very Liberal-minded man, and stands with regard to religion nearly the same as his friend, M. D. Conway, does, although he is not as outspoken as I would wish, perhaps. I think all Liberals in this state are perfectly safe in supporting him for the governorship.

The clipping is as follows, and was taken from the daily Ohio State Journal, a Republican paper:

Hon. C. C. Whiting, whom the Democrats and Greenbackers of Iowa hav nominated for governor. is in favor of taxing churches, and advocated a bill to that effect in the legislature a year ago. Mr. Whiting is therefore not a fit man to be governor of a state, and we hope he may be defeated so badly that the majority against him may be a snow-storm that will bury him politically until he reforms his bigoted principles.—Catholic Columbian (Columbus, O.).

The present governor of Ohio, George Hoadley, voted to tax all church property, burial grounds, and school-houses, allowing an exemption of $5,000 on church building only. He is so recorded in Vol. II, Part III, page 2305, of the Debates of the Constitutional Convention of 1873. The resolution to so tax church property was lost by a vote of 26 yeas to 42 nays.

Statistics of Sabbath Breaking.

From the New York Times.

In recent years it has seemed probable that the fourth commandment was falling into popular disrepute. If, for instance, it were possible to transport a Puritan of the last century, or even a rigid Baptist of the last decade, to High Bridge or Coney Island on a Sunday, it is scarcely to be doubted that both of them would marvel at the degeneracy of these latter days. Reality is given to this hypothesis of increasing Sabbath-breaking by this year's report of the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics of Labor. Here we find set forth the extent of this unchristian practice, its causes and its effect upon the community and those who labor for seven days weekly, so far as these things can be studied within that commonwealth. It should be added that the growing custom is not in the least extenuated, nor is aught set down in malice against those who spend Sunday outside the churches. The report is dispassionate as well as apparently accurate. It seems to us, in the words of the chief of the bureau, that the facts are well adapted to lead to an activ discussion of the whole matter.

It is gratifying to note at the outset that Sunday—the Puritan or Bluenose Sunday—is not broken to any large or increasing extent for profit alone. Barbers' shops, restaurants, cooks' shops, and so on, are, indeed, freely open on Sunday. Breweries, distilleries, glass factories, iron mills, all as a rule require necessary labor from their workmen. But in these strictly commercial enterprises the Sunday work falls fairly enough within the class of necessary work. The masters do not urge the men to labor on the Lord's day, and the men do not press for the extra day's work and pay. They yield to a public demand for accommodation, or because otherwise large damage would result, as from the spoiling of a mash, the extinction of furnace fires, or such like. Whatever may be said of this generation, at least it is not wicked in this way for gain. Only sticklers for the letter of the law will lament the large aggregate of this class of Sunday work.

A very different state of affairs is disclosed when the railroads and telegraphs and related industries are studied. These disclose the habits of the people, and the change is striking. In 1847 there was not one passenger on a Sunday train out of Boston, which had been run for several years, and which thereafter was soon discontinued. If the community were now like-minded, can there be a doubt that every Sunday train would stop with the profits of the service? But what are the facts? In 1860 the Sunday trains began again, this time on the Boston and Albany. There were only three of them then; now there are twenty, although in the first ten years the initial three scarcely doubled. This set a fashion which has grown surprisingly. In 1870 the Boston and Lowell put on a single Sunday train; now it runs twenty-eight. Nine steam railways now run Sunday trains, which hav grown, and mostly within fifteen years, from twenty-five to one hundred and ninety-three. Of course, the increase in trains is not mainly remarkable. The fact to be noted is the popular patronage which the train service implies. In some cases the excuse for starting the train was the necessity of delivering fresh milk; now the "milk trains" consist of passenger cars with an almost superfluous milk car attached. In other cases the train was established in response to the petition of church-goers. We leave it to others to estimate how far church-going explains frequent crowded trains at a season of the year when ministers are mostly on vacations and such churches as are open are nearly empty. Is it possible to doubt that the popular view of Sunday has changed since that train was discontinued in 1847 because only the trainmen would ride in it?

Even those who are careless about the fourth commandment hav been inclined to concede that physiologically it is as necessary as pleasant to rest systematically, say, one day in seven. In part these statistics bear out this idea, but only in part. For instance, the Highland Horse Railroad declares that continuous work "benefits" the men, although it also reports that its horses "hav to rest." The engin drivers, as a rule, work on Sunday readily enough, but it is so trying that some of them decline, and none of them regard the extra pay as requiting the wear and tear. Especially in point is the testimony of the superintendent of the Eastern Division of the Troy and Greenfield Railroad. His experience, his capacity, and the decision of his views giv point to his words: "A man cannot do as much work in a year when working seven days as when working six days. When one works seven days each week there is no freshness. His nerves are all unstrung." On the other hand, the Cambridge Horse Railroad reports that only one man ever refused to work Sundays. They are more anxious to work Sundays than other days, and no harm has resulted. One man had worked six continuous years, another eleven, and both were perfectly hearty. The Middlesex Horse Railroad reported that those men who lost most work days were worst off in health and pay at the end of the year. Despite this clashing it may be possible to find a reconciling principle. Some employments afford intervals of rest, brief, indeed, but sufficient to relieve the tension of labor. Thus the engineer finds the seventh day's work exhausting while the conductor thrives on it. Continuous strain, as in tending speeded machinery, is doubtless too wearing for continuous work. But it is possible to believe that in intermittent work the ill of working every day has been overestimated. Finally, it is worth observing that the Sabbath-breaking passengers are the best dressed, the best behaved, the happiest of the week.

Marriage for a Living.

A wife who has been married twenty years, and has not found content in "the holy estate," makes this complaint and confession for the benefit of her sisters: "I married because it was my only way of getting a living recognized as respectable by the society in which I lived. I had wished to go into business, but no capital was forthcoming. I had ambition to be learned and distinguish myself as a writer, but the idea was soon snuffed out. I would fain hav been a nurse, a teacher, a lady help, anything to gain both experience and money; but difficulties were insuperable. I wanted some work in life; I soon got it. I married the least objectionable of the sherry-drinking, cigar-smoking bachelors who came to my mother's dances, and I hav faithfully tended him, nursed him, and mended him for twenty long years. I hav dismissed him every morning with a smile, and welcomed him home with a smell of savory meats such as his soul loveth. I hav always seen his soup was salted to his mind, and his butcher's bill kept down to the level of his income. In addition, I hav borne him children. A typical union this. I brought to this union youth, innocence, ambition for love and joy. He contributed the bread and cheese, together with a fading youth and whatever remained over after a life of pleasure. For his own credit his servants were well clad and fed, and so am I. The difference lies in this, that they are paid in cash, I only in kind. They giv certain services only, and are free to come and go at pleasure. I, body and soul, am a possession of my master's, from whom death only can set me free. Men are always full of pity for the spinster, deprived of the luxury of a husband; but I think the most pity is due to those unequally yoked. Perhaps it is vain to expect men to sympathize with women. They never know what it is to grow old without having tasted the joys of youth; what it is never to hav one day of freedom such as men enjoy while they are still children—never even for one short year to see the glories and wonders of this world. This is to die before we hav begun to liv—forever to suckle fools and chronicle small beer! It is evident enough that thousands of husbands take no pains to make themselvs lovable, or hav none of the qualities likely to inspire love. Try as you will, life with them must be one of long endurance. Strange that one hears so much talk about the education of women to be good wives and mothers, and never a word of the training of men to be tolerable husbands and fathers. Everything in a boy's education tends the other way. From the time he leaves his mother's apron-strings other men teach him to despise and ridicule women, to trample on their liberties, to indulge in habits which disgust them, to degrade that manhood which women would fain love and reverence."

A Genuin Christian A Cowardly Cur.

A correspondent of the Sun asks that paper this question:

"Did the apostles ever return evil for evil; and if not, should we do so?"

Upon this the Sun confesses it can throw no light. The gospels only record that Saint Peter cut off the ear of the servant of the high priest, but as to the previous and after life of the apostles there is no authentic history.

But no Christian, says the Sun, has any occasion to inquire how the apostles acted. The law was laid down by Christ himself that Christians should not only be non-resistant but should, when assaulted, invite further injury to themselvs. "Whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." "If any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him hav thy cloak also." "Bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you." When St. Peter asked Jesus, "How oft shall my brother sin against me and I forgiv him? till seven times?" Jesus replied, "I say not unto thee, until seven times, but until seventy times seven."

This is the law given by the so-called founder of the Christian church and is a prime essential of real Christianity. At the present date, however, the Sun is obliged to acknowledge that there are few Christians in existence. "It is a hard law for human nature to obey, and, as a matter of fact, it is not now obeyed, and has never been obeyed by Christendom. A man who bears a blow and submits to an insult without resentment is looked upon to-day as the coward he was held to be before the sublime doctrins of Christ were given to the world. If he turned his cheek to take another slap, he would be jeered at as a worthless cur or a religious crank. People would be ashamed to be seen in his company, and he would be kicked and cuffed about as a despicable being."

In its zeal to defend the "sublime doctrins of Christ," the Sun puts itself into an awkward position. Either Christ's teachings were such as to make men worthless curs if they followed them, or he taught what he did not expect men to believe and practice. In the one case he was a worthless teacher, and men were fools to listen to him; in the other, a hypocrit, who should hav no followers.

We hope Mr. Dana will rescue his idol from this unpleasant predicament.

Press Views of the Convention.

The comments of the so-called secular journals upon the Convention of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, which ended last week, are very amusing and a trifle irritating. The oracular and encyclopedic manner in which they enlighten their readers as to who the Freethinkers are, what we desire, and what we intend to do, is very funny. The supercilious sneer at the "spouters," and the jaunty way in which a body of men more than equal in intellect to any editorial convention ever convened are disposed of, is calculated to stir just a little the "old Adam" which is in every human being. One thing, however, we may set down to the credit of the secular press. As a rule there is an absence of slander and personal detraction which it will be vain to expect in the comments and editorials of the religious press. But the religious cries that we are "breaking the bulwarks of civilization," and "tearing down a faith to replace which we hav nothing to offer," are heard with a unanimity that betokens little acquaintance on the part of the average editor with this particular subject. Certainly, from papers like the Springfield Republican and the New York Sun, we expected an exhibition of more knowledge. They ought to be able to afford editors who can do better than repeat the twaddle of the half-educated and wholly dishonest clergy. The Republican has this:

"The New York Freethinkers are in annual session at Albany, scoffing at Christianity and orthodoxy, with their usual purposeless iconoclasm. President T. B. Wakeman closes his address with an appeal to the members to organize for the relief of every-day drudgery, anticipating heaven by realizing it here on earth—and in the same breath requests the vice-presidents to circulate throughout the state petitions asking the coming legislature to entirely separate church and state, to cease exempting church property from taxation, and to do away with the observance of Sunday. Mr. Wakeman was bravely supported by J. J. McCabe, ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds, Elizur Wright, and others. Mr. McCabe facetiously remarked that anyone who said that he knew there was a God had a very weak conscience and the cheek of a rhinoceros, adding that the churches did their best to oppose all progress. Mr. Reynolds compared Secularism with Christianity, much to the disadvantage of the latter. Joseph McDonough said that Christianity had to be altered in proportion with the advance in the improvement of scientific and moral conditions. Elizur Wright declared that the work of revising the Bible was energy wasted, and, supposing a supreme personal intelligence that revealed the book's contents, blasphemous. The most characteristic incident of the Convention lay, perhaps, in Reynolds's ridicule of Christ and his sayings. 'Blessed are the poor,' quoted the speaker. Then, drawing a thrilling picture of poverty and distress, the man queried in all soberness if the garbled beatitude would giv any comfort to the miserable ones, even if Jesus had uttered it. The 'Liberalist,' as he likes to call himself, makes too free with the bulwarks of civilization to command the respect and attention of those to whom he does not offer any substitutes for the great things he would do away with so incontinently."

It will be noticed that the above contains both of the stock religious "objections" to Infidelity, and in addition ridicules what it makes no attempt to answer. "The Liberalist makes too free with the bulwarks [poor bulwarks!] of civilization," and "does not offer any substitute for the great things he would do away with so incontinently." It is nothing to the writer of the above that Christianity is not a "bulwark" of civilization, and that it has always opposed the agencies through which civilization has attained its present completeness. He was taught in his youth that Christianity was an enormous bulwark, and he proposes to keep on saying so. Just as little does he know that Infidelity tears down nothing that is good or true, but only that which is evil and false; that while it would destroy superstition, it would aid science; that the removal of the churches would be followed by the building of school-houses and social homes, and that the energy now spent in worshiping an unknown and unknowable myth would by the Infidels be turned to ameliorating the sufferings of humanity. The writer on the Republican is very ill-informed, and he wrote from the bottom depths of his ignorance.

The writer on the Sun is considerably less incompetent to deal with the subject. He has, it is evident, some knowledge of the general spread of Infidelity, but with a caution born of a long subscription list and a desire to keep it distended, he feels it necessary to throw to the whale the inevitable tub of one stave—destruction without replacement. The Sun says:

"There hav been times when it required great courage to be what is called a Freethinker, but nowadays, outside of Russia, people can think as they please about society, government, and religion without encountering either political or social persecution. Religious disbelief has even become fashionable, and men can amuse themselvs with Communistic theorizing without personal discomfort, and with the gain of a notoriety sometimes positivly flattering to their vanity.

"Yet a company of people who call themselvs Freethinkers hav assembled in convention at Albany as if the battle for Freethought had yet to be waged, and there was something peculiarly brave in being engaged in it. It seems to us very like holding an Abolitionist convention a quarter of a century after the overthrow of slavery.

"Indeed, in these days it often takes more courage to stand up for faith than to avow Infidelity, especially in the circles which lay particular claim to profound philosophical thought. An unquestioning believer in the old theology is there looked upon as a pitiable victim of superstition, as a miserable relic of the Dark Ages, who has not yet learned even the very language of the modern illumination of light and freedom.

"The current literary drift is unquestionably toward Infidelity, and the teaching in the great universities of both Europe and America is more and more in that direction, until it has come to pass that doubt and denial are almost tests of contemporary scholarship. That is, a man educated after the modern school of science is assumed to be an Infidel.

"What, then, is the use of holding an ostentatious Freethinking Convention at such a time? Nor do we find any of the leaders of modern thought who think it worth while to join in such a demonstration. The course of skepticism proceeds fast enough without the organization of Infidels, and the seeds of doubt sown are springing up too rapidly throughout the world for any forcing process to be requisit. Besides, the serious and best-informed doubters hav no desire to utterly tear down faith, to replace which they hav nothing to offer. They do not want to rudely take away from the run of men and women the belief which givs them consolation, and fills their lives with poetic fragrance. Our modern skeptics are not working as enemies of religion, but as investigators of the truth as science can discover it.

"The Freethinkers' Convention at Albany is, therefore, made up of a lot of men and women who hav a smattering of knowledge as to the literature of modern science, and who are pushing its conclusions to an extreme to which wiser philosophers do not venture to go. A little learning has driven the Albany spouters mad."

Many of the Sun's assertions we admit with a glow of great satisfaction. We admit that in certain circles in certain cities disbelief is fashionable, and in these circles we admit men can theorize without personal discomfort. We admit also that he who before men of profound philosophical thought should stand up for faith as taught by the Christian church must needs be densely ignorant or be possessed of enormous cheek. We admit, too, that an unquestioning believer in the old theology is a victim of superstition. Further, we will go with the Sun in its affirmation that the current literary drift is unquestionably toward Infidelity. It would not surprise us in the least to learn that the writer of the Sun's editorial is himself an Atheist. It is possible he may hav been educated in some one of the great universities of Europe or America which, he asserts, and we admit, are tending more and more toward Infidelity. We also admit that once it required greater personal courage to be a Freethinker than it does to-day in some portions of the civilized world. Stakes, and racks, and dungeons are no longer indulged in by the wholesale, but if the Sun thinks that heretics are not now imprisoned, it must hav limited information, or a poor memory, or be dishonest. The mold of an English dungeon is still on the clothes of G. W. Foote, and only a few years ago D. M. Bennett was imprisoned for a crime he had not committed, simply that his heretical paper might be suppressed. The prosecution of Bradlaugh and Besant was a persecution undertaken against them because they are Freethinkers. There is plenty of work for Freethinkers and Freethought conventions to do to-day, and will be so long as one of our Demands remains unconceded.

Besides, it is these very conventions and personal work by Infidels that hav accomplished for freedom all that the Sun recounts. England has been Liberalized by her Secularists; France by her thousands of Atheistic societies; Germany by her Haeckels and Buchners; Italy by the influence of the Freethinkers; America by Ingersoll, and other workers, several of whom addressed the recent Convention. Without them superstition would be as rampant to-day as fifty years ago, when Abner Kneeland was imprisoned in a Boston jail for disbelieving in the God of the Universalists. Our luminous contemporary has made some very wild remarks.

The Times of this city pursues a different line of criticism. It sees in the proposed incorporation of the Association an attempt to compel others to think as we do. The day after the Convention it observed:

"The Freethinkers hav resolved to invest with the solemnity of legal sanction the privilege they now so courageously exercise at their own great personal risk. Accordingly their Convention, now in session at Albany, has authorized its officers to take steps for legal incorporation. This will enable the Freethinkers to Freethink securely in the shelter of the entire civil and military power of the state, and we may expect from them still broader views and greater boldness in their enunciation. But these singular people hav already reached the point where, like the Puritans, they wish to compel everybody to think as they do."

It is wonderful what visions a little bit of paper enables some folks to see. The churches are all incorporated, but the Times can discern in that no danger to the community. But let the Freethinkers get incorporated and to the Times appears a vision of naked women whipped bleeding through the streets of Salem, and witches hanging on Boston Common. The mistake of the Times, however, is probably made because its writers never read history. It was Christians who compelled other people to think as they do, not Freethinkers. The Puritans were followers of Christ. We vouchsafe this piece of information gratis to the empty-headed individual who penned the paragraph quoted.

There is a spirit of toleration in the following from the Albany Times which we wish simply to put on record. With but a sentence or two can fault be found. We cannot recognize the right of anyone to say, "You may talk, if you do not overstep the bounds of rational discussion." Every man and woman in the Convention had a natural and inalienable right to make a fool of himself or herself, if he or she chose, by the most *ir*rational discussion. The people of Albany are not popes:

"For the first time in many years, at least, a Freethinkers' Convention is in session in Albany. Our city has never been regarded as promising a very favorable environment for meetings of this kind. Whatever may be believed or disbelieved in private, outspoken Infidelity has never been prevalent or popular here. Even what is known as Liberal Christianity has found here a barren and unfruitful field. With a population of one hundred thousand there are not enough Unitarians of all grades to sustain even the semblance of a church organization. We are rooted and grounded in the faith. Those of us who are descended from the first settlers inherit from our Dutch ancestors an orthodoxy as rigidly unbending as that of the Pilgrim Fathers, far more so than that of many of their degenerate children. The Catholic church, whose authority and influence are of great weight hereabouts, is of course sternly opposed to such methods of thought and argument as find voice in such a Convention. It is fair to suppose, therefore, that to most of our readers the sentiments of Messrs. Wright, Reynolds, and others whose speeches are reported to-day, will appear false, unwise, and uncalled for, if not repellant and even blasphemous. Nevertheless, so long as they do not overstep the bounds of rational discussion they hav a right to be heard; they are men and women of more than ordinary intelligence; some of them, Mr. Wright, of Boston, for instance, hav done noble work for enslaved humanity in times gone by; and they are all, no doubt, sincere in their unbelief."

The next, and last that we hav room to present at this time, is from the Albany Press and Knickerbocker of Monday the 14th:

"The Freethinkers closed their Convention yesterday with a number of thoughtful addresses by earnest men and women. The principal ones were by James Parton and Robert Ingersoll. Mr. Parton's lecture on Victor Hugo was a masterly effort, and everybody knows how eloquent Ingersoll is. The Convention is considered a great success."

And yet these were the men the Sun calls spouters!

Editorial Notes.

THE people of Concordia, Kan., are having a lively time over the Bible-in-the-schools question. So far the Freethinkers are ahead, and the Bible is out of the schools.

A GOOD local paper for the people living about Fall River, Kan., is the Times of that place. It is thoroughly independent and progressiv in politics, and Liberals can greet the editor as one of us.

IT is said that nine-tenths of the lawyers of Philadelphia are church-members. If so, this is probably because the church-members furnish them their practice, and they want to be on the ground.

THE attention of our readers is called to the advertisment of the new book, "Rational Communism." Those interested in sociological and economic subjects will find some new ideas vigorously presented in this work.

THE Independent announces with all the emphasis of italics that there will be no churches at the judgment seat of Christ. In the opinion of a great many good men, it would be better for the world if the abolition of churches should be begun right here and now.

FOR the especial benefit of Dr. Buckley of the Advocate, we chronicle the fact that at Cherokee, Kan., Sept. 6th, the Rev. Charles W. Price, Presbyterian clergyman of that place, hanged himself. This is an indication, probably, that only Freethinkers commit suicide.

THE report of the Altoona, Pa., Young Men's Christian Association for the past year is not a remarkably hopeful document. Only thirty members of both kinds hav been added, the boys' department has had to be discontinued, and "financially the Association has not so flattering a record as in the previous year."

A FRIEND writes to say that our ascription to A. B. Bradford of the first suggestion to change the name of the National Liberal League to American Secular Union is wrong. The Hon. S. R. Shepherd, ex-secretary of the state of Kansas, he says first suggested the change in these columns some time during the year 1883. A hasty glance at the file has not revealed Mr. Shepherd's name under the suggestion, but perhaps we overlooked it.

A WINNIPEG special to the Minneapolis News has the following account of the piety of the family of the rebel Riel: "Riel's wife, upon hearing of her husband's sentence, swooned, and has been prostrated since. It was feared she would die, but latterly she has recovered slightly. Riel's mother and family, being visited, were found grief-stricken. The poor old mother of seventy has refused almost all food since the receipt of the news. They all expect he will be hanged, and offer prayers daily for his safe transition to heaven. Archbishop Tache, and other influential Frenchmen, are said to be exerting influence to save Riel from the gallows. This influence is said to be exerted in consequence of Riel's renunciation of apostasy to Protestantism. White Cap, the famous Sioux Indian chief, who joined Riel at Batoche, has been arrested and taken to Regina. He is implicated in a murder, and will be an important witness in some cases pending in court at Regina."

WRITING of the New York state Convention and the coming Congress of the League, Tucker's Liberty says: "Those who realize the graver issues now pressing upon the world's attention cannot throw themselvs into a movement devoted exclusivly to religious Liberalism, but they are none the less glad to see it go on and grateful for its undoubted broadening effect on the minds of the people." We beg permission to once more remind Mr. Tucker that until the people's minds are broadened by religious Liberalism, the working out of the "graver issues" he speaks of will be but a dream in the minds of a few humanitarians. Wheat sown on sunbaked soil will never produce a harvest.

IN a Christian journal H. K. Carroll, LL.D., discusses Matthew Arnold's idea of immortality, which is "to liv in the eternal order which never dies." This Mr. Carroll finds to be nothing more than the idea held by the Atheistic and Agnostic schools of thought, and since Mr. Arnold rejects all that is essential of Christianity, he sees no reason to class Mr. Arnold with others than the Materialists. In Mr. Arnold's recent article on immortality Mr. Carroll finds "all the charm which makes that master of style so irresistible, and all the vagueness of definition which marks his school and puzzles and provokes his critics. He leads his readers through a beautiful maze whither no logic can follow; and perhaps he ought to be studied as he studies Isaiah of Jerusalem—not as a prophet, but for his poetical beauty and soft, sweet spirit." But Mr. Carroll also finds "a trace of the same charm in the 'Agnostic poems' of Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, who has a poet's imagination and a poet's soul for the music of words. He, too, glorifies the ghost of hope, and strives to kindle, by his rapt and moving measures, in the individual a lofty aspiration to be lost in the great and glorious 'All-life.' The golden age, he says, is coming. Sorrow and pain, war and strife, disease and discord, aching hearts and darkened minds, still linger; but

. . . "'Hope, exultant, breaks the iron bar,
And the sweet morrow bursts to bloom.' . . .

and

"'The boundless future breathes its ample dower
Upon the toil and struggle of to-day.'"

We hav a good deal of sympathy with this Christian critic of Mr. Arnold. This latter gentleman is forever using Christian phraseology to set forth Atheistic thought. Personal immortality is either true or it is not. Mr. Arnold certainly has his own opinion upon the subject. And we think the English language is copious enough to tell what he thinks without borrowing from the church.

UPON the death of the Hebrew philanthropist, Moses Montefiore, the Christian Register cast these reflections upon orthodox Christianity:

"During the last two hours of his life Sir Moses Montefiore was frequent in prayer; and frequently, among his latest breathings, were heard the ejaculations of a soul at peace: 'Thank God! Thank heaven!' Judging the tree by its fruits, how few professed Christians might dare to compare their life with his! Yet, according to the doctrin which still holds the mind of Christendom in bondage and darkness, this great, pure, faithful soul was fatally self-deceived, and has passed to endless sorrow."

This set rather hard upon orthodox stomachs, and the Independent cast about for some one to get the churches out of the dilemma. The man was found in the professor of didactic and polemic theology in Princeton Theological Seminary, Mr. Archibald Alexander Hodge, D.D., LL.D. This gentleman coolly says:

"Cordially accepting as true all that the Christian Register would claim as to the moral and spiritual elevation of his [Montefiore's] life, we triumphantly claim it all, as we do every blooming oasis in the wilderness of human life, as a result and trophy of our savior's gracious power. It is to us incredible that he, if he was the man represented, ever consciously rejected the true Christ, apprehended as he is in himself. What he, through national Jewish prejudice, may hav failed to appreciate, was not the real Christ, but a distorted reflection cast by the so-called Christian world of the day. Or, very probably, loving and embracing the real Jesus in his heart, his intellectual bias and national and social position may hav so modified his expression of Christian faith as to render it unrecognizable by us."

Of all the brazen impudence that has found its way into print in recent days, this claim of Dr. Hodge's approaches the nearest to the sublime. Dr. Hodge is the right man in the right place. A professor of didactic theology should be incapable of reasoning. The trustees of Princeton ought to raise their professor's salary.

THE Rev. John Demand ordered the business manager of the Lexington Register to discontinue sending him the paper, because the editor printed Colonel Ingersoll's comments upon the revision of the Old Testament. After Mr. Demand's name had been erased from the list, the editor found time to say: "We suggest to the Rev. Demand that he hav the North American Review suppressed—that ornament of American literature and pride of American scholarship and statesmanship, the equal of the North British Review in Britain, and of the Revue Des Deux Mondes in France. For it published the controversy between Colonel Ingersoll and Judge Black, and nine-tenths of all the ministers in the United States bought it and read it. We suggest, further, that the Rev. John Demand, of Concordia, go for the scalp of the Rev. Heber Newton, of New York, who lately preached on 'The Good and the Bad in Ingersoll.' We suggest, further, that Mr. Demand himself demolish Ingersoll and his arguments, and we hereby tender him the use of the Register's columns, and assure him our warmest plaudits if he will knock the great modern pagan into smithereens. But we hav not yet reached the parties who deserve Mr. Demand's greatest displeasure. They are the bishops and other clergy, doubtless not less learned, pious, and honest than Mr. Demand, who made the revision. Had they not piped, Ingersoll could not hav danced. Hell was understood to be one kind of a place, described in certain catechisms and church books; sheol is quite another, as forty centuries of use among oriental scholars, priests, and prophets indicate. It was not Infidels who hav given the idea such a heavy blow—it was other sects of Christians. Ingersoll is not a greater enemy of the clergy than is the whole sect of Christians known as Friends, or Quakers, who dispense with preachers entirely. Would Mr. Demand, therefore, stop his paper if we were to mention them? We hope that on due deliberation the Rev. Demand will abandon the old European methods of suppressing free thought and free speech, and adopt the enlightened American plan, which is based on the idea of Jefferson that if we giv truth and error a fair field, and no favor, truth will ultimately triumph. America is the land of toleration, and we hope Concordia will never differ from the rest of this land of liberty." Probably Mr. Demand feels better now.

THE New York Herald printed this last Thursday:

"One of the important points made by Mr. Chamberlain in his recent speech in Glasgow was the necessity of divorcing the state and religion. In this matter all Americans and Irishmen are with him. Whatever may hav been the reasons why the church should preside over the state, or why the state should preside over the church, in times past, those reasons hav in this age become null and void. Real freedom of thought is inevitably crushed when the government says to the people: 'This is my kind of religion, and it shall always hav the first chance. All other kinds must be contented with the second chance.' There is something ridiculous to an American mind in an attempt by a government to control, or even bias, the religious convictions of the people. If the president, besides the immense patronage he already possesses, had the appointing power over all the larger religious societies in the United States, and could affect religious public opinion as he can affect political public opinion, we should all feel that we were under an intolerable thraldom. Disestablishment would become an issue at the polls, and the people would very quickly dispose of any interference with their freedom of thought. In England the crown is declared by Parliament to be the supreme head of the realm in matters spiritual as well as temporal. The sovereign has the right to nominate to all vacant archbishoprics and bishoprics. Ecclesiastical councils are summoned in the queen's name. The man who aspires to place or social standing is influenced by the fact that the distinctivly English church is a safe starting point. The agitation in favor of disestablishment has been going on for many years. Mr. Chamberlain represents a very large and a constantly increasing constituency, and by and by they will win a great victory. State interference in matters of religion is an anomaly which cannot be too soon abolished. It is an insult to every thinking man and a brake on the wheels when we are traveling along the hard up-grade of true progress."

The Herald talks very sensibly upon the relations of the church and state in England, but why is not its influence used against the practical union of church and state which exists in this country?

A SAN FRANCISCO paper says that not long ago a lady of San Francisco was suddenly overwhelmed by a great, crushing affliction, that, coming like a thunderbolt upon her, for a time threatened her life. Her son, and only child, had gone on a short business journey, expecting soon to return. Sudden and fatal illness overtook him, and a brief telegram announced the dreadful tidings to his heart-broken mother. The terrors of the Calvinistic creed, in which she had been brought up, and according to which, as she well knew, there was no hope of future happiness for the unconverted young man, added greatly to her agonizing grief over his death, until her friends feared that her reason, if not her life, would be destroyed. A lady friend, who had sympathized deeply with and vainly sought to console her, informed Colonel Ingersoll, and begged him, if possible, to write something which might at least relieve in a measure the terrible apprehension as to the fate of her son under which she was suffering. The following is his letter:

"MY DEAR MADAM: Mrs. C. has told me the sad story of your almost infinit sorrow. I am not foolish enough to suppose that I can say or do anything to lessen your great grief, your anguish for his loss; but maybe I can say something to drive from your poor heart the fiend of fear—fear for him. If there is a God, let us believe that he is good, and if he is good, the good hav nothing to fear. I hav been told that your son was kind and generous; that he was filled with charity and sympathy. Now, we know that in this world like begets like, kindness produces kindness, and all good bears the fruit of joy; belief is nothing—deeds are everything; and if your son was kind he will naturally find kindness wherever he may be. You would not inflict endless pain upon your worst enemy. Is God worse than you? You could not bear to see a viper suffer forever. Is it possible that God will doom a kind and generous boy to everlasting pain? Nothing can be more monstrously absurd and cruel. The truth is that no human being knows anything of what is beyond the grave. If nothing is known, then it is not honest for anyone to pretend that he does know. If nothing is known, then we can hope only for the good. If there be a God your boy is no more in his power now than he was before his death—no more than you are at this moment. Why should we fear God more after death than before? Does the feeling of God toward his children change the moment they die? While we are alive they say God loves us; when will he cease to love us? True love never changes. I beg of you to throw away all fear. Take counsel of your own heart. If God exists your heart is the best revelation of him, and your heart could never send your boy to endless pain. After all, no one knows. The ministers know nothing. All the churches in the world know no more on this subject than the ants on the anthills. Creeds are good for nothing except to break the hearts of the loving. Let us hav courage. Under the seven-hued arch of hope let the dead sleep. I do not pretend to know, but I do know that others do not know. Listen to your heart, believe what it says, and wait with patience and without fear for what the future has for all. If we can get no comfort from what people know, let us avoid being driven to despair by what they do not know. I wish I could say something that would put a star in your night of grief—a little flower in your lonely path—and if an unbeliever has such a wish, surely an infinitly good being never made a soul to be the food of pain through countless years.

"Sincerely yours, R. G. INGERSOLL."

This letter, says the San Francisco paper, was in a good measure effectiv. "On reading it," the lady wrote, "the first peace I had known—real peace—since the terrible blow came to me." What a commentary on Calvinism! Crazed by the thoughts inspired by Christian teachings, the stricken mother finds consolation in the words of one who disbelieves in the God she has all her life feared. Surely it is humanity triumphing over religion.

Letters from Friends.

OVERTON, GA., August 30, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I find great pleasure in reading it. My religion and opinion on most subjects being different from that of any of my acquaintances, this places me where

"There's not a kind, congenial heart
Where I can claim the meanest part."

But even in this dark hour THE TRUTH SEEKER has articles in it which shed radiance to my mind, and are perfectly congenial. The author of some of these articles is Charles C. Johnson. I cannot think of any way of expressing my admiration and thanks to him unless you will allow me to do so through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Each week when the mail comes this valuable paper is the first that my hands grasp. I turn over the leaves, glancing at the names of the writers, and if I see the name of Charles C. Johnson you may be assured I stop here and read his piece before going farther. I read his piece first—invariably first. And why? Because he is in favor of woman's rights. It always fills me with joy to see that a man is in favor of woman s rights. I often see articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER on this subject, but the authors of them are generally women, and all the women could not do much good if the men were still against it, the reins of the government being in the hands of the men. Seldom do you see a man in favor of woman's rights; they themselvs hav all the rights desired, and do not wish for their mothers, sisters, wives, and daughters to share them. Man goes about enjoying himself, making speeches, voting, accumulating knowledge and popularity; woman stays at home, cooks, sews, scours, and irons; thus what few flowers are in her dwarfed mind are trampled on and wither. If a woman has a stronger mind than is usual among her sex, and a will of equal strength, she is called a virago. When she wishes to break the fetters that bind her to the earth, she is called a lunatic! A man can express his opinion and it be all right, but a woman that expresses hers is accused of being very anxious to get noticed. If a woman rules her husband he is henpecked, and the laughing-stock of the neighborhood. I can not possibly see why it is worse for a man to be ruled than for a woman. Oh! would that there were more strong-willed women!

I go to church occasionally, but do not get converted, and don't think I will till the church turns in favor of woman's rights, and ceases to worship John Wesley and St. Paul.

Please let us hear oftener from Mr. Johnson. Many thanks to him for the article entitled, "Equal Rights for Woman and Man." DARLINA BELL.

COLLEGEVILLE, Sept. 8, E.M. 285.

MR. EDITOR: It is with great regret that I announce the dissolution of my daughter, Clarene Rhoades, by consumption, in her seventeenth year. She was an Agnostic of the Thomas Winter and Otto Wettstein proclivities, and had written some able articles for the Phœnixville Messenger, a Freethought paper at Phœnixville, and held in it a discussion with a minister as to "The Right to Use the Bible in Public Schools" less than a year ago. She was loved by orthodox as well as by Liberals, because of her forgiving and persuasiv nature. She held that philanthropy should be the aim of humanity; that opinions were not crimes; that as factors in nature we return to nature and assume other identities; that circumstances in their various phases of cause and effect produce the consequence of all phenomena, and that mind, as well as body, is but the result of correlation and co-ordination of matter by force.

She was a student at Ursines college, and her preceptors assure me they thought her precocious. She never personified an ideal except death. In her last suffering she asked me to go bring her death, but she never mentioned God, heaven, hell, or any imaginary being or location. Her mother is orthodox, and as Clarene was an activ member of the Young People's Association, which is under the guidance of clergy, the minister called to see her frequently, but without any change of conviction. In my presence he told her she must put her faith in him who comforteth. She made no reply to anything sectarian, as she was too weak to argue, but when he retired she said, "Papa, maybe its a she and not a he," and smiled. In the night, after a spell of exhaustion, she said, regarding the change soon to come of future identity, "Will I be a pauper or potato next?" and I assured her that affinities were in material, and fragrant flowers were as fond of her as she of them—botany being her especial favorit. She suffered, but I compared her suffering to Hypatia, to Jesus, and Socrates, and she was relieved. It was her desire to hav Helen Gardener, or one of the progressiv lady friends of the League, deliver her funeral remarks, but she said, "Probably they would not come, I am so little, poor me!" We had set our minds to visit the Albany Convention, for there we hoped to meet those speakers and thinkers of whom she intended to become one. She charged me about a month before her demise to put her TRUTH SEEKERS carefully away, and she had me read them up to your last issue.

I am at present holding an argument (only I do all the arguing) in the Phœnixville Messenger with a minister on the subject of, "Hereafter, is it a Myth?" There ought to be a League there, as there are a number of Freethinkers.

Yours very fraternally, J. P. RHOADES.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Aug. 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The question with Freethinkers is: How shall we best proceed against those who hold the fort of superstition, whose magazines are crammed with ancient and time-honored missils of war, such as authority, sacred scriptures, altars, creeds, forms, ceremonies, and prayers, to which might be added the superstitious fears of their rank and file, by and through which they enforce payment of drafts daily upon national, state, county, and city treasuries, for their support?

One suggests that we bombard their works with natural philosophy, until so full that theology will hav no room to manipulate its machinery. Another recommends that the legal cannon of the Constitution be aimed at them until they acknowledge and surrender to us our lawful rights. A third holds theology to be a cross between facts and philosophy, the superior of either as a feeder and kicker, but now susceptible of improvement in its own line, and proposes to remedy the difficulty by getting more facts and a better philosophy than from these, propagate a new and revised theology, the advocates of which could be sent as detectivs into the old theological camp—having the regulation affix and prefix of doctor, reverend, etc., they would be able to deceive the very elect.

For my part, I think we should show a bold front, and if walled sacredness stands in the way of human equality and justice, assail its ramparts from foundation to turret; neither recognize nor use any superfluity before or after a man's name which would indicate to our children that such person is entitled to their respect, mixed with fear and affection. "Reverend," when translated, means the right to awe a person into submission. That a claim to knowledge, belief, or theory in regard to life hereafter should hav imbued men with the idea that such claim licensed or in any way gave them authority to impose burdens upon the balance of humanity, ought to convince every thinking mind that either depravity or inexcusable ignorance pervades the whole theological camp.

Opinions and speculations about what life consists of at the poles, upon the various planets, or in that realm where the dead (to us) may exist, are wholly of a private character, and whether facts or fancies, should in no way be regulated or supported by legal enactments. Because a hundred or more Spiritualists of Kansas City hav stood up in court and testified that they hav seen and talked with the so-called dead, that knowledge does not giv them permission to awe anyone into believing their statements, or authorize them, on the plea that the spirits commanded them to do so, to start a soap factory, label every box and bar sacred soap for sanctification unto salvation, get the government to authorize its sole use in Congress, state legislatures, army, courts of justice, state prisons, and Indian reservations, and hav the whole business exempted from taxation, with certain days legally set apart for a general washing up.

If knowledge in regard to a future life cannot be learned without students being sunk in superstition, or becoming the slaves of priestcraft—the greatest curse ever imposed upon humanity—then I say it were better that the mantle of material conditions continues to envelop our minds until it drops away by decay. Yours, etc., W. W. JUDSON.

CARROLTON, ILL., Sept. 6, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, for which please send me Gibbon's "History of Christianity," and use $3 for your noble paper. I like the paper very well; every Freethinker in America ought to subscribe for it. I think the editor could not be beat. Yours respectfully, JEFFERSON P. HILL.

SHERWOOD, TENN., Aug. 26, 1885.

DEAR OLD TRUTH SEEKER: Please come to my heart once again. Almost one whole year I hav been down here amid Bibles, churches, and Sunday-schools. Even in the land where Sam Jones holds forth to waiting thousands, I hav been starving, yea, dying, for thy cheering, sacred presence. I am longing to hear from all the dear old contributors of thy dear pages. Feeding a Freethinker on Christianity is like feeding a horse on oats. No relish for such diet. MRS. G. W. PARKS.

CLEOPATRA, Mo., Sept. 7, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to giv a brief outline of my experience for the last fifty years. In doing so I ask no especial favors, and fear no just criticism. All the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER may not hav been situated as I was forty and thirty years ago, when it was a crime to learn the little colored children their letters or to read. We could play, sing, and romp, but we must not teach them in books.

About that time I knew men to buy women, beget children, then sell women and children to the highest bidder. Such people were then very zealous Christians. Then New Year's Day was the time to hire and sell negroes. I hav known them to go from the auction-block after selling a part of their family, take their Bible and read, "Servants, be obedient to your masters;" then kneel down and thank God they were not as the heathen. Twenty-seven years ago I was one of a large audience that heard Mr. Campbell say that the only proper relation that could exist between the white and black race was that of master and servant. At that time I knew something more than had been taught me. I began to think. Then I thought, Bible or no Bible, I would giv all I had to wipe out and off the statute books clauses that would giv one individual the control of another. In those days the slave that did not obey his master was beaten with many stripes. I hav participated in many scenes where blood flowed swiftly enough to make null and void the precepts of that infallible book.

Some twelve years ago I got far enough along to revise that book so as to make it defend Universalism—put out the fires of an endless hell. I labored as best I could to get the attention of people who now liv not more than forty miles from me—get them to lay aside that old gloomy, soul-blighting view of an endless hell. Now, although many of them had large experience, yet when I confronted them with the doctrin of Universalism they egged me severely. So I hav found out that you cannot compromise with Christianity.

But the world moves. On the 26th, 27th, and 28th of August Mr. Remsburg came here and gave us three lectures. "False Claims of the Church," "The Sunday Question," and the third day "Bible Morals." A very fair attendance each day; good order, no eggs, and no heathenish threats. Christianity got the severest shaking-up that ever came in this part of their moral vineyard.

To think freely, and then defend and do what we think to be right, is a privilege too sacred to be rudely torn away from any personal self-conscious being. The one true to self cannot get rid of this feeling. Disobedience to it for any cause reduces the mind to shame and remorse.

Hoping that all who attend the National Congress may hav a good time, I remain Yours for truth, J. W. DAY.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., Sept. 3, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just returned from Williamson county, this state, where I got you one subscription. Several others expressed a desire to take the paper.

I hav been in the habit for several years of sending your papers, after reading them, to different parties in Kentucky, Kansas, Missouri, and also different places in this state, hoping thereby to be instrumental in the dissemination of what I conceive to be the truth. I fancy I hav done a little in that line to assist you, and also greatly benefited my fellow men and women. I hav been reading the grand old TRUTH SEEKER for a little over eleven years, and hardly think I could enjoy myself without it.

I wrote you a letter some two or three months ago, which I am sorry you did not publish. It pertained in part to Mr. C. F. Pidgeon, of Indianapolis, a so-called medium who, I think, defrauded me out of two dollars. It was not the loss of the money that most concerned me, but the principle involved. I am a Materialist, but, on a limited scale, at times endeavor to investigate the Spiritual phenomena and the theory of a continued life. Among my warmest friends here are many Spiritualists, who are as anxious apparently as myself that honest investigators should be warned against risking their money in the hands of dishonest parties.

Yours for truth and progress, WM. A. THOMPSON.

SPRINGPORT, MICH., Sept. 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: On Tuesday evening, Sept. 1, 1885, that little giant John E. Remsburg treated the people of this town and vicinity to that beautiful and truthful lecture, "Bible Morals." And, notwithstanding the fact that there were three other meetings in the little town on the same evening, a large audience assembled in Oyer's Opera Hall, and listened with marked attention to the entire lecture. Not one person, I believe, left the hall during its delivery. The minister of the place, Elder Steffe, and Dr. E. M. Winslow, who crossed swords with C. B. Reynolds, but were forced to an unconditional surrender, on May 17th last at Clarence Centre, Mich., were in the audience and listened to the entire lecture, and, judging from the fact that up to this date they hav not attacked the very able and gentlemanly lecturer, as is their usual custom, must hav been thoroughly convinced of its truthfulness and moralizing influence on the mind of all present. Truth is mighty and must prevail, but the advocates of the Bible religion hate it as their devil does holy water. There is no delusion in truth, therefore they dare not face it. Let us hav more truth and more light, and the direful influence of church superstition will be superseded by the more noble influence of such truths as science has demonstrated and progressiv minds accept. J. A COURTRIGHT.

WYMORE, NEB., Aug. 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.75, which you will please apply as follows: $2.50 to THE TRUTH SEEKER; $1 for "History of Council at Nice," by Dean Dudley; and 25 cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ALMANAC.

On last Sunday evening the Liberals of this community had the pleasure of listening to that silver-tongued young Ingersoll, J. L. Andrews. Mr. Andrews is a speaker of no small caliber, as he proved by the masterly manner in which he handled his subject before the Liberals of this and adjoining communities. The subject was "The Vindication of Modern Infidelity." He spoke for one hour and a half to a well-filled house, who listened very attentivly. The religious mossbacks of the neighborhood trotted out one of their most prominent sky-pilots to defend their cause and pulverize Mr. Andrews and his arguments. The s. p. marched in with church military honors, staking himself down and stacking his hams in close proximity to the speaker, but to the utter dismay of himself and followers they soon found out their big gun was of too small a caliber, and was too weak a machine to land the smallest shot in the speaker's camp; whilst the chain-shot from the lips of the silver-tongued orator completely riddled their doctrinal fort. The props of their stronghold one by one gave way, and at last with a mighty crash the already partially decayed structure fell. When the smoke and dust had sufficiently cleared away, in the distance could be seen the enemy retreating, dragging their big church gun behind them, so completely spiked that I doubt if they can find a theological drill of sufficiently strong texture to remove the spike so that this big church gun can again be persuaded to face the enemy of superstition and fraud. The speaker in passing the beautiful field of thought and reason was very careful not to leave the bars down, giving the mangy curs no chance to get into the fold with their hideous doctrins. The impression made by this lecture was good. Application having already been made to me for the loan of some Freethought works, I hav distributed a great many of my TRUTH SEEKER tracts, etc., and quite a few who believed their happiness depended upon their belief in the Christian creed are beginning to realize that the religion of humanity is far preferable to that of rotten theology. I must now conclude, wishing success to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that its banner of light and truth may illuminate the whole civilized world.

Yours for Freethought and truth, ALBERT HOWELL.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Sept. 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue two weeks ago E. A. Stevens inquires whether nearly all founders of republican institutions, and fighters for enlarged political liberty, hav not been Freethinkers. Also, if this be so, how can politics and theology be allies? Presuming he desires an answer, I reply to question number one, "Yes, verily." To question number two, I answer, because more liberty means less politics. Absolute liberty would be no politics or government at all. If republics had ever been founded on that, the question would be pertinent, but such is not the case. To found a republic has always meant to abolish monarchy or aristocracy. A perusal of the works of Herbert Spencer ought to convince Mr. Stevens that government and theology are "born in one womb," as "X" said. C. L. JAMES.

LOCUST BAYOU, ARK., Sept. 5, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed stamps to pay for one copy of Brother Babcock's "Religion of Humanity Better Than Eternal Punishment." I wish to say to you there are some of my friends as anxious to get THE TRUTH SEEKER as myself, but talk to them about subscribing and they are too poor. I wish to return thanks to Brother Otto Wettstein for his very (as I think) able communication, "Is Theology Progressiv?" As I heard an old gentleman remark about a certain sermon, "It was enough to convert the world"—but I could not see the point—and that article I think sufficient to settle the God question. I think that article worth the price of the paper. JOHN H. HASLAM.

ODESSA, Mo., Sept. 9, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav for a long time been anxiously looking for some of our leaders to come out with some rousing articles on organization. What can we accomplish by warring against the church in our present weak, unorganized state? The church is a powerful thing only because of its organization. And of what, in all this organization, does its power chiefly consist? Plainly its fine church buildings, its seminaries, its asylums. Take these away and it becomes a mere shadow, but these are mighty fortifications which can only be successfully stormed from edifices dedicated to Freethought. The devotees of the church take shelter behind these fortifications. And we can't stand out in the open air and bad weather and reach them by the most powerful shafts of reason that can be forged. No, there they will sit securely, and complacently hug their pet superstitions, bidding defiance to the eloquence of Ingersoll, to the logic of Watts, to the pen of Bennett, and to all the rest of the noble sons of liberty and truth. Yes, there they will sit, crying out to us, with a smile of contempt upon their lips: "Don't you feel cold out there in the rain and the wind and the snow? What hav you been doing all this time? Where are your seminaries, your asylums? What are you making all that fuss about? How many heathens hav you civilized? Show us some of the wonderful works you hav done before you presume to show us our errors?" Yea, yea, like the monomaniac who found a friend out on an errand of humanity, overpowered him, cut his sinews so as to completely disable him, and then with satanic exultation stood over him tantalizing him with, "Why don't you get up, you dog, and be a brave man like me?" they hav disabled Freethought, smothered liberty by all manner of unfair means, and now, as the colonel says, they sit upon the dead limbs of the tree of knowledge and hoot, "If you know so much, why havn't you done wonders like us?"

I can see plainly, my friends, that what we want worst of all now are Freethought halls and Freethought schools. Let us hav these first. We must hav them before we can expect much success. It is claimed that this town has about three thousand inhabitants. It has eight churches. There are some Liberals here, but they think it best to keep very mum on the subject of religion. I hav not met a single man yet in this state who takes a Liberal paper, though I know there are many such at other places in the state. WM. L. WORLEY.

AURORA, ILL., Sept. 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Doubtless you will think strange of my writing to you; but we hav been taking your paper for some time, and I think it perfect in every sense. You express my opinion every time, but I imagin you are not hitting the church hard enough. I used to take THE TRUTH SEEKER when Mr. Bennett was editor, and what a noble man he was, and how he battled for the good cause! Would that we had a few more enlisted on our roll! My uncle, Dr. Hevel, of Shawneetown, was one of his disciples, and also a friend of R. G. Ingersoll's.

Well, this town is a great place for Christians. Some few are not, but they don't hav courage enough to express their opinions; but I never fail to speak whenever I hav the pleasure.

For some time the Adventists hav been holding camp-meetings here. Elder Butler, of Michigan, preached yesterday afternoon. Subject, "Prevailing Prayer." He claims that Elijah's prayer had been answered, and he also said that prayer was the key that unlocks the door of God's heart, or fountain of blessing. He claims that the prayer of Daniel brought the angel Gabriel from the court of God. I think if he has ever had one prayer answered he might say so, and not repeat what had been done thousands of years ago without any living witness. My opinion is there is no God unless he loves what we love, and hates what we hate; for science is truth, and truth is God; and outside of truth there is no God, except what the people hav made. I could say more, but will not tire you.

Yours truly, MRS. S. ALICE HULL.

LEMOORE, CAL., Sept. 1, 285.

MR. EDITOR: At the request of a number of friends, some of whom are Spiritualists, I send for publication my experience in mental, or so-called spiritual, phenomena, as brief as possible.

At a very early age I was sent to the public school in Leicester, Mass., remaining till I was ten years old. Among my many playmates was a little girl about my own age. At the age of twelve years I ran away from home and went to sea (March 19, 1851). About May 8 or 9, 1855, I sailed from New York in the brig Samuel and Edward (Captain Ramonds) for South America, loaded with lumber. The weather was stormy—Father Neptune was in a rage. On the 10th of June, 8 P.M., I went to the forecastle, below decks forward, through a small hatchway, to lie down in my hammock. Scarcely a moment elapsed before I was strangely conscious of something in the hatchway attracting my attention, beyond my power of control. I watched, and first appeared a faint glimmer of bluish light, notwithstanding there was a slush lamp burning, affording sufficient light for all purposes. In this blue light at the foot of the hatchway ladder appeared, faint at first, but soon quite distinct, my little schoolmate, as of yore, beckoning to me to get up and go on deck. To convince myself that I was not dreaming, I went on deck many times, talked with the man on the lookout, got thoroughly wet, and went below again. The apparition was visible from my hammock, gesticulating as before, and remained till midnight, causing me much annoyance. June 11th, from 12 M. till 4 A M., was a repetition of the 10th; but on June the 12th, from 8 P.M. till midnight, my strange visitor was more distinct, more earnest in gesticulation. Her hair, before tied up, was now down, being tossed back with the left hand, while calling me up with the right. I watched, with strange feelings of awe, till I heard the man at the helm commence to strike eight bells (twelve o'clock, midnight), when my vision vanished, with what seemed to me almost a shriek. At the first tap of the bell I sprang aft to relieve the helm, reaching the quarterdeck not an instant too soon to escape the fate of my shipmates forward, by the brig colliding with an English East Indiaman homeward bound, during the darkest night of my recollection.

And now the sequel. It was, I think, in the spring of 1858 that I visited my old home and scenes of early childhood. Meeting my little schoolmate, with her parents, at a social gathering, I was invited to spend a few days with them. At the supper table, one evening, Mrs. —— asked me if Mr. —— had told me her three dreams about me on the 10th, 11th, and 12th of June, 1885 (being much talked of in the home circle, the dates were preserved). In relating her dream, she described the forecastle, the swinging bed (hammock), the ladder to go up, the tin lamp, and the gloomy appearance of the place, and said she waked up the last night with a scream.

The above experience may be called Spiritual manifestation, though I believe it to hav material foundation. For, first, I feel as though electricity was the life principle through all living nature and space, and the brain an electric battery, acting independently of the individual's will, by the natural forces controling it, receiving photographic impressions on its tablets through the senses, and transmitting communications through its own medium, electricity.

If this theory proves to be the fact, in the advance of knowledge and science to what extent may the brain powers be found to reach? It is surely more reasonable than a separate, ethereal identity, stretching the credulity to the very tear.

PIPPIN LAKE FARM, KENT, O., Sept. 7, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Three years ago only one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER was taken in this town. Two years later we sent you a club of five, this year we hav increased said club to twenty-two names, and another year we propose, with your aid, to make it fifty—thanks to the able manner in which said paper is conducted as an exponent of enlightened Secularism.

The effects of your good work are fast showing themselvs. Soon after we had increased our club from five to twenty-two names, the Kent Progressiv Liberal Club was organized, with J. W. Brainerd, president, G. W. Andrews and T. C. Heighton, vice-presidents, L. G. Reed, treasurer, R. R. Marsh and B. F. Conaway, together with the president, treasurer, and secretary (the writer), executiv committee. This is a direct result of the thought aroused by reading such live Freethought papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER.

We hav regular meetings in the town hall, where music, lectures, debates, essays, and select readings from THE TRUTH SEEKER are the main attractions of our fortnightly intellectual feasts. Already the club is hoping to become an auxiliary to the future American Secular Union, and wishes to know the necessary steps to be taken to secure said object and giv aid thereby to the cause of Secularism.

We now hav a fund subscribed as a base for a Freethought library, and propose soon to purchase suitable books for enlightening the people, and shall look to you to fill the order and giv us light as regards what works are best calculated to free the minds of people from the dictation of theological mossbacks and superstitious fossils. Truly yours,

MARIUS HEIGHTON.

ARLINGTON, NEB., Sept. 3, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the tag on my TRUTH SEEKER that my time for the same has expired. Would renew at this writing, but am trying to get a few more to subscribe with me. Hav one positiv promis, and several doubtfuls hanging fire; may or may not get them. Would like to get club of half a dozen from this place, priest-ridden and superstitious as it is. There ought to be one hundred copies of it taken in this immediate neighborhood for a few months. Reading it would not only enable the reader to do his own thinking, independent of priest or church, but to ask said priest or church hard questions to answer. Only yesterday, in a conversation with one of the followers of the meek and lowly, the questions soon became so embarassing to him that he refused to attempt to answer them, and attempted to crawfish out of the whole business by telling me that I dare not attack his priest—that I could not (as he styled it) stick him on the Bible. He told me that said priest could prove to me or anyone else that their God was a just and merciful God; that all the dogma, creed, and faith of their church were truths unanswerable; and that everything in the Bible was founded on justice, truth and mercy. This is the reply he made to me when I was quoting to him a number of passages from the old scarecrow fables of the ancients that are so damaging in the light of civilization to church and creed that they would be glad to be rid of them, to hear no more of them. But, beg as they may, they cannot explain them away; like Banquo's ghost, they will not down; they were being hauled into the truth by these terrible (to them) and merciless Infidels.

Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER right along, for I cannot do without it. Will send my own subscription and as many more as I can get.

I take ten newspapers, and when our papers happen to all come at once (as they often do), I get THE TRUTH SEEKER and peruse its entire contents before looking at any other paper.

Fraternally yours, C. A. WHITFORD.

VINELAND, Sept. 5, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: It is gratifying that J. P. Guild has spoken on the use of terms misrepresenting radical ideas, and that T. B. Wakeman does not disparage the criticism. Bruno's sentence, in which the word "God" appears, plainly implies that it means "highest power;" and to make it accord with his thought and work required a scientific, not a mythic, term.

I think that circulating written histories of brave and noble workers for humanity is more consistent, culturing, and every way beneficial than local monuments that comparativly few behold; and I trust general knowledge will ere long so decide.

But while it is deemed well to erect effaceable marble and metallic records, it is most desirable that they be expressed in words clearly presenting the advancement of the soul commemorated. This is due to that soul and to earthly progress. Let those who read inscriptions to Bruno's memory see that in his age science had taught that gods were myths, that their defenders were murderous tyrants, and that duped lay worshipers were reason-stinted slaves.

We disbelieve in lords, kings, and monarchs. Doubtless, majorities hav outgrown their service; the rest would be better served without them. Sentiments attached to one, few, or many gods hav ever been stultifying to the people. Religion binds the mind to worship Gods, saviors, popes, and priests, and is a debasement. Ethics means all the good implied in the term, and is pure and understandable. Worship holds the faculties in the childish state, and the word needs to be criticised, and will become obsolete with God, religion, and devil. Let us agitate, fearless of the popular lash, and spurn the last snare laid for us, called "unity of thought."

MARY E. TILLOTSON.

SOUTH BOSQUE, MCLENNAN CO., TEX., E.M. 285.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been in the toils again. I was persuaded to put my demit (Masonic) in a new lodge near me, and the following charges were immediately preferred, viz.: First, that I did not believe the Holy Bible was the word of God; second, that I did not believe in a personal God; third, that I said the tragedy enacted in the third degree was a farce and idolatrous; and fourth, I did not care for Masonry anyhow. Being guilty, I did not answer the charges nor put in a plea of unconstitutionality. The Worshipful Master is a preacher; the senior warden, his brother; the junior warden, Sunday-school superintendent; secretary, an amen Methodist. There was no chance for an honest skeptic. Yours for the spread of common honesty, D. F. MARRS.

WEBER CITY, WASH. TER., Sept. 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: After delaying some time, on account of the busy time here, I again want to pay my way for another year's good, sound reading. I hav been a subscriber several years, and you may count on me as long as I am able to pay you for your noble work. Long may you liv to keep THE TRUTH SEEKER floating over this grand country, that ought to be, what it is called, "the land of the free and the home of the brave." I think THE TRUTH SEEKER will yet be the escutcheon of our country—at least, I hope it may.

Yours for progress, JAMES LINDSAY.

DUSHORE, PA., Aug. 30, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $10—$2 for tickets to Albany Convention, which you can place where they will do the most good; $5 for the indefatigable Reynolds (my wife greatly enjoys his reports of his labors); $1 for Bruno Statue; and $1 toward expenses of TRUTH SEEKER cartoons.

Yours truly, W. WHITTICK.

OPEN LETTER TO ALL INFIDELS.

TROY, N. Y., Sept., 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Beware of the Prohibition party. It is a snake in the grass and is as crafty as the old-time Jesuits. It is the same old party that was headed by John Wesley, who said "the colonies had no right to be free." It is the old party that wished to crown Washington. It is the old gospel temperance party. It is the old brazen-faced Christ-in-the-Constitution party. And if they ever capture the government they will surely vote him in. This Christian party is well organized and they mean business. Already they control several states, and you all know what they will do if they gain the ascendency—vote away all liberty. S. D. JEFFERS.

ANGUS, MINN., Sept. 7, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The ANNUAL arrived in due season. I am very much pleased with it. Where will one find another such collection of noble faces as those which adorn the pages of the ANNUAL? The "Balaams" I tacked up in public places where he who runs may read, and the "Tigers" I sent to my Christian friends in different parts of the country. I would like to help on the good work, but like, Max Briggs, of Plymouth, I am trying to farm under difficulties, for my shanty lets the howling blizzard in, and I must go slow. However, I shall always be ready to do what I can. Yours, etc., E. T. BIGELOW.

FILLMORE, UTAH, Aug. 29, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I send you fifty cents, for which please send me three "Balaams" and three "Lessons in History." These pictures are superb in design, and ought to be lithographed or else engraved in steel. They speak more eloquently to those who are acquainted with history than volumes. I hope every Liberal will not only buy for himself, but place them where they will be able to do missionary work.

Accept also my thanks for the able manner in which you conduct THE TRUTH SERKER. It is, to my notion, the best Liberal paper yet, and is got up in a superb manner.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Right and Wrong.

Ever battle for the right,
Strive thou for it with thy might;
Thou with Giant Wrong must fight—
Oh, his heart is black as night!
But he flees before the right;
Before a soul that loves the light;
Before a soul kept pure and white;
Before the light of truth so bright.
Swift he takes his hurried flight,
Hides and cowers in his fright,
For he cannot bear the sight
Of one who loves the truth and right.

My Friends.*

Hail, glorious trees, that, robed in beauty,
Above the smiling valley stand!
Like watchful guardians on duty
O'er many a league of fertil land.
Your stately tops, in tall uprightness,
A monarch's royal aspect bear,
And bathed in sunset's golden brightness,
A fitting crown your foreheads wear.

Friends of my youth, how oft your glory
In childhood's fancies thrilled my heart,
And in your whispering leaves a story
Of grandeur did to me impart!
Seemed then your topmost branches slender
To brush the white clouds floating by,
And there I dreamed the open splendor
Of heaven about your tops did lie.

When summer sunshine bathed the meadow
And trembling rose the heated air,
How oft at noon I sought your shadow,
A refuge from the fiery glare!
There where the mystic influence bound me
That contemplation's hours arouse,
I, dreaming, left the world around me,
Lulled by the murmurs of your boughs.

When spring came with her varied blessings,
Amid your spray the zephyrs sung;
How soft, by summer's breeze caressing,
The oriole's pendulous nest was swung!
With autumn's advent new hues gaining,
How thrilled your leaves with strange alarms!
How loud arose your voice complaining,
When winter vexed your tossing arms!

Here, guided to your song-filled bower,
When grief oppressed my cares I brought,
Or refuge from the sudden shower
Beneath your sheltering branches sought.
Faithful and firm in all the changes,
Through passing years of loss and gain,
Searching, my mind its long list ranges
To find such loyal friends in vain.

Old friends, still in my memory linger
The tranquil hours I spent with you,
And time has traced with deathless finger
The picture that my boyhood knew.
Long may your mighty trunks unshaken
Stand glorious as the years go round,
And, silver-voiced, the songsters waken
Your boughs by leafy summer crowned.

When Mamma Was Little.

"It does seem so funny to think you were ever a little girl, mamma. You are so wise and brave now, and know so many things. Tell us, did you ever run and play, and tear things to pieces as we do? And did you ever get into mischief, and did your mamma scold you same as you scold us sometimes?" and little Mabel looked at her mother quizzically, while Albert and Charley paused in their play to hear what she would say in reply.

"All mothers were babies once, and grew into little careless, mischievous girls."

"And did you, mamma, grow into a little mischievous girl?" asked Albert.

"I suppose so," answered the mother.

"Won't you tell us, please, mamma dear, some of the things you did when you were little like us?" said Mabel.

"Oh, yes, if it will please you."

"Tell something that happened you," said Charley.

"Well, when I was small, perhaps two years old or less, we moved into our new house. The front room was unfinished and the carpenters were still at work upon it. I took great delight watching them drive nails, and one day when they had gone to dinner, I thought I would drive a nail or two. But the hammer was heavy, and my little hand unsteady, and hence I pounded my finger instead of hitting the nail. Of course I screamed terribly, and my mamma came and picked me up and told me I must never meddle with the workmen's hammer and nails any more.

"But I crept in the same room again the first opportunity I had, and in toddling about, I fell over upon an ax and cut my left hand badly. My mamma came and caught me up, while I cried and screamed fearfully.

"She bandaged the wounded hand, and as she was engaged about her work, I went creeping under our old-fashioned kitchen stove, and in trying to sit up beneath the oven, I gave my head a terrible bump and made a pretty severe gash in it. My mamma said, 'Oh, dear, what will you do next?'"

"What did you do next, mamma dear?" asked Mabel.

"I'll tell you. One day my mamma was washing, and when she went out to hang the clothes to dry, I ran immediately to the tub of rinsing water, and began to play at washing. When mamma came in she found me splashing and floundering in the tub of water, which, luckily, was not hot, or I would hav been scalded to death."

"Tell more, mamma, tell more," said the children in chorus.

"Shall I tell how I fell in a well, twice?"

"Oh, yes, yes, tell it, tell it," they all exclaimed.

"There was an old-fashioned well on the premises, about sixteen feet deep. It had a low curb, and was old-style, with a 'well-pole' that reached over into the next lot. There were mosses and pretty ferns growing inside the well, and in reaching over to pluck some, I lost my balance and tumbled in. Down I went to the bottom. As it happened, my papa had just been drawing a pail of water, and missed me while he poured the water into a bucket. He heard a splash, and saw, in a minute, what had happened. He went down in the well and soon had me out on dry land, but sopping wet, and a terribly frightened little girl.

"We, afterward, had a new well dug—about thirty feet deep it was, and nicely bricked. I thought it was a lovely well, and was always creeping and playing around it. One day, an unlucky movement, and into the well I went, head foremost. My papa missed me, and ran to the unfinished well, and he was awfully frightened, for he knew the well was deep and expected nothing else but that I would be drowned. He descended the well, telling me all the time to keep my hands and feet moving, so as to keep above water—that he was coming for me as fast as he could.

"'Papa is coming, little dear,' he said. 'Don't be frightened, darling, papa will soon be there.' I sank twice, and he caught me as I rose to the surface for the third time. I saw the stars as I looked up, although it was in the daytime, and then I did not know any more till I found myself in blankets and being rolled over and over in order to get the water out that I had swallowed."

"That was a narrow escape, mamma," said Albert.

"Yes, it was, but papa said he did not think I was born to be drowned, having twice fallen in a well, and come out alive.

"My mamma had died before that last accident, and I remember when they held me up to look at her as she lay so still in the casket. I said, 'Poor mamma, she is so cold,' for as I touched her white face, it chilled me. My little sister cried, and begged them to take mamma out of the box, and put her in her own bed."

They were all silent for a while, and Charley said, "Please tell more, mamma dear, about what you did when you were little."

"I think that will do for this time. It is enough for you to discover that your mamma was naughty and careless sometimes like all other children. She did not know any better, then, but she learned to be different after awhile, just as you and all children will. The best of children are troublesome at times, but they inherit their naughty qualities from their parents, and should not be blamed too severely for the little tricks and capers they cut. They are only children, and, in time, will outgrow childish actions." S. H. W.

Love at Home.

We were a merry family, among the hills of Pennsylvania—ten of us when I was at home. I was the oldest, and therefore was called upon to lead in all amusements. I will tell you of my last summer at home.

It was early spring when I left the town of E—— to go home for six months. The children were all well pleased to hav sister Flora with them, for they said: "Now we can go where we please. Ma is afraid we shall get lost if we go by ourselvs in the woods."

How well I remember the second Sunday after I went home! It was in April. How well I recall that beautiful morning when with four of my brothers and sisters I climbed a long hill, to be rewarded by countless views in all directions! Several villages were to be seen, which looked like birds' nests in the emerald green of pine and hemlock, so distant were they, while rivulets and cottages in the valleys formed a picture which must be seen to be appreciated. Then all around us, at our feet, burst forth spring's first beauties in the form of lovely flowers, which we gathered to carry home to mother, who was not strong enough to ramble with us. All trees were leafless except the evergreens, and the sun sent its golden rays through the barren boughs, its warmth sending new life and vigor through our young bodies as only a bright spring day can.

There were Annette, Permmilia, Elias, and Herbert. Annette said: "Who wants to think of the Gods to-day? I don't." All were of her opinion. So we gathered rare bits of moss, ferns, and skeleton leaves, and Nettie made a wreath as a memorial of this pleasant ramble. Annette was my favorit companion. Together we rode on horseback, or sat in a quiet nook and read Chainey's "Lectures on the Day of Rest." Sometimes we would all gather in the evening and sing beneath the grape-vine arbor long after the stars shone out, or take a gambol at hide-and-seek among the stumps in the new-mown clover field.

How pleasant it is to remember all this, and how important it is that we should cherish kindly feelings while at home together, for life will never be the same after we once leave home! It is three years since I left my father's house to make my home with a kind husband on the prairies of Illinois, but I still remember the days of my childhood and youth with the greatest pleasure. Puzzles in last week's Box correctly solved by J. E. Juergens.

Egyptian Superstition.

I promised to tell the children this week something of the Egyptian religion, and, for the better understanding of what follows, we will begin where we left off.

Above the mountain I mentioned last week lie seven heavens, as well as a paradise, through which flow precious streams of holy water. This is the place where the true believer in Allah, the Egyptian god, and his prophet, Mohammed, lead a life of bliss and pleasure in company with the pretty houris (maidens or young women) "whose black eyes," says an Eastern poet, "resemble pearls that are yet hidden in shells." These beautiful damsels, with the boys of paradise, present, it is believed, each pilgrim as he journeys thither with cups of a delicious beverage which neither causes headache nor clouds the reason—

"A Persian's heaven is easily made,
'Tis but black eyes and lemonade."

On the other hand, however, unbelievers fare badly at the hands of Allah, though not quite as badly as at the hands of Jehovah. For the former, after the sinner has suffered a few millions of years, relents, but the latter never.

In the sixth and fifth heavens, it is held, the sun and moon hav their abode, while in the highest heaven of all Allah sits on a large white throne, which rests on the backs and shoulders of the archangels Gabriel, Michael, and Israil.

Stars, when falling (apparently so, for they do not fall), are supposed by those whose faith is based on the Koran to be wicked angels or devils hurled over the battlements of the numerous heavens by Allah. These devils teach men evil deeds and Infidelity, and when an Egyptian sees one of these seemingly falling stars, it is his religious duty to say, "I take refuge with thee, O God, from the stoned devil."

The Egyptians are also great fortune-tellers. There are lucky and unlucky stars, and from these the fate of each "subject," as persons who seek fortune-tellers are denominated, is foretold. Hundreds make their living by this means, and the more credulous believe that these people can tell what will be the end of anything thought of or done. This is almost identical with the "guesses" made by the "fortune-tellers" (preachers) of our own country pertaining to the future state of man.

In conclusion, it will be seen by the young reader that Mohammedans, not in Egypt alone, but wherever encountered, are superstitious to a remarkable degree, and that where ignorance is bliss there do superstitions most abound. DAVID B. COZINE.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

THE PRESENT

AND

THE FUTURE REPUBLIC OF NORTH AMERICA.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A Book Advocating Associate Life as a Remedy for Poverty, Vice, and Crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

CONTENTS: The titles of some of the chapters are: Present External Appearance of Our Republic; Government and Laws; Finance; Public Improvements; Production and Distribution; Education; Morality and Religion; Marriage and Divorce; Life in the New Republic; Life in the Existing Republic; Examination of the Objections to Communism; Methods Proposed for the Transition from the System of Individual Property to a System of Collectiv Property; Danger. Price, $1.50.

Published and for sale by the Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York City.

THE RISE OF

INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

The Missing Link
—IN—
MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the realty of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. Poetry.

Railroad Rhymes.

[Suggested by reading Chatney's speech on "God and Bradlaugh."]

When God goes out from books and thrones,
From countries, creeds, and power,
When man comes into love and home,
There'll dawn another hour.
When phantoms of the misty brain,
From superstition's hand,
Shall lose their godly might and fame,
Then shall we safer stand.

If man does right, we're told that God
Inspired him to obey;
But if he grovels on the sod,
"The devil" has full sway.
So we within ourselvs are naught,
If half is true they've told,
But, like old Adam and his Eve,
Within their garden old,
We're born like idiots, brainless all,
And know not wrong from right,
Yet cursed if, weary with this pall,
We strive to gain more light.

Less love to God, and more for man,
Are needed in this life,
Less love for Jesus, more for homes,
For children, friends, and wife;
Less talk of future heaven and hell,
More knowledge, till we bind
The world in working for the truth,
And rights of all mankind.

From gods and demons we'll escape,
They are not up or down,
But in ourselvs we'll kill the last,
And giv all good a crown.
Let God go out and man come in,
Till justice holds full sway;
"Fly swifter round, ye wheels of time,
And bring the welcome day."

C. FANNIE ALLYN.

The Co-operativ Movement.

When opening the co-operativ congress in Oldham, England, recently, Mr. Lloyd Jones claimed a splendid success for the distributiv branch of co-operation. And he did so with good reason. The success of this branch of co-operation is proved by the fact that the one co-operativ body organized forty-one years ago has not only enormously expanded in membership and operations, but has imparted an impulse which has resulted in the formation of no less than fourteen hundred such bodies that still survive. Many productiv associations hav failed, but the distributiv associations hav quite generally succeeded. The great parent association formed at Rochdale in 1844 was originally distributiv merely, but it now carries on wholesale and retail shops, dairies, flour-mills, and other producing as well as trading establishments, and in addition to this has established libraries, schools, news-rooms, literary societies, and social clubs.

The success of these associations is not proved by statistics merely. It is a fact that they hav pretty much destroyed the old retail credit system, which was a system of robbery of small customers. The co-operators hav learned to exercise prudence in making their purchases. The cash system has taught them economy, and educated them in many of the social virtues. They hav learned that by temporary self-denial they can greatly increase the sum of their enjoyments. The men and their families hav been greatly lifted up in the social scale. They are more sober, more industrious, better clothed, housed, and fed, and, having come into possession of property, they hav learned the importance of law, and hav become better supporters of the civil authority.

In commenting upon the proceedings of the convention the London Standard draws attention to the fact that between co-operation and Communism there is a very radical difference, and that this difference, which is not always recognized, could not fail to be apparent to anyone who attended to the speeches and doings of the delegates. The Communists want to begin by making an equal division of the earnings of those who, by the exercise of superior faculties or the practice of self-denial, hav accumulated something; in other words, they propose to begin with the robbery of those who hav something by those who hav nothing. Having done that, they propose to abolish the motivs by which men are commonly actuated, to destroy individualism, to abolish the great incentiv to industry and frugality. The co-operators are about as far removed as possible from the Communists. They do not propose to confiscate, or rob, or to destroy any incentiv to the exercise of the social virtues. On the contrary, they seek to lift themselvs to a higher plane by the exercise of intelligence and self-denial. Their associations do not hav the effect to absorb the individual and merge him in the mass, but rather to develop his individuality and self-respect. They are, therefore, wholly commendable.

While distributiv co-operation has been remarkably successful in England, not so much can be said of productiv co-operation. The history of this is to a very great extent a history of failures—many of them very disastrous. As an example of many of these, the case is mentioned of the purchase of the Shirland collieries by the South Yorkshire coal-miners. The agreed price was £70,000, of which the miners paid down £31,000. The result of the venture was the loss of the entire capital put in by the men. The failures seem in most cases to be due to the inability of the co-operators to weather adversity. In productiv co-operation losses hav to be sustained more frequently than in distributiv co-operation. In the latter, purchases are made at wholesale prices, and as sales are for cash there is little danger of loss, provided a fair degree of honesty and prudence is exercised in the business management. In productiv operations the case is different. More skill and judgment are required in carrying them on, and with the best of management losses will from time to time occur. The men either lack the means to weather seasons of adversity, or, if they hav the means, they lack the courage. The history of productiv associations shows that all goes on swimmingly so long as the profits are satisfactory; but when adversity compels them to call up reserves, they are pretty sure to go to pieces.

But, notwithstanding all the failures in this branch of co-operation, there is a remarkable persistency on the part of the workmen. And what is curious is the fact that there has lately been a revival of it in those industries which hav suffered most from the prevailing depression. The reason for this is said to be that, owing to the stress of competition and other causes, these industries are found to be no longer capable of supporting two classes of income-earners. Employers cannot get a satisfactory percentage on their capital if the men get as high wages as they hav been receiving. The men, therefore, are trying to solve the problem by banding together and pocketing profits as well as wages. It is doubtful, however, whether this is the true explanation. The fact seems to be that there is a division of gains between workmen and capitalists as before, but the capitalist appears in the character of a lender, and not of an employer. Because he offers to advance the machinery, tools, buildings, etc., the men supplying only the materials used, the latter are tempted to make the venture in the hope of increasing their earnings. That they are to some extent successful is probable, but that bad failures will occur is not less probable.

Many of the associations that are called co-operativ are not so in the strict sense of the word. Indeed, the Standard says that very few of them are so. The most of them do not differ in any essential respect from joint-stock concerns. The members of the association hold shares in some trading or industrial business, but take no part in the business themselvs. Many operativs in the Lancashire cotton factories own stock in one mill and work in another. There is not so much real co-operation in such a case as there is in the case of partners taking an activ part in the business. It is not of so much importance, however, what these associations are called. The important fact is that their influence upon the characters of workmen is potent for good. They hav been highly instrumental in begetting habits of saving and thrift, and hav in many ways improved the social condition and the characters of workmen. By their influence men who formerly were thriftless, dissipated, ready to join in any raid upon capital, hav been transformed into law-abiding men and good members of society. Whereas they were once a source of danger, they hav become bulwarks of public order and peace. These men constitute a conservativ force which will go far to counteract any ill-effects of the extension of the electiv franchise that many Englishmen look forward to with no little apprehension.

These associations hav not been so successful in this country as they hav been in England, and comparativly few experiments hav been made here. The reason undoubtedly is that our population is too much in motion to form permanent associations with advantage. The man who is working in a New England factory this year may be working on a Western farm next year. A very large proportion of our working people regard either their employments or their places of sojourn as temporary. While, therefore, they are ready enough to enter into labor unions, their habits and ways of looking at life are such that they are not apt to enter into co-operativ associations which imply permanence of residence and employment. In time co-operation will become a feature of our industrial life, but that will be only when our restless population has become more settled.

UNIVERSAL HISTORY.
FOR
HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.
By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

Freethinkers will find this, for an outline history, the best for their use, as Professor Cottinger is a Freethinker, and in his reports of the church's actions has stated facts with a truthful freedom not found in ordinary histories. He dates his work from the beginning of historical certainty and not from the mythical Eden, as do most "universal" historians, and brings it down to 1883, with a brief mention of subsequent important inventions and discoveries.

ALL in a LIFETIME.
A ROMANCE.
BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

"The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks. . . . . But what pleased me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type. I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel. Suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached. Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of 'All in a Lifetime.' It will yield a liberal reward for the outlay."

Gems of Thought.

WHEN you show me a church based on the Golden Rule as its only creed, then I will unite with it —Abraham Lincoln.

THE best prayer at the beginning of the day is that we may not lose its moments; and the best grace before meat is the consciousness that we hav earned our dinner.—Ruskin.

THE truly honest man does the right thing with a simple feeling of satisfaction in doing it, and is impatient if anything prevents him from having the satisfaction.—Herbert Spencer.

THE great believer is always reckoned an Infidel: impracticable, fantastic, Atheistic. I believe in the moral design of the universe, it exists hospitably for the weal of souls; but your dogmas seem to me to be caricatures. Why should I make-believe them? —Emerson.

ECCLESIASTICAL people are in the habit of calling things they do not like by many hard names, and I should not wonder if they brand the proposition I make as blasphemous, yet I should like to see a scientific Sunday-school in every parish. I cannot but think there is room for all of us to work in helping to bridge over the great abyss of ignorance which lies at our feet. If any object that it will dishonor God, on any special day, to awaken the mind of the young to the infinit wonder of the works called his, and to teach those laws which must be his laws, there must be something wrong in their logic. —Huxley.

NO idiosyncrasy is there for which Rome cannot provide a sphere; no gift she cannot utilize She caters to every taste; student of human nature, she knows its weakness and kens its strength; liberty she hates—of thought, conscience, discussion; her alliance with liberty is a mesalliance, the union is most unnatural. Beneath the noble union of this free nation Rome is steadily laying her foundations, amassing wealth, concentrating power; she is in very deed a "king without a kingdom;" she is preparing for the future. Her genius is "to labor and to wait." The moral incorruption of this nation is its only safeguard against Rome; with its corruption, her hour and power draw nigh. A conscience invincible by bribe is what she dreads. It is the only human thing she cannot hope to grapple and o'ermaster. Even as the vulture finds in the carcass, reeking with decomposition, her fitting prey and food, so Rome, turning with loathing from any people in whom perfect moral life abides, hovers over and sweeps down upon whatsoever peoples are sinking into a mass of moral decay! With men without principle she knows how to deal. Her methods are stealthy as the panther. As to her spirit, the eagle is not so rapacious, nor the serpent so subtil; sin is not more deceitful, nor Satan more treacherous. In ambition she surpasses Cæsar, and in assumption of power to "save and to destroy," she rivals God. —Thomas Guard.

GOOD and ill are universally intermingled and confounded; happiness and misery, wisdom and folly, virtue and vice. Nothing is pure and entirely of a piece. All advantages are attended with disadvantages. And universal compensation prevails in all conditions of being and existence. And it is not possible for us, by our most chimerical wishes, to form the idea of a station or situation altogether desirable. The draughts of life, according to the poet's fiction, are always mixed from the vessels on each hand of Jupiter; or if any cup be presented altogether pure, it is drawn only from the left-hand vessel.—Hume's Natural History of Religion.

IT is a common thing for men of business to say that they are "fond of books, but that they hav no time for reading." In some instances this may really be the case, but, for the most part, they had better acknowledge that they care little for what they can find no time to do. In these, as in most other circumstances, "where there is a will there is a way." , . The best workman is he who can do his work with cheerfulness; he is a man whose nature is the best and completest, who has his faculties most about him, and in the most fitting abundance, and the way to turn our faculties to the best account is to giv them fair play, to see that the senses of the mind (if we may so call them) hav as much reasonable fruition as those that contribute to the nourishment and refreshment of the body.—Leigh Hunt's ook for a Learner.

THE wise man's eyes are in his head, but the fool walketh in darkness.—Prov. xiv, 2.

THE cathedrals meant royalty and hierarchy, of which the people of Europe hav had enough, while the little New England meeting-house meant and means an advance in popular liberty and popular prosperity, increase of Freethought, the ultimate extinction of superstition, and the complete secularization of the States. The Yankee meeting-house neither was nor is a finality, but indicates a step forward in the right direction when compared with medieval cathedrals. It was a cheap edifice, and did not require enormous contributions to be squeezed by theological menaces and promises of bliss, or threats of punishment, out of thousands of day-laborers, who ought to be devoting all their earnings to getting homes for themselvs and families.—Index (Aug. 31, 1882*).*

'TIS very true, my sovereign king,
My skill may well be doubted,
But facts are chiels that winna ling.
And darena be disputed. —Burns.

ON the plea of a corruption, of which the individual himself has not been the cause, of which neither is it given him to free himself, of his own power, he is to be condemned; he and the entire progeny of a childish and inexperienced pair—not excepting even the innocent little ones who die unbaptized—to the everlasting torments of hell! It is astonishing how a conception equally revolting to man's reason and sense of justice, a conception which transforms God from an object of adoration and affection into a hideous and detestable being, could, at any time, however barbarous, hav been found acceptable, or how the casuistries, by which people strove to modify its harshness, could ever even hav been listened to with common patience.—Strauss's Old and New Faith.

A SHORT LESSON IN HISTORY.

A double-page picture contrasting science and theology, showing how the one has labored for human advancement, and how the other has always opposed it. The German-American thus describes it in detail:

The palmy days of the church witness the burning at the stake of Bruno, the pope and priests witnessing the burning of the heretic with expressions of joy. Galileo is represented sitting in his study, the pope holding the sword of inquisition over his head, and to save his life being forced to recant his philosophy. Martin Luther is represented tacking up his "Right of Private Judgment." Behind him stands the pope with the bull of excommunication drawn, and beside him the headsman's block and ax of infallibility. In their study are Morse and Stephenson applying their inventions to practical tests, and in the rear of them the Presbyterian pulpits are filled by two of the broadcloth gentlemen denouncing the inventions as "Thwarting the will of God," and branding these men and their inventions as "Heralds of Antichrist." Ingersoll stands on a platform apparently delivering his lecture "Which Way?" which he holds in his hand. Talmage approaches the platform at the colonel's back, pulling after him, by the arm, the chief of police, who holds in his hand the warrant of arrest for blasphemy. The colonel seems to take no notice of the spleeny, cadaverous form ascending the platform at his rear. Then come the modern teachers of salvation, the Salvation Army, with their drums, bones, tambourines, and streamers, (and screamers, too), also a fac simile of our crazy army. A group of likenesses of the teachers of science, Haeckel, Humboldt, Darwin, Tyndall, and Huxley, is also shown. The likenesses throughout are remarkably correct. As a pictorial history the caricatures contain volumes.

Price, six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents; twenty-five copies for $1; one hundred copies for $3. We wish that the friends of Freethought would distribute thousands of these telling pictures.

THE MODERN BALAAM.

Showing the Balaam of modern times to be the priests. It is a splendid pictorial argument. Price, per dozen, 30 cents; per hundred, $1.50.

Odds and Ends.

IF the bell rings a false alarm can it be called a libel?

A CYCLONE is like a waiter. It carries everything before it.

ONE who takes lots of interest in his business—the pawnbroker.

IN France cows are milked on the left-hand side. In America the pump-handle is worked from any direction.

"HOW old are you, my little man?" asked a gentleman of a tot of four. "I'm not old," was the indignant reply, "I am almost new."

THE day of the green apple's over,
The banana peel's joke's almost done.
The ice-man and ice-cream discover
They're left and the oyster's begun.

A COUNTRY clergyman was one day catechising his flock in the church. The sexton, being somewhat badly posted, thought it best to keep a modest place near the door, in the hope of escaping the inquisition. But the clergyman observed him, and, divining his object, called him forward. "John," said he, "what is baptism?" "Ou, sir," answered John, scratching his head, "ye ken, it's just saxpence to me and fifteenpence to the precentor."

"HOW are times down in the country, uncle?" asked a white man of an old negro. "Porely, sah, porely." "What is the cause?" "It's de comin' in o' dese Yankees, sah." "How did they cause hard times?" "By t'aring down all de ole smoke-houses, sah." "Why did that make any difference?" "What? Why did dat make any difference? Sah, da tore tore down de log-houses an' built brick ones in dar place. Da needn't be so purticular. Nobody wa'nt gwine ter steal nuthin'."

THE CRITIC.

A grouse drummed a roll-call below,
While a robin piped up in a tree;
"A fig for that tune," said the grouse, with a croon,
For a high-born critic was he.

With a twitter a sparrow flew down,
The wasp and the beetle came, too;
The bee left the rose, and the frog from a doze
Was aroused by the loud tattoo.

A grasshopper perched on a straw,
A bobolink paused on his way,
And the burrowing mole peeped out of his hole
To hear what they all had to say.

"What's the row, Mr. Grouse?" croaked the frog;
"What's to pay?" sang the blue jay and wren,
While the geese, with a squawk, shouted back to the hawk,
And were joined by the quarrelsome hen.

"Alack!" said the grouse, with a frown,
"I am sick of that malapert's song."
"What matters to me?" piped the bird from the tree,
And he sang there the whole day long.—Outing.

A PARTY of English tourists were coming from the Yosemite last week, when one of them, who had been dubbed the interrogation point of the crowd, espied a pair of brogans sticking in the face of the bluff, toes down. Nudging the coach-driver, who chanced to be old Bill McClenathan, he asked: "Ah, driver, I wondah what the doose those boots are doing up theah?" Old Bill scarcely looked up as he replied: "That's a man buried up there, and the boys were in such a hurry that they did not dig deep enough to get his feet in." "Bah Jawve, that's very strange, ye knau I'll make a note of that. But I say, driver, the toes point down. He must be buried on his face, d'ye knau?" "Yes," said old Bill, musingly, "he was an Irishman." "But what's his being an Irishman got to do with his being buried with his face down?" asked the now thoroughly aroused Britisher. Old Bill looked at him in a pitying manner for some seconds, and then, in a tone full of deep sorrow and astonishment at the tourist's ignorance, said: "Well, do you see, we've got a sort of superstition out this way that on election day every dead Irishman gets out of his grave and votes, and so lately we've got to burying them on the top of the hill, face down, so that the more the corpse tries to dig out the deeper he gets down." "Oh, yes, I see," said the Englishman gravely, "I'll make a note of that for my book."

"OH, I had a perfectly lovely time last night!" enthusiastically exclaimed one of Minneapolis's best known society ladies this morning. "Instead of going to the club, Harry always stays home on Friday evening, and he and I invite a few friends up to play cards. We always start out to play euchre, whist, cribbage, but after a while a game of draw is always suggested. Well, last evening there were five of us playing, and things were about even. On one hand that was dealt everybody but Mr. B——, Kate H——, and myself dropped out. Now, you know how lucky he is at cards. Now, I knew by the way he looked that he had a good hand. I gave Kate the wink, and she made a bet. Mr. B—— raised her. I did the same. Kate raised again. Mr. B—— saw it, but I raised the bet. We repeated that operation until Mr. B—— got scared and threw down the cards. There was about $40 in the pot, and, after betting back and forth a few times, Kate and I agreed to divide." "Why, wasn't that lovely? What did you hold?" "Only a pair of deuces, and Kate only had a pair of nines." "How did you manage the game, anyway?" "Oh, that was easy enough," answered the fair exponent of draw, with an air that would hav done credit to an old sport. "Well, you see that Kate and I know something about the game, and we hav it made up between us. We always do that when we hav a chance. Harry told us about it. He said it cost him $300 to learn it. I wouldn't pay that much to learn a trick at cards would you? What do you think Mr. B—— held? Nothing less than three tens. Wasn't it good to beat him?" "What are you going to do with the money; buy that lovely bonnet you were talking about?" "Why, the idea! Of course I am not. I put every cent of it in the collection-box at the church. I couldn't think of keeping money I won at cards."—Indianapolis Journal.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 12. No. 40. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, October 3, 1885. {33 CLINTON PLACE.} $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

LONG ISLANDERS call toadfish Methodist ministers because they hav such large mouths.

LORD LORNE recently described the endowments of the established church of Scotland as stolen property.

THE Rev. Sam Jones has had hard luck of late. His stable has been blown up by dynamite by some antiprohibitionists, and his gospel tent was blown down by a cyclone and wrecked.

FROM an address by the Rev. J. W. Haney, a pastor at Springfield, Ohio: "The Democratic party is the road to hell, and the Republican party is the road to damnation. I'll take to the woods."

EDITOR STEAD, of the Pall Mall Gazette, is now committed for abduction in the case of one Eliza Armstrong. In obtaining material for his exposures, it is charged that he violated the law, and hence his arrest.

THROUGH the efforts of the United States consul at Genoa, Italy, an American lady who married a titled Italian has been liberated from an insane asylum, where, although of sound mind, she had been for some time confined. She is now on her way home.

Two or three Mormon elders hav been working in Spartanburg county, S. C., for several years. Last week a deputation of citizens surrounded their house, shot at one elder, and horsewhipped another. They hav now removed to another part of the county.

"WHAT was the trouble at church this morning?" inquired one Dakota citizen of another. "I understand there was a row." "Oh, it didn't amount to anything. Some of the members in the back pews threatened to shoot the minister unless he spoke louder. That was all."

SPEAKING of the triumphs of German surgery, a writer points out a number of men now walking around in the empire with only a fractional part of their digestiv organs. Some are referred to as being without a spleen, or having but a single kidney, others lack a gall bladder and several metres of intestins, while the climax is reached by "the man without a stomach."

A RELIC of the great forests which once covered the south of Sweden was recently dug out of a bog at Kinneved in the shape of a boat six feet in diameter, hollowed out of a log. The tree from which it was obtained must hav been twenty feet in circumference. The wood, which was blue in color, was very hard, and the boat so heavy that two bullocks could not move it.

"How little the present generation know about theology!" says the Holston (Tenn.) Methodist. "They mix Calvinism and Arminianism in hopeless confusion. Our young preachers should read our standard works, and some solid doctrinal pabulum should be handed down to the pews. There is no backbone in the theology of the day. The model sermon is nothing but a jelly-fish."

"IT fills my heart with joy," said an earnest country clergyman at the conclusion of his sermon, "to see so many strangers among our congregation on this beautiful Sabbath morning. Sojourners in our town are always welcome. We want them to come. Young men and old men whom pleasure or business has called away from the softening influences of home, we greet with open hearts. The collection will now be taken up."

A PREACHER at a camp-meeting fervidly said, when a proposition was made to shut the gates on Sunday: "Brethren, there are souls that will be damned if you don't hold over Sunday. They are almost persuaded by Saturday. Sunday will bring their convictions to a crisis. O brethren, let us save them! Thousands, too, will come then that will come at no other time." The Christian Advocate makes the report, and its editor adds that by personal investigation he found out that the urgent speaker owned the refreshment stand.

IN Ontario there is one church for every 274 Baptists, one for every 230 Congregationalists, one for every 539 Episcopalians, one for every 249 Methodists, and one for every 490 Presbyterians. The Roman Catholics hav a church to every 1,207 members. The Toronto Mail thinks the Protestants hav altogether too many churches, and advises consolidation as the only means of sustaining Protestantism. We hope they will not consolidate, then. Let them all die out together, like a couple of lovers who cannot marry, and so commit suicide.

"Hav you lived a good life?" said St. Peter to a trembling female who knocked timidly at the Gate of Beauty. "I was only good at one thing," said the sprite before him, with a doleful shake of the head. "And what was that?" inquired St. Peter, in a voice of blissful sweetness. "Cooking," responded the timid one, in woeful tones. "Come right in, then," said the sentinel saint; "you've saved more men from perdition than a dozen missionaries, and I don't believe you can find anything around here in the shape of blessedness that you're not entitled to."—Chicago Ledger.

A QUEER story of clerical intolerance comes from Little Leigh, in Cheshire, England. The resident Baptist minister reported at a public meeting that since coming to Leigh he had met with actual persecution from the rector. He had been unable to obtain a house in which to liv, and having decided to build a dwelling, he found that his attempt to purchase land from Lord Leigh was met with a protest from the Established Churchmen. In reply, the rector admits the truth of these charges, and declares that he but keeps his vows, having sworn to do all in his power to prevent the spread of schism.—New Haven Journal.

A MIDDLE-AGED man, in a clerical dress, was found on the 21st ult., in an unconscious condition in a dirty bed in a shabbily-furnished room over a saloon in Milwaukee. He proved to be the Rev. Robert Sloss, pastor of the Presbyterian church at Greenburg, Ind. For ten days he had occupied the room in which he was discovered, having dosed himself with morphine and opium and spent the time in drunken debauchery. He was well dressed. He had a new suit of clothes, and considerable clothing in his valises. On his person was a gold watch and heavy gold chain, and in his pockets he had $7. A woman had visited him at the rooms. He had deliberately planned a debauch. He was removed to a hospital, where he subsequently died.

RECENT statistics demonstrate that England has 65 square miles of colony to the square mile of her own area; Holland, 54; Portugal, 20; Denmark, 6.30; France, 1.00; and Spain 0.86 square miles. The area of the British colonies is 8,000,000 square miles—rather less than the area of the Russian empire, including Siberia and Central Asia; but if the area of the nativ feudatory states in India, amounting to 509,284 square miles, be added, over which England exercises as much control as Russia does over much of the territory under its sway, together with that of the United Kingdom itself, 120,757 square miles, then the area of the British empire exceeds that of the Russian empire by about 200,000 square miles; and it covers within a fracton one-sixth of the whole land area of the globe.

DURING the cholera epidemic in Italy, last year, the superstitious propensities of the lower classes were worked to fever heat; and during the present season the people of Spain are showing the same peculiarities. A recent number of El Mercantil Valenciano reports: "Yesterday and the day before more than five hundred persons took the train for El Pnig, for the purpose of securing oil from the lamp which there burns before the image of the Holy Virgin. These superstitious and fanatical people think that this oil is a reliable remedy against cholera. In the meanwhile, the sacristan of that church and the railroad company are making a good deal of money." The Revista Christiana, of a few days later, has the following announcement: "Died, at El Pnig, of very violent cholera, the sacristan who had been accustomed to sell the famous oil as a miraculous cure of the cholera."

SAID a gentleman who had just returned from abroad, "I was at church yesterday, deacon, and was astonished at the size of the congregation. It must hav doubled since I went away." "Yes;" replied the deacon, "we think of building a larger church." Gentleman: "The minister's popularity seems to be increasing?" Deacon: "Yes; since he was caught kissing one of the singers in the choir the church has taken on a new life."—Louisville Courier.

A VERY sensible decision is this of the Ohio Supreme Court, in Hastings vs. Columbus, "that publication of the preliminary and other ordinances, with respect to a street improvement, in a newspaper of general circulation, in accordance with the terms of the statute, is a valid and legal publication, although such newspaper is published only on Sunday. When a citizen receives a newspaper containing a legal notice, and reads such notice, the object which the legislature had in view is to that extent accomplished, and such publication is analogous to service of a summons. If the newspaper is mailed, the citizen commits no offense whatever by receiving it at the post-office on Sunday and reading it; nor does he commit any offense by buying it on that day of the publisher, or a carrier, or newsboy. A Sunday newspaper is not an unlawful publication, and the fact that persons engaged upon it may hav violated the statute against common labor, in preparing and circulating it, no more affects the legality of the notice than the fact that the sheriff may hav committed some offense at the time he served a summons would affect the legality of the service. In one case as well as the other the service is in fact effectual in giving actual notice, and we see nothing in the common law or our statutes which would warrant us in holding that such publication is illegal or invalid. We determin that the publications in question are legal."

THE following is a description of a priest's house after a fight between two factions of his church who had met there. It occurred in Milwaukee on Sunday, Sept. 20th: "The house after the fight showed the work of the rabble. One whitewashed wall was bespattered with blood, which had also stained the carpet. In the corner were several handfuls of reddish-brown beard, which had been plucked out by the roots. Several cravats were in another corner. The contents of three broken spittoons were scattered all over the carpet. A crucifix, broken in two, lay beneath a picture of the Madonna, which had escaped the hands of the rioters. Archbishop Heiss's portrait, in a rich gilt frame, looked down calmly on the scene. A package of wafers for communion purposes lay crushed into bits, where somebody's broad heel had stepped on them. An inverted inkstand and a wide circle of ink-stain around it were seen on the red corner of a table. The white sliding door between the parlor and the sitting-room was torn from its hinges and leaned against the wall. Most of the furniture, with its purple plush covering, looked as though it had come out of a second-hand store. The front door was broken in and was split in several places. Dents made by boot-heels and blood-stains marred the white surface of the panels." A list of casualties are: "Frank Niezorowski, formerly a policeman, was wounded most severely. Some one had struck him on the head, and the wound bled profusely. Thomas Klopatek had his lip mutilated by the knife of John Waier, formerly a fireman, who did not belong to the congregation, but took part in the row just for the fun of the thing. Albert Hildebrand was cut in the face by Anton Polezeinowski. Several others were more or less hurt. One man had half his beard torn out by the roots. Others had half their clothes torn from their backs. Many had scalp wounds, resulting from the smashing of crockery, spittoons, lamps, and inkstands over their heads. They were a sorry-looking lot. It was evident, however, that, while they were somewhat disfigured, they were still 'in the ring,' for after dark the disturbances were revived, and a squad of police was sent to the spot. A large number of arrests were made, and the ringleaders were locked up."

A Reply to Mgr. Capel and All Others Whom It May Concern.

J. J. MC'CABE'S SPEECH BEFORE THE ALBANY CONVENTION.

I suppose it was intended that my address should be merely one of welcome to our Liberal friends who hav come here from every part of the state of New York and also from places that are far beyond the limits of the state. Well, you are welcome. You hav all paid your way, I suppose, and I can't see why you should not be welcome under such circumstances. There is no use of telling you that Albany is a very old city, and that there hav been a great many conventions held here in the last three hundred years. These things hav been told many times by others, therefore I will take up the time that I might use uselessly in compliments and historical reminiscences in saying something that I consider of more importance.

I think I can say without fear of contradiction that Albany contains a larger number of Freethinkers than our orthodox friends would like to acknowledge. In fact, our churches of all denominations are maintained by people who would not sell all they hav for the benefit of the poor and deliver their bodies to be burnt to show their faith in the efficacy of any kind of religion. Yet, there are many very good and fairly intelligent people who think that a person who openly declares himself a Freethinker has been corrupted in some manner, that he has been guilty of some heinous violation of the so-called laws of God. There may be some people who do not know that this kind of diabolical drivel is taught from the pulpits not only in this city, but in every town and hamlet throughout the United States. I hav heard clergymen in Catholic and Protestant churches declare with all the earnestness of settled knowledge and conviction that every person who left the church to join the ranks of Infidelity was a criminal before God and man before such an act was contemplated.

In other words, I hav heard priests and ministers say that men or women did not cease to be Christians until they became immoral.

When I was a Christian, and had a good deal of confidence in the honesty and general morality of the priesthood, I believed that the priest told the truth when he spoke in this manner about people who left the church. But since I hav learned by practical experience that the clergy as a profession are no more honest than men of any other profession, I hav come to the conclusion that priests and ministers say these things about us with the same motiv that a Democratic or Republican stump-speaker acts upon when he runs down his political opponents. All such arguments, whether by priest or politician, are dishonest, but the priest should receive the greater condemnation, because he is generally supposed by the faithful to be actuated by higher and nobler motivs than the politician. If criminal statistics are any good, if they prove anything, they certainly demonstrate that the Freethinkers of the world are the very best people in it in a moral point of view. If the ultimate object of religion is to make people moral, kind, and generous toward each other, the Christian religion is a failure. If theology is the essential groundwork of religion, and a knowledge of theological mysteries the only means of salvation, then there are very few Christians that can possibly be saved, because there is not one in a thousand that knows anything about theology.

If it is necessary, however, to believe a thing that there is no possible means of gaining any knowledge of, in order that we may hav life eternal in a better world than this, then it would hav been about as well for the human family to hav been parrots, for these animals are endowed with sufficient understanding to say, "I do believe." And if the lectures of such men as Messrs. Capel, Talmage, and Newman manifest their knowledge of God, the immortality of the soul, hell, heaven, etc., then we ought to giv the parrot credit for the knowledge he possesses; for there never was an intelligent parrot that could not tell as much truth about God, the immortality of the soul, and all such things, as any of those preachers.

It is my private opinion that these fellows who hav tried so long to make it appear that they are on such terms of social intimacy with God hav been playing a confidence game. I hav had just enough of experience in the world to know that there are many men and women who try to make people believe that they are on social and friendly relations with all the great political magnates and millionaires in the country. This seems to be a strong weakness in some people. Aud this knowledge makes me believe that God is just as friendly and sociable with me as he ever was with anybody. Yet he has never invited me to dinner. Nor has he, to my knowledge, ever given me a commission to teach or govern anybody, or to kill or damn anyone. Now, if there is such a thing as a supreme, all-powerful-God, and if this God could and would come here and make himself known to the judicial authorities, I believe that the fellows who are going around telling people how much they know about him would be arrested, and God would prosecute everyone of them for slander and for receiving money under false pretenses. Let me ask the most intellectual teacher of theology—Mr. Capel thinks he is—a simple question, How does he know there is a God? What will his answer be? He says he knows there is a God, because a great many people believe there is; because his conscience tells him there is; because the heavenly bodies are in motion; because a bee has a colored wing. Are these all the evidences you can bring forward to prove that there is a God? we ask. "Well, these are the strongest," he says, "and if they are not sufficiently strong to satisfy you, they are strong enough to convince me that there is a God, personal and self-existent, to whom every material and immaterial thing is subject."

Now, without attempting to deny the existence of a supreme power—the recognition of which does not call for the services of a priest, as Voltaire, Paine, Victor Hugo, and many others, who are called Infidels, believed this much—let us see how much logic there is in this whole argument. He says there is a God—he calls it a personal God—because a great many people believe it. Now, in the first place, a very large number of the human family do not believe it, that is, do not claim to hav any knowledge on the subject, and among this large number are the greatest minds in the world.

Second, until a very recent date, nine hundred and ninety-nine people in a thousand believed that the earth was a flat plain, and that it was stationary and the sun revolved around it; and among those who believed this was Jesus—if any of you know who he was.

Who believes this now? Do any of the followers of Jesus? Not many. Now, then, if the belief of a great many people makes a thing true, the earth must hav been flat, and the sun revolved around it, until a few years ago. And so, if it should come to pass in the course of twenty-five or thirty years that the great majority of the people in the world should believe that there is no God, why, according to this style of logic, there could not by any possibility be a God.

The second argument is, that his conscience tells him there is a God, that is, a personal God outside of matter, with organized parts. I hav no doubt that this is the sole reason why so many intellectual men remain in the priesthood. Their conscience tells them they are right. But phrenology teaches us that there are a great many people whose conscience is a very small quantity. And, to speak plain, I think that any person living in this age, when all the necessary facilities to acquire knowledge are at the command of even the humblest, who can get up before a public audience and tell them that he knows there is a personal God, an immortal soul, a heaven, hell, a devil, and all such things, has not only a very small conscience, but the cheek of a rhinoceros also.

The third argument of this great theological teacher is that the celestial orbs are in motion. It was formerly taught by the priests that there was nothing in motion but the sun, moon, and planets outside of the earth. In fact, I remember hearing Father Haverman, the gentleman who acted as agent for the Catholic church in buying the present Troy Theological Seminary, declare in a lecture on astronomy that all that part of the heavens outside of the solar system was a crystalline sphere, that the stars were merely lights in heaven answering the same purpose as our gas-lamps, and that it was upon that crystalline floor that God and the angels dwelt.

But we are now told that because all these celestial orbs are found to be in motion, there is a God. I think the best answer I can giv to this argument is the one the Irishman gave to the English tourist while viewing Niagara Falls. The tourist, as he viewed the great falls, dilated on that magnificent work of nature in eloquent language. The Irishman stood by and looked at him in silence, without being inspired by any of the emotions that controled the mind of the tourist. Finally, turning to the Irishman, he said, "Isn't it wonderful? Isn't it sublimely grand?" and so on. "What?" said the Irishman. "Why, to see that great body of water carried over the precipice and plunging into the basin below." "And what the divel is to hinder it?" said the Irishman. And so we can say about the motion of the heavenly bodies, What is there to hinder that motion? Every particle of matter in the universe has in it the power of attraction and the power of repulsion. These powers keep matter in all its forms and conditions in motion, and nothing can stop that motion; no, not even a God. But these priests know that they are losing the respect of many of the most intelligent men and women in this and every other civilized country. It is a known fact that the great body of men and women known as writers, artists, and scientists, and the most rational portion of the working people, scarcely ever put their foot inside the walls of a church for religious purposes. The priests are cognizant of this fact, I say, and although they are toadied to by some politicians, on account of the supposed political influence they wield, yet the contempt that the priestly profession is held in by many of the best and most intelligent people in the world begins to trouble them. Superior intelligence, when accompanied by manly independence, has an influence that must be respected, even by intellectual frauds. Pulpit orations are frequently delivered now which are apologies for Christian theology. In words that a very common mind can very easily comprehend, these preachers admit that theology is a humbug which is fostered and fed by superstition, ignorance, and selfishness only. Yet, notwithstanding that it is the greatest of all humbugs, it is still doing an immense amount of good for the human family. They say it is an inspirational boon to the living and a consolation to the dying. They say that a belief in Christian theology will inspire men with the notion that one of the best things they can do is to make targets of themselvs for cannon-balls as soldiers, and as firemen to stand under the crumbling walls of a house and be killed just for the glory of the thing. Why don't these priests seek some of this glory, as it is such a fine thing? No, they would rather be exempt by law from the performance of the duties of a soldier. They don't even want to pay taxes on the property they own. However, there is nothing that the artist, poet, musician, soldier, philanthropist, or statesman has done for humanity that these apologists do not claim as being the work of the Christian religion and the Bible. Now, let us examin these claims for a moment. Clearchus, one of Aristotle's pupils, says that Aristotle told his scholars, in a discourse on the Jewish people, that the Jews brought all of their laws and whatever literature they possessed from the East. The histories of Juda and Israel as recorded in the books of Kings and Chronicles amply show that these people, prior to their captivity, were as barbarous and uncultured as the people in many of the kingdoms in the interior of Africa to-day. Although occupying a country that bordered on a nation whose people were the most civilized and enlightened, where every art was cultivated, such as music, painting, sculpture, poetry, elocution, etc., yet this Jewish nation, standing almost within the sound of the voice of the Greek orator, had no orators, poets, painters, or anything else, because they were commanded by their priests, who held complete mastery over them physically and mentally, that they must not imitate the manners or pursuits of the gentiles. Therefore, as a natural consequence, we find that, in a literary, artistic, and scientific point of view, the land of Judea was a complete desert.

What shall we now say of Christianity, which is the daughter of this intellectually starved and crippled mother?

"No foolish talking," says Paul. "Talk not at all," says Matthew. "When you are asked a question, answer Yea or Nay. If you add another word it comes from the devil." Under these restricting commandments, which were emphasized in the most narrow conception of their meaning, as history informs us, and followed by, "Do ye not as the heathens," as squeaked out from nearly every book in the New Testament, the products of the intellectual labor and the patient industry of artistic genius, which beautified, enriched, and ennobled Greece and Rome for centuries, were, under Christian preponderance, buried in the dust, there to lie until a Mohammedan spade dug them up. It is written in an allegorical tract called the "Book of Revelation" that there was silence in heaven for the space of half an hour. Put your ear now to the trumpet of time and listen to the sounds that flow along on the summer breezes of seven centuries. Nothing can be heard but the sepulchral voice of the priest. The hammer of the sculptor is silent. You cannot hear the movement of the painter's brush. In vain do you strain your ear to try to catch the sound of the voice of a political orator or dramatic artist. And if your amorous or patriotic soul should prompt you to try to catch a melodious strain from the lute of an epic or love-impassioned poet, you hear nothing but the mournful chant of monastic prisoners. A silence as dead as the grave, disturbed by no sound save that of the voice of the priest, the occasional clash of sword-blades, the twisting of the screw of torture, and the clank of chains. This is what Christianity did for humanity when it was Christianity. But Arabian enterprise dug up some of the treasures of Grecian lore from beneath the dust of ages, and, putting them on the points of their spears, shoved them down the throats of Christian soldiers on the plains of Palestine. Bagdad in the tenth century, under the Mohammedan caliphs, was the first seat of artistic and scientific learning that had existed for over six hundred years. Refinement and art culture were carried from this famous seat of learning to Cordova in Spain. From Cordova the first wave of artistic and scientific thought found its way into western Europe. Another wave, rolling directly from Bagdad, overwhelmed the first onslaught of the Crusaders. Once more from the schools of Cordova philosophy and art sent another wave that pierced the heart of Christendom. Art and skepticism now marched hand in hand. The poet took up his pen, and soon the experimental lines were traced. Slowly the child of genius labored to catch the tints of blending colors. Slowly he moved the chisel in tracing the forms of animals and men. Slowly his voice was tuned to sink in softest cadence, and to soar aloft along the higher notes of music's staff. The seeds of art are sown anew, and when the summer's sun of Mother Genius touched the tender twigs with smiles of gladness, the face of nature changed from a countenance deformed by mental thorns and thistles to fields of fairest flowers, and blossoming groves, and rippling brooks, and perfumed air laden with the sounds of social music. Popes now fought against kings for supreme power, the only means by which the advancing wave of Freethought could be overthrown. And kings fought for independence against the pope. And whilst the combat raged, Averroes sowed the seed of skeptical philosophy. Greece and Rome arose from the dead, and the amorous songs about their social gods and goddesses soon pulled the mask of slavish superstition from the brow of the fairest portion of humanity. The skeptical spirit which the introduction of Greek and Roman literature produced in Europe resulted in the final disintegration of the Roman Catholic church. Protestantism now burst upon the world with a fanatic fury only paralleled by the march of the first Mohammed. Religion assumed the character of a seething volcano in many places.

The ingenious but savage Calvin, whose mind was filled with the inconsistent mutterings of the bloody prophets of Judea, and the insane spirit of the mythical Paul, raised the standard of revolt against Luther as well as against Roman Catholicism.

Again were the arts struck down, again were men and women called upon to shrink in slavish terror from the wrath of Jehovah, to walk the earth in fear and trembling, and to thank the Lord for all the cruel sufferings he heaped upon their undeserving heads. Once more the savage God that a barbarous age had enthroned in heaven found a meek defender, in the blind and gifted Milton. I will read a few lines of Milton's "Paradise Lost" to illustrate this fact:

> And chiefly thou, O spirit that dost prefer
> Before all temples the upright heart and pure,
> Instruct me, for thou know'st; thou from the first
> Wast present, and, with mighty wings outspread,
> Dove-like sat'st brooding on the vast abyss,
> And mad'st it pregnant: what in me is dark,
> Illumin! what is low, raise and support!
> That to the hight of this great argument
> I may assert eternal providence,
> And justify the ways of God to men.

Yes, my friends, to justify the ways of an ignorant, avenging, lying, jealous, bloodthirsty God was the task of every Calvinistic teacher. Although the severe and fiendish spirit of Calvin entered into the religious life and thought of the people of all western Europe, still the leaven of skepticism that the revival of letters had planted begat a spirit of enterprise and adventure that was irrepressible. Every branch of art, with the exception of music, had reached almost a perfect state of development when the Catholic church came into existence; and from the moment that that church began its career, the fine arts and scientific philosophy began to decay, and continued decaying until Mohammedan enterprise and ingenuity became the means of partially restoring them to life in Europe.

The patient and self-sacrificing spirit of Columbus and the intrepid and indomitable nerve of Magellan proved the rotundity of the earth, and inspired Copernicus to write "De Revolutionibus." Then followed Galileo, Kepler, and Newton. Roger Bacon, Dante, Shakspere, and Cervantes are the fruit of this restoration. It was Mohammedan architecture, painting, sculpture, and music in Spain that developed the taste. That produced the genius manifest in the labors of Guido, Raphael, and Angelo. The genius of Mozart and Handel does not belong to either the Catholic or Protestant church. Mozart composed music for Catholic masses, Handel composed music for Protestant oratories—both of them composed music for social pleasure and public entertainments. The Catholic church encouraged the fine arts when it became absolutely necessary for her to use every material she could possess herself of that had the power of impressing and holding people to her faith, in order that she might preserve her existence. From the day that the Catholic church was first organized down to this moment, she has never paid out one cent to mankind for any purpose whatsoever that she did not expect to hav the gift returned with triple interest. And to a certain extent I might say the same of all churches. There hav at all times been philanthropists in every religious denomination, and out of them all. These hav helped humanity for the sake of humanity, from a natural disposition. They are freaks of nature, and I must say that they are very fortunate freaks for the race. From these facts, it is evident that we are not indebted to Christianity to any great extent for the material and social blessings we are enjoying at present.

High Spelling.

If authority can giv eclat to the spelling reform, the impetus is already commenced in a government department. The civil service does not require an examination of chief clerks. I do not know why, unless it is because their superior position makes their writing right de facto beyond the de jure criticism of good scholars.

Islamism, or Submission to God.

It is the general impression that the Mohammedans are worshipers of Mohammed. It might surprise the majority of people to hear that they are Christians, as much so as the Paulicians, or Nestorians, or our Mormons of to-day. One has but to read the first chapter of the Koran to learn that Mohammed was a reformer—as much so as Luther.

In Sozemen's Church History, written before Mohammed appeared, it is said of the Saracens that they are descendants of Ishmael, and had for a long time corrupted the Jewish religion of their ancestors through imitation of the idolators around them, and that a great chief of the Saracens had become a Christian, with all his tribe. Jews, Christians of various sects, and idolators were numerous among the Saracens. It is very clear, from the language of the Koran, that Mohammed was disgusted with the corruptions of the Christians, the unbelief of the Jews, and the folly of idol worship. He was deeply impressed with the idea of Christianity. Had he been able to repudiate slavery and polygamy his religious system would hav been almost identical with that of modern Unitarianism. In language clear and unmistakable he declares that God has appointed at various times certain prophets or preachers to declare the truth. Adam was the first, then followed Noah, Abraham, Jacob, Moses, Jesus, his apostles. Jesus was born of the Virgin Mary, and is one of those who approach near to God's person; yet to say God is the third of three, that he has sons, companions, is a horrible blasphemy. Time and again, over and over, on almost every page of the Koran, Mohammed says that he is but a preacher of the truth of God's unity, sent to reform the abuses that had grown up, and especially to enlighten the Arabians through their perspicuous language. Prophets and warners had been sent to the Jews, to the Greeks, Romans, the gentiles generally, but no one as yet to the Arabians. "I am but a preacher—a warner." What if they will not believe you? "I am but a man sent to tell them the truth. My duty ends with the words uttered." And so on and on. It is plain that he would hav preferred to introduce monogamy, but he would hav had as much success as a preacher of a new sect down South would hav had, before the war, who denounced slavery. Therefore the bane of polygamy remained to brutalize and besot the Saracens whenever they conquered and settled down in domestic quiet. That was the secret of their rapid decline after every conquest—a system that made of every head of a family, while at home, a sapless sot.

The priests of Islamism changed and corrupted the teachings of the Koran to suit their craft. They claimed more for Mohammed than he ever claimed for himself. But Mohammed's doctrins are neither more nor less than a branch or sect of Christianity.

C. I.

What Shakspere Taught.

Although many years hav elapsed since Shakspere's death occured, and many criticisms upon his writings hav been published, none hav given perfect satisfaction, because none hav grasped the idea in his delineation of nature, both animate and inanimate. Most critics appear to think that Shakspere painted with his pen individuals and persons. That this is not the case I will try to show.

Shakspere portrayed representativ characters that were typical of their peculiar kind — prototypes, stratas that run through nature's formations; currents in nature's ocean, of which nature is the ocean; his minor characters representing streams that empty into this ocean, but are nevertheless necessary. All go to make up the whole of which Shakspere is the master. And yet we see, night after night, managers fill their theaters with a gaping crowd, and stare at some "periwig-pated fellow," who mouths his words like a town-crier, to set barren fools in an uproar, to the no small annoyance of a few. But what do managers care for this if they can make money by it?

But let the reader look without prejudice and calmly at this. I will merely enumerate a few of his known characters.

Does not Hamlet represent the "infirm of purpose?"

Does not Macbeth show how truly a loyal, brave, and affectionate husband can be influenced by a scheming and ambitious wife, together with the thin air of superstition?

Does not "Romeo and Juliet" embody the master-passion of love, that principle which the almighty has implanted in us all for his glory?

Does not Othello present to us a domestic tragedy such as takes place among us every day?

Take, for instance, one of his historical characters, Richard III. Shakspere, no doubt, by the portrayal of this intended to represent an ambition that would brook no stay, nor stop at nothing that would impede from the "golden round." Now, to do this it was necessary to obliterate every good quality that Richard possessed, for, as the song says,

> There is something good in every heart.

Richard's biographers tell us that he was a man well-educated and finely cultured, a connoisseur and patron of the fine arts. But Shakspere never mentions this, but brings in relief only the baser and bestial parts that go to make up his composition, the better to bring out his (Shakspere's) idea.

And what a fine lesson on temperance—

> Oh, that a man should put into his mouth
> An enemy to steal away his brains!

Talmage's Belfast Sermon.

Whether to gratify those who hav learned to sneer at Talmage's misrepresentations and false arguments, or to advance what they consider the cause of Christ, many of the county papers throughout the country are printing his sermons from week to week, the space of which we think could better be donated to some honest man for advertising.

The last one is said to hav been delivered at St. Enoch's church at Belfast, Ireland, and in order to accommodate the immense concourse of those who were unable to gain admission, he repeated the sermon out of doors to forty thousand people.

The text was Luke xix, 10: "For the son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." In this instance Mr. Talmage is very mild in his misrepresentations. His false argument being in common with all preachers', it is considered worthy of some comment.

The argument is that Christ on his way to Jericho sought and found Zaccheus that he might make him believe on the son of man and be saved, and that Christ is continually seeking and striving with us that we might believe and thus save our souls from eternal torment.

If the masses would read their Bibles more and believe the words of the preachers less, such criticism would be unnecessary. For Mr. Talmage, to hav been honest and fair with his immense audience, should hav read to them all of the circumstances and assisted them to know exactly, if possible, what was meant by the text. It reads thus:

> And Jesus entered and passed through Jericho, and, behold, there was a man named Zaccheus, which was the chief among the publicans, and he was rich. And he sought to see Jesus who he was; and could not for the press, because he was little of stature. And he ran before, and climbed up into a sycamore-tree to see him, for he was to pass that way. And when Jesus came to the place he looked up and saw him, and said unto him, Zaccheus, make haste and come down, for to-day I must abide in thy house. And he made haste and came down, and received him joyfully. And when they saw it they all murmured, saying that he was gone to be a guest with a man that is a sinner. And Zaccheus stood and said unto the Lord: Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I giv to the poor, and if I hav taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold. And Jesus said unto him, This day is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is the son of Abraham. For the son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.

If the preachers would instruct in accordance with the simple teachings of Jesus, as alleged, instead of mystifying and imposing upon the minds of their hearers, we would hav fewer lunatics and more Liberals.

Jesus Christ here evidently sought Zaccheus because he was the chief among the publicans, and they being an immoral and dishonest people, Jesus sought through their leader to improve them. The teaching of Jesus here is the same as and corroborativ of his statement to the rich man who came to him "to know what he should do to inherit eternal life." He gave him the code of morals which all Liberals subscribe to. When the rich man told him of his fidelity to them, "Jesus told him, One thing thou lackest. Go and sell all thou hast and giv to the poor." He evidently was aware that he had defrauded his neighbors to become rich. If Mr. Talmage and other too imaginativ and ambitious preachers would spend their time and talents to teach the people the simple way of life, as Jesus is represented to hav done, they could safely join hands with Liberals and we would all be working for a common cause, and they could close each sermon with Christ's language, "The wayfaring man though he be a fool shall not err therein."

The undeniable excellences and beautiful examples of human kindness and moral instruction in the life of Christ as given by Matthew, Mark, and Luke hold the church together only by the contortions of the priestcraft.

Let the masses become educated to that extent that they can and will read for themselvs, and we will all sail under one flag, viz., "The religion of humanity."

The National Liberal League.

COURTLANDT PALMER, Treas., 850 Broadway, New York.

Call for the Ninth Annual Congress.

To the Auxiliary Liberal Leagues and All Citizens of the United Ptates and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Ninth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, to be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 9, 10, and 11, 1885.

According to a vote at the last Congress of the League notice is hereby given that an Amendment to the Constitution will be submitted, as follows: Article I. of the Constitution of the National Liberal Leauge shall be amended to read: "The name of the association shall be The American Secular Union."

Measures for the affiliation of the Freethought Societies of Canada with the National Liberal League will also come up to be acted upon.

Also measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various State Governments and by the National Government as shall make the United States thoroughly Secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local Auxiliary Leagues are entitled by the League Constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the President and Secretary and three Delegates. All Charter Members and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual Members are entitled to seats but not to votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every Auxiliary League will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present. Having adopted a common basis of work upon which all Liberals can combine, it is now desirable to discover the best means by which this work can be carried forward, and to this end large attendance and free expression of opinion will contribute. It is hoped that all will come to the Congress to emphasize the unity of Liberalism and to create an interest for harmonious action which shall result in the abolition of all laws that are contrary to secular government.

Per order of Board of Directors:

R. G. INGERSOLL, President.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.
COURTLANDT PALMER, Treasurer.
CHARLES B. REYNOLDS, Ch. Ex. Com.
A. C. MACDONALD, Ch. Fin. Com.

National Liberal League Program.

The sessions of the League Congress on Friday, Saturday, and the first two sessions of Sunday will be held at the People's Theater. Colonel Ingersoll will lecture Sunday evening at 8 o'clock at the Opera House. Morning sessions of the League begin at 10 o'clock; afternoon sessions at 3:30; evening at 8. The following is the order of business:

Friday afternoon at 2:30 P.M.: Introductory address by the president, Col. R. G. Ingersoll; report of (S. P. Putnam) secretary; report of (C. Palmer) treasurer; report of (C. B. Reynolds) chairman of executiv committee. Paper on methods of organization by Charles Watts.

Friday evening at 8: Lectures by J. D. Shaw, of Waco, Texas, editor of Independent Pulpit, and Mrs. Mattie Krekel, of Missouri.

Saturday morning at 10: Business meeting. Lecture by J. E. Remsburg. Subject: "Sunday Slavery, or Bible Sabbath" Lecture by Dr. T. L. Brown. Subject: "Organized Co-operation."

Saturday afternoon at 3:30: Mrs. A. M. Freeman, of Chicago, "Science and Superstition;" J. D. Mallonee, of Cleveland; J. H. Burnham, of Michigan.

Saturday evening at 8: Samuel P. Putnam. Subject: "Glory of Infidelity." Charles B. Reynolds, "Methods of Liberal Work."

Sunday morning at 10: Charles Watts. Subject: "Philosophy of Unbelief."

Sunday afternoon at 3:30: Courtlandt Palmer will deliver his great lecture, "The Aristocracy of Freethought."

Sunday evening at the opera house at 8: Col. R. G. Ingersoll. Subject: "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child."

Course tickets to all sessions, except lecture of Colonel Ingersoll on Sunday night, fifty cents. League delegates supplied with tickets on application to chairman of executiv committee.

We wish to say a word for Mr. Shaw. He comes an immense distance at great expense, and he would like lecturing engagements during the month of October in the Middle States. We hav never heard Mr. Shaw upon the platform, but those who hav speak of him in the highest terms. He is doing splendid work in Texas, and we think the present opportunity to hear him should be improved by all Leagues and Liberal societies. The Henderson, Texas, Times says of him: "His style is comprehensiv, smooth, and copious. He is one of the finest orators in Texas. His eloquence is almost irresistible, so much so that he will command an audience anywhere. By some he is called the devil and a hypocrit, others say he is seeking revenge because he failed to be elected bishop, and still others there are who say he is a benefactor. Large audiences listened to each of his lectures here, and the very best order prevailed throughout. Personally, we found Mr. Shaw chaste and pleasant in conversation, and his manners are refined and dignified." Mr. Shaw may be addressed care of J. D. Mallonee, 144 Cedar ave., Cleveland, Ohio.

The League of Alliance, Ohio, has chosen as delegates to the Congress, George Thornberg, Emil Tanner, Jesse Irwin, J. K. Haines, and D. W. Smith.

T. Littlehales, of Hamilton, and Wm. Algie, of Alton, are the delegates chosen by the Canadian Secular Union for the Cleveland Congress.

The Forest City House will be headquarters of the Congress. Terms, $2.50 and $3.00, according to location. Rooms had better be engaged at once by those who desire them.

Arrangements with other hotels at lower rates hav also been completed as follows: the Valley House, Nos. 51 and 53 South Water street, will accommodate about fifteen or twenty, at $1.50 per day, single room and board. Two persons in room, $1.25 per day with board. Room without board, 75c. per day single person; two in room, 50c. each. This house can also accommodate one or two parties of friends with large rooms at last-named rates.

The American House, on Superior street, can accommodate on September 10th (all rooms engaged for the 9th) as many as choose that hostelry. The rates are: Two in room, $1.50; single, $2 per day.

The New England Hotel, Nos. 58, 60, and 62 Water street, will cater to all who choose that hotel at $1.25 per day single; $1.00 when two occupy one room, including fire.

Those wishing board at $1 per day can communicate with J. D. Mallonee, 144 Cedar ave.

It is hoped that excursion rates can be made for all places within 150 miles of Cleveland.

J. D. Mallonee is appointed chairman of committee by Cleveland League for local arrangements. His address is 144 Cedar ave., Cleveland, Ohio.

Railroad Rates.

Undoubtedly arrangements will be made with the railroads to return at greatly reduced rates all attendants of the Convention who pay full fare going to Cleveland. The secretary and chairman of the executiv committee of the League are now at Cleveland to perfect all arrangements. The Lake Michigan Southern road has promised Mr. Green to return Convention attendants at one cent a mile.

Important.

The amount, $4,509.60, reported in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 12th, includes pledges unpaid to the amount of $686.01.

The total amount of cash paid into the treasury up to date is $3,823.60.

It is hoped that all societies and individuals who hav not paid their pledges will do so between now and the meeting of Congress. All of the amount is necessary to the full payment of expenses. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.

Pledges Paid.—Elizur Wright, $30.00.

The League Congress.

It seems to me that it is very important that we hav a large gathering of the friends of state secularization at the Cleveland Congress, the 9th, 10th, and 11th of October. But the trouble will be with many of our friends that they will not feel able to defray the expenses. It will be especially so this "hard times" year, and the railroad expenses are the most burdensome and the most difficult to bear. I hav therefore made arrangements with two of the great roads that intersect the city of Cleveland for reduced rates of fare, viz., the New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio Railroad, and the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad. And by looking upon the map your readers will see that these two roads will accommodate our friends over a large extent of country.

The New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio Railroad runs from Salamanca to Cincinnati, and has branches running to Cleveland, Oil City, and Franklin; so that people living in Salamanca, or east of there, in Jamestown, Meadville, Oil City, Franklin, Sharon, Youngstown, Leavittsburg, Niles, New Lisbon, Rowenna, Kent, Akron, Mansfield, Cincinnati, and hundreds of other places on the line of this road and its branches can be accommodated with these reduced rates.

The Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad runs from Chicago to Buffalo, passing through Cleveland, and has branches extending to Grand Rapids, Mich., Lansing, Mich., Jackson, Mich., Manchester, Mich., Detroit, Mich., Youngstown, O., Oil City, Pa., Ft. Wayne, O., and therefore will accommodate our friends residing in many of the principal cities and towns through Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and western New York.

And, Mr. Editor, allow me to state particularly what the arrangements are, so that there shall be no mistake or misunderstanding, and so that all whom the reduction will benefit may be prepared to take advantage of it.

First. The New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio Railroad will return home for a fare of one cent a mile all who attend the Congress over that road.

Second. The Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad will return home all who attend the Congress over that road at one-third rate of fare, which will be a little less, I understand, than one cent a mile.

Remember, you pay full fare to the Congress over either of these roads, and at the Congress the secretary will hand you a certificate that the roads hav agreed to get printed, which will entitle you, at the ticket office at Cleveland, to tickets home at the rates above mentioned.

If all who are interested will read this communication carefully, they will need no further information on the subject.

Salamanca, N. Y. H. L. GREEN.

Reassembling of Chicago Liberal League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: For the first time in four years, on July 19th, our League took a respit from its activ labors, reassembling Sunday evening, Sept. 20th, with evidences of renewed interest and vigor.

This familiar "ad.," usually to be found at the head of the religious column of Saturday's several editions of the News, must, among its 135,000 readers, hav drawn several groans from the defenders of divine power who had devoutly hoped the League had "gone to the devil," and its members were transfixed on the traditional toasting-fork of his satanic majesty:

Religious.

☞FREETHINKERS—LIBERAL LEAGUE, 181 W. Madison st., reassembles Sunday, 7:30 p.m.
DR. J. H. RANDALL
and
MRS. A. M. FREEMAN
will speak on
"THE MISSION OF THE LIBERAL LEAGUE."

Long before the hour mentioned a goodly audience had gathered and our president, Dr. J. H. Randall, had a little surprise in store. He had composed and arranged a number of songs to familiar tunes, and determined to try the effect of congregational singing.

With one of Chicago's most talented musical teachers, Mme. Mario, at the organ, together with the president's able leadership, no wonder the League burst forth with melody that made the rafters ring, disclosing several fine voices which, through excessiv modesty, hav remained silent so long. Our congregational singing is a grand success..

We were glad to greet Gen. M. M. Trumbull, whose recent dangerous illness came near making an irreparable breach in the Liberal ranks, and who made this the occasion of his first venture out, coming several miles to lend his presence to the League's reopening. May he long continue to wield his vigorous pen with which he has won greater honor and done as valiant service for freedom as he did with his sword.

Although now distant many miles, the ever firm, faithful worker, Chas. A. Fraenkel, was at his post. A sorry League it would seem in the absence of A. C. Berg, the Freemans, or Fraenkel.

President Randall's brief address was an epitome of clear, cogent reasons relativ to the necessity for organized Liberal propaganda, also an outline of what he wished carried forward by the League during his occupancy of the chair. Dr. Randall always makes a splendid, vigorous speech. He said:

"People generally believe that the government of the United States was organized with the distinctiv understanding that it rested on a Secular basis—no religious creed, no mediating savior, nor no nation's God, was recognized in the Declaration of Independence, or in the federal Constitution; church and state were to be entirely separate. A class of Christian propagandists, organized and known as the Evangelical Alliance, a few years ago commenced an aggressiv war against this condition of religious matters in the United States; they declared this a 'Godless government;' they believed that Christianity, as a religion, predominated, and that the citizen should be compelled to recognize it, and, to effect this object, they proposed to influence elections and legislation to secure an amendment to the Constitution, incorporating a belief in God and Jesus Christ as the savior. Farther, to carry their point, they insisted on the reading of the Bible in the public schools, also on prayer-service by the teachers, and over and over again they hav sought appropriations from the state for the promotion of religious movements. The evident intention to force a state religion and compel unwilling subjects to be taxed for its support attracted the attention of the lovers of liberty and progress, and the law of self-preservation and self-protection induced them to organize to counteract the exertions of religious bigots, and they took the name of Liberal League. They affirm that this government, in the interest of the whole human race, must be what its founders intended—a Secular government. The school, supported by public taxation, must be free from any and every system of religion; it is the institution of the state to train the boy and girl into a knowledge of the responsibilities and duties of the citizen—into a useful manhood and womanhood—and it must be kept free from all Gods, all Bibles, and all saviors, as these are the foundation of superstition, bigotry, and ignorance. Its main idea is the complete Secularization of all public educational institutions. So thoroughly is this fixed in the minds of its present membership that, at the coming Congress to be held in Cleveland, O., next month, it is proposed to change the name from 'Liberal League' to the 'Secular Union,' as being more expressiv of the work all Liberal and freedom-loving people are in harmony with."

After more music, Mrs. A. M. Freeman's appearance on the rostrum was the signal for an outburst of applause. There is no well-wisher of our League who is not proud that we possess so charming a speaker, such an admirable reasoner, and so amiable a lady. We are glad that others will hav an opportunity of hearing her at the National Congress. I doubt that the paragraph I reported will giv an adequate idea of the brilliance of her effort:

"We look back—back through the ages—away into the world's midnight of darkness, and see a grand, beautiful face—eyes full of hope, and reason broad-browed, loving, tender, appealing—a woman's face full of noble purpose, undaunted, undismayed. Hypatia, five hundred years after Christ, the last of the heathen—a disciple of the old gods. She taught nothing to her class of students in Rome so absurd as the mysticisms of the monks and priests of the new religion. We admire her courage, her white face haunts us, for down the ages there comes an agonizing shriek. A human being in mortal agony, a tender, loving, pure woman dragged limb from limb, her quivering flesh torn into shreds, and scattered far and wide; we see the monsters who hav done this deed; that they are the monks and priests of the Romish church; that it has been done under the very shadow of the marble Christ, he who said, 'Love one another,' and 'Think not that I came to bring peace on earth. I came not to bring peace, but a sword.' In this way died the last of the old philosophers. The dead hav died that we might liv, and there are those who, dying, hav been able to do more for humanity than they did living. We reverently remember these grand ones who hav gone before, who, like the heroic few at the pass of Thermopylae, guarded the people's rights; who led the forlorn hope in the world's advance, and we remember that through their work, their courage, and their success, we dare stand here to-day and say to the old gods: 'Back—back to your temples; remain at your altars; forever keep your cruel hands off the people's homes and the people's government.'"

When the applause subsided, another song was sung. Professor Page—the possessor of the finest scientific library in the city—announced his willingness during the debate to lecture at any time for the League.

An antiquated nuisance tried to rake up old differences for the diversion of discontented ex-members who were present, but was promptly suppressed by the president. Otherwise, an interesting debate followed.

After adjourning the open League, a meeting of members was held for the election of delegates. The following were chosen: Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Freeman, Thos. Galpin, Dr. Randall, and the writer.

Chicago League will hav a full delegation at Cleveland Congress, and I think we shall also hav a number who can act as proxies. Yours for success, E. A. Stevens.

Canadian Notes.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The annual convention of the Secularists from all parts of the dominion of Canada was held in the Grand Opera House on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, Sept. 19th, 20th, and 21st, President Evans in the chair.

President Evans read and presented the subjoined annual report of the Secular Union of Canada, and retiring president's valedictory address:

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE SECULAR UNION OF CANADA, SEPT. 19, 1885.

Ladies, Gentlemen, and Brothers: Again we heartily greet you. And in presenting this, my report, to this convention, myself and the officers of the Secular Union of Canada yield into your hands the important trust confided to us by your votes in the last convention, held in Albert Hall, Toronto.

In coming before you again in the present convention, and in speaking for myself, I do not claim that the net results of the past year are as flourishing for our good cause as I could wish, nor indeed are they as encouraging as we had reason to expect.

Last year (or, more properly speaking, last season) we held many lecture meetings of a highly intellectual and superior character, and the Toronto Secular Society made many excellent members. But this involved an expenditure that the members found it difficult to meet, and your officers hav found it absolutely necessary to use prudent caution in regard to these matters in future.

Personally, I feel certain that the only effectiv propagandism calculated to advance the cause of Freethought and intellectual liberty, is by lectures given by trained lecturers; and I deeply regret that any cause should exist that would in any degree curtail these the most effectiv means of true enlightenment.

And whilst dealing with the important subject of propagandism, I would divide the question into three heads: First, Is it desirable Freethought should propagandize? Second, If desirable, what are the best means of propagandism? Third, In what manner, and by what means, should scientific Freethought propagandize?

I answer to my first proposition, that the propagandism of scientific Freethought is a first necessity of our existence, if we would liv free of the galling trammels of fraud and superstition. And, in considering my second, or the means by which we would propagandize, I am decidly of opinion that the only effectiv propagandism must be done by trained lecturers, and never should be attempted by untutored or ill-informed lecturers or essayists. Debates between ignorant contestants I look upon as bringing contempt upon the most glorious prerogativ of liberty, viz., a free platform. To my third, I submit that the manner in which we should propagandize should always be by the means and in the manner that would best recommend itself to the intelligence and culture of modern thought, and therefore, by debates and lectures, having the authority of the executiv of the American and Canadian Secular Union.

If we decide that propagandism is a first necessity of our existence, it becomes us at once to inquire into the best means of conducting most effectivly such propagandism, and therefore I would respectfully suggest for your consideration that lecturers having the sanction of the Canadian Secular Union be invited to apply to the various branches of the Union, and to the leaders of Secularism, for appointments to lecture, it always being distinctly understood that the lecturer be guaranteed railway expenses from the nearest last place of departure—and a free hall; and that the proceeds of a collection or entrance-fee be paid to the lecturer, as his fee or emolument for the delivery of such lecture; that the corresponding secretary of the Canadian Secular Union be instructed to write all officers of branch associations as well as to the known sympathizers with our movement in Canada, asking them to invite known lecturers upon the terms herein named; and that he immediately communicate all and any application he may receive requesting the services of a lecturer to the lecturer who may hav received such request, and that no lecturer be thus employed who has not first obtained the sanction in writing of the Canadian Secular Union.

By the means before stated, I think our aims and opinions will be presented to the public in a becoming manner, and that scientific Freethought will be propagated, free from the many isms that only serve to bring it into the contempt of a public already too prone to listen to the prejudiced and untruthful accusations of interested priestcraft.

I hav felt it necessary to dwell somewhat lengthily upon the matter and manner of propagandism, as a long experience has shown me that close association of Freethinkers is next to impossible. We may possess small and numerically weak associations, but which may be strong in organizing the means of an effectiv propagandism. Nor is this all. Freethinkers may mingle to an unlimited extent with a so-called Christian community, without incurring the unpleasant odium said to attend the possession of a scientific mind. There is no fear they will ever return to the ranks of superstition, and therefore the necessity to associate is not felt by Freethinkers to the same extent as is the case with religious dogmatism.

But this does not in any way diminish the necessity for presenting our aims and opinions to the inquiring public. Christians, Jews, Hottentots, or Freethinkers can attend our crowded meetings, to enjoy lectures of cultured Freethought—and all this without being singled out for ostracism, as is said to be the case with associated Secularists. Let the bold only handle the reins of associated Freethought, whilst the more timid can bask the more freely amongst the throng of the lecture hall without being singled out for the especial persecution of bigotry and ignorance.

During the past year we hav made many new members. Some of them, I am glad to know, are made of the stuff that never flinches in the presence of irritated bigotry; others of these hav been more timid, and, like the snail in the storm, hav again withdrawn themselvs into the shell of obscurity, till, becoming strong by honest conviction, these, in after years, reappear as pronounced Secularists whom no amount of intimidation can obscure from the living truths of scientific knowledge. And it is on behalf of these, and on behalf of doubting Christians, that I now ask your earnest consideration. To these I wish to appeal, through the well-trained lecturer, presenting and defending our views by a well-trained course of reasoning; and, instead of looking for large and powerful associations, let us look for an enlightened public that will voluntarily sustain our lecturers, whilst receiving in return that supply of intellectual food that shall make our populations healthy, intelligent, and moral.

Let us hope that the experiences of the past will guide us in the future; and that, instead of increasing our associated members in Secularism, we endeavor to increase the numbers of doubters of priestcraft; and by these means so leaven the community with Agnostic principles that it may become one vast camp of liberated intelligence, rather than an inchoate mass of chrysalis Freethinkers whose very tendency to individualism supplies the very element that makes association impossible. Thought, to be free, must be unshackled by federated constitutions. Freethought feeds upon difference of opinion. Difference of opinion means inquiry. By doubt and inquiry the world progresses. Then let us seek to guide this progress by public enlightenment, and not attempt to bottle it in the narrow confines of limited associations.

All of which is respectfully submitted by your friend and associate, J. Ick Evans, Retiring President of the Canadian Secular Union.

The annual election of officers for the ensuing year then took place, with the following result: President, Mr. W. Algie, of Alton, proposed by Mr. Littlehales, of Hamilton, elected unanimously; secretary, Mr. Risser, nominated by Mr. Davenport, elected unanimously; corresponding secretary, J. I. Evans, nominated by Mr. McFedries, and elected unanimously; treasurer, A. Earsman, nominated by J. Harrison, elected unanimously; committee: the retiring committee, with the addition of Messrs. Littlehales and Scott, nominated by J. A. Risser, elected unanimously; trustees: the retiring trustees, nominated by C. Hicks, elected unanimously.

W. Algie, the new president, took the chair and delivered his inaugural address on the necessity of admitting, as members of Secular societies, none but good, law-abiding citizens, of good moral character and reputation; and the necessity for lectures on live, useful topics, science, and such like. Secular societies, he said, should not confine their attention to parrot-like, wearisome, monotonous, dull repetitions of attacks on theology and Christianity—mere childish Bible fighting.

W. Algie and R. B. Butland were unanimously elected; the former, president, the latter, secretary, of the Convention. Minutes of last Convention were read and, on motion of Messrs. Littlehales and Hicks, unanimously adopted. Propagandist committee, appointed on motion, moved and seconded by Messrs. J. I. Evans and John Harrison.

Speeches were made on the imperativ duty imposed on Secularists to engage in an activ propagandism to the utmost extent of their power, mentally and monetarily, and with an enthusiasm of unlimited extent and power.

Propagandist speeches were delivered by Mr. Moffatt, of Halifax, Nova Scotia; Mr. Ray, of Welland; Mr. Littlehales, of Hamilton; J. I. Evans, W. Algie, John Harrison, and Charles Watts. All the speakers advised the employment of trained lecturers, indorsed by the central executiv of the Secular Union of Canada and United States. If possible, every city, town, and village, throughout the whole of the dominion of Canada, to be made the scenes of the delivery of Freethought lectures by trained Secularist speakers.

On motion by Charles Watts, seconded by John Harrison, the following resolution was carried amidst enthusiastic applause:

Resolved, That the members and delegates of the Canadian section of the American Secular Union, assembled at the Toronto Convention, held on Sept. 19th, 20th, 21st, 1885, desire to record their unqualified pleasure in knowing the fact that that noble worker in the cause of human emancipation, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, has become president of the Union. And they hope and believe that, under his presidency, such harmony and earnestness may prevail as shall result in consolidating into one body the Secular elements which are now so extensivly existing throughout the United States and Canada.

Adjourned to Sunday, Sept. 20th, eleven A.M.

Sunday, Sept. 20th, at eleven A.M., the Convention met, J. I. Evans in the chair. Treasurer's statement read, received, and referred to the auditors, Messrs. Scott, Harrison, and Appleton. Minutes of the first day's meeting of the Convention (held on Saturday, Sept. 19th) were read and confirmed. President Algie took the chair at twelve, noon. Delegates to the Cleveland Convention of the American Secular Union, Messrs. Algie and Littlehales, were nominated on motion by J. A. Risser and C. Hicks, and elected unanimously. On motion by Messrs. J. I. Evans and C. Hicks, it was unanimously carried that the next annual convention of Secularists, from all parts of Canada, be held in Toronto, during exhibition week of September, 1886.

At seven P.M. of Sunday, the second day of meeting, Charles Watts lectured before the Convention in Albert Hall, which was crowded in every part. The Toronto daily World remarked, under the heading, "Charles Watts in Albert Hall:"

Last evening a crowded audience gathered in Albert Hall to hear Charles Watts, on his first appearance in Toronto since his return from England, where he has been engaged on a lecture tour. The subject of his lecture was "Secularism: Destructiv and Constructiv," and was delivered under the auspices of the Convention of the Canadian Secular Union, which embraces delegates from all parts of the dominion of Canada. His outbursts of eloquence were received with loud and prolonged applause, and, after a powerful peroration, the "lion of debate" retired in the midst of an ovation.

Delegate Ray, of Welland, gave a parting address, and President Algie delivered his valedictory.

On Monday evening, Sept. 21st, a grand concert, social, and ball closed, with eclat, the great Convention of 1885. R. B. Butland,

Secretary of Convention.

Toronto, Sept. 25, 1885.

At Work Again.

Once more I find myself in the field of activ Freethought propagandism, protesting against church monopoly, condemning priestly authority, and warring with the old and new forms of theological domination. The pioneer work carried on by myself and co-workers during the last two lecturing seasons has prepared the way for an extensiv propagandism in the present fall and during the coming winter. The secular seeds hav been sown, their development, in spite of all obstacles, has gone on, and now the time is rapidly hastening when steps should be taken toward reaping the harvest which awaits the sickle of the Secular reaper—a harvest whose prolific nature none can doubt who observes the growth of Liberal principles going on around us, and who heeds the deep love of mental freedom which everywhere characterizes the development of modern thought.

It must hav been gratifying to the delegates who attended the Albany Convention to hav witnessed the numerous gatherings that assembled at every session throughout the congress, and to hav seen the hearty approval given to the exposition of the various phases of Freethought principles. These conventions hav become institutions of real practical worth, and if we only grasp their proper utility, their influence must be invaluable. At such gatherings both writers and speakers address not only those who hav been emancipated from the snares of superstition, but they appeal to an audience composed of two classes outside, as it may be termed, of ourselvs. These are, first, the earnest, anxious inquirers, who are doubtless desirous of learning something of the new love before they altogether divorce themselvs from the old; and, secondly, the hostil class composed of men whose principal aim in attending our conventions is to detect a flaw in the Secularist's armor through which a well-aimed dart may haply find its way. Thus it will be seen how very necessary it is at any conference to hav all plans well matured beforehand, and to guard against extravagant talk during sessions. The recent meeting at Albany excelled in these necessary requirements, and, to my mind, it only lacked one element to bring it as near perfection as possible to what a conference should be; and that was a practical attempt to there and then suggest methods by which the numerous Freethought elements present could be consolidated into one organized force.

In a few days we shall be assembling at the great national Congress of Freethinkers at Cleveland. Then will be the opportunity to thoroughly consider our future action with a view of gathering into one fold all lovers of mental freedom. No one, I presume, will deny that our organization is capable of improvement. We do not estimate the Secularists of this vast country by the number of those who hav given in their adhesion to the American Secular Union, because it is well known that there are thousands of Freethinkers in the States and Canada who are not members of any Secular society. This is the question that personally I should like to hear discussed and considered at Cleveland: Why is it, and what is the real reason that Secularists, whose numbers are untold, are so remarkable for their abstention from Secular communion? The Secularist who can, at the ensuing conference, offer one real, practical suggestion toward promoting the general combination of all who profess to hold our principles will render a lasting service to the cause of human progress.

From Albany I proceeded to the Toronto Convention, where on Sunday evening, Sept. 20th, I lectured before the Convention to one of the largest audiences I ever spoke to in Canada.

On Wednesday and Friday, September 23d and 25th, I lectured at Hamilton and Welland.

By the time these lines are before the reader I shall be in Waynesburg, Pa., where I hav to hold a six nights' debate with Mr. Clarke Braden, who has been accepted by, and who is now put forward as the representativ of, the Christian party.

After the Cleveland Congress I deliver a course of lectures at Greenwich Village, Mass., and at Boston. I then expect to go to Philadelphia previous to devoting a month to Kansas City and the West.

America and the Vatican.

From the North American Review.

In March, 1884, the American legation at Rome was cabled by the late Secretary of State Frelinghuysen to use every proper exertion on behalf of the Roman Propaganda to prevent the forced sale of one of its dependencies called the American college.

The secularizing of ecclesiastical property, in the conversion of monasteries and church lands to public uses, had been going on in all the provinces of Italy, excepting Rome, since 1862, under laws passed in 1861 and enlarged in 1867. In 1873 the operation of these laws was applied to the last fragment of the late temporal States of the Church. The constitutionality of these laws had been contested for ten years by the Propaganda before successiv tribunals. The court of final appeal had recently rendered a decision ordering the enforcement of the law upon the property of the Propaganda. In substance, the laws passed by the Italian National Parliament provided for the conversion of lands belonging to the Roman Church in Italy into securities for the Italian government—an effectiv method of enlisting the pecuniary interest of an irreconcilable enemy in its permanence.

During the period of years from 1862 to 1884, no interposition had ever been made to prevent the "spoliation" of the church. Once only, and mainly at the instance of Mr. Gladstone's government, had a mild remonstrance been made by several European states to preserve the beautiful Neapolitan monastery of Monte Casino. The considerations urged were its antiquity, its architectural interest, and its historic value to travelers of all nations. As an amicable concession to the public opinion which prompted this species of archæological argument, Monte Casino has been left unmolested. But this was a voluntary concession, and not a recognition of any right; and the sensitivness of both the Italian government and people in treating their conflict with the Vatican as an internal question, in which none other had a word to say, had long made it apparent that any further interposition would be received with great disfavor. And when, in 1883, the British college of the Propaganda became threatened with "conversion," the British embassador, Sir Augustus Paget, avowed his inability to interpose.

It was therefore with no sanguin anticipations that I presented myself to Signor Mancini, at that time minister of foreign affairs. My personal relations with him were such as to obtain a courteous hearing of even so unwelcome a communication as that of the American government.

The first point to be attained was to "get the case into court"—to secure a hearing of the reasons which might be presented for exempting the college. In approaching the question, I treated it exclusivly as one involving American property, and not at all as an interposition in favor of the Propaganda. I presented to him the claim to the title to the college as stated by those of the American Roman Catholic clergy who had first urged the subject upon the United States government; this, although vested in the Propaganda by Pius IX., as a gift upon the condition of a perpetual use for the training of priests for service in the United States, was claimed by the Catholic church in America as property of the American people, on the ground that large sums had been from time to time contributed by American Catholic congregations, for the repair of the original building, for its maintenance for a period of a dozen years, and for the establishment in it of a library.

Signor Mancini admitted these rather unsubstantial claims to a title, and appointed an afternoon when he desired me to bring all the papers bearing upon the subject, when he would consider the matter fully, and see whether, as he expressed it, "si puo trovar un modo"—a way can be found.

The Propaganda, apprised of the instruction of the Washington authorities, sent to the legation a quantity of documents, and Monsignor Jacobini, secretary of the Propaganda, the vice-rector of the American college, and the lawyer who had unsuccessfully contested the case before the Court of Appeals, recounted the successiv phases of the legal defense to that time. Despite their recent defeat, these gentlemen were considerably elated at having transferred at least a portion of the question at issue to the channel of diplomacy, and declared success to be of extreme importance, as establishing a precedent of exemption upon which a claim for further concessions might later be based.

I became acquainted at this time with an English gentleman, who discharged with rare discretion the office of confidential diplomatic agent of the British government to the Vatican. In proof of the interest with which the solution of the pending negotiation was awaited, he told me that he had conferred with the representativs to the Vatican of the countries similarly interested, and that two of them were ready to support the government of the United States in making a protest. At the stage which the negotiations had then reached, and bearing as it did the character of an amicable request rather than that of an interposition, this action would evidently hav done more harm than good. I therefore decided to proceed alone, while preparing, should the request of the American government prove insufficient, to propose to the representativs of several European powers at the Vatican court to unite in a combined remonstrance, to save all those dependencies of the Propaganda which bear the names of the nationalities by which they hav been founded or supported. Remembering the estrangements that characterized the last years of the reign of Pius IX., I was impressed during the incident with the improved relations which his successor has brought about, not only with the ultra-Catholic states of Austria and Spain, but with France and Germany, and, through confidential agents, with Great Britain and Russia.

In my second interview with Signor Mancini, I adhered to the first position of treating an American, not an Italian, question. The following is an outline of the arguments which I presented to him at some length:

First, the consideration of equity: that the college had been given to the Propaganda by Pope Pius IX. years before the national occupation of Rome; that it had been received with the intention of a perpetual use; that upon the faith of this gift considerable sums had been expended upon it by American Catholics. Second, that as it was not intended, under the law, to sell the Propaganda itself, but only its property—such as leased houses and vineyards and farms—so, any building used for the purposes of the Propaganda, and subject to its disciplin, should be regarded as materially part of the Propaganda, whether isolated or actually contiguous. And, lastly, I urged the favorable impression that such an act of generosity would produce in the hearts of millions of American Catholics. The arguments which had served in the long defense before the Court of Appeals related to all the property of the Propaganda collectivly, and were inapplicable specifically to the American college; and the documents were of little service beyond establishing the title, which was not in dispute, and as showing that the college had been largely supported by contributions from the United States, which was also conceded.

Signor Mancini showed an evident willingness to exempt the college, could a sufficient reason be found for so doing. "Faremo tutto il nostro possibile per contentar' gli Americani," he laughingly remarked. The consideration of the "use" chiefly weighed with him, and he asked in connection with it whether I could obtain from the Propaganda a guaranty that, if exempted, the college should never be converted to any other purpose. This I engaged to do if required. On communicating this stipulation to the Propaganda authorities, it was at once assented to—perforce, perhaps; but as it was never reverted to by Signor Mancini, the obligation was not formally asssumed.

In conclusion, Signor Mancini said that he would confer upon the subject with his colleague in the cabinet, the minister of justice, in whose province the question lay, and it was also considered on the following Tuesday morning, at the usual cabinet meeting over which the king presides. I doubted not that we should now advance through lengthy stages to a stay of proceedings in the proposed sale. I was greatly surprised and delighted when, calling at my residence a few days later, Signor Mancini showed me a letter from the minister of justice, stating that the reasons communicated were deemed sufficient to justify the exemption; but the letter was dated prior to my interview with Signor Mancini, that the concession might stand as one spontaneously made, and not in response to any influence or pressure. I immediately cabled the substance of this disposition to the state department, and communicated it to the Propaganda.

At Washington so prompt a solution was unlooked for. The Italian minister had verbally assured the state department that his government would NEVER listen even to the statement of the case—would not even hear the question asked through the diplomatic channel whether the college might be spared. Possibly his declaration might hav been justified had there been the semblance of an intervention in Italian affairs under the guise of an intercession in favor of the Propaganda. The state department replied to me: "Your course in Propaganda matter is commended. Express president's thanks to Italian government.—Frelinghuysen."

The establishment by the Italian government of a precedent against itself attracted comment in the diplomatic corps at Rome, and, to my amusement, a number of my colleagues called to inquire, for the information of their respectiv governments, how this result had been obtained, as though some trick of sleight-of-hand had been performed. I invariably answered, after stating the considerations urged, that it had been the voluntary concession of the Italian government, induced solely by equity and by sentiments of national amity towards the American people.

Unfortunately, three weeks later Signor Mancini received from his representativ at Washington cuttings from American Roman Catholic newspapers, wherein the concession was described as having been made under menace, together with injurious expressions relativ to the "spoliation" of the church, and rejoicings that at length "the usurping house of Savoy" had been ordered to halt. It was difficult to palliate the offensivness of these publications to Signor Mancini. "This is my return," he said, "for a voluntary act of kindness. The mayor of Brooklyn holds a mass meeting at which resolutions denouncing the Italian government are adopted. Your clerical papers are allowed to publish that the exemption was made under a threat of war." I could only suggest to him that the United States government is not reponsible for newspaper utterances, nor for resolutions adopted at a mass meeting. He conceded this point so far as concerned the intention of the government. "But," said he, laying his hand upon a particularly venomous article, which predicted that the "interposition" of the United States was but the prelude to such a crusade the world over as should restore to the pope his own, "I tell you, that if ever it comes to more than words for the possession of Rome, which is the keystone of Italian unity, I, who am an old man, and thousands like me, will go out with a rifle with the young volunteers, and fight to maintain what has been achieved." —William Waldorf Astor.

The Natural and Mechanical Wonders of the Holy Land.

In the great subdivision of the world known as Asia, in the province of Syria, and only a short distance east of the Mediterranean sea, stands the famous historic city of Jerusalem. It was here that the wisest man that ever lived was born and died. We find in the third chapter of the first book of Kings that the Lord promised Solomon that none so wise as he should ever arise after him, and told him that none so smart had ever lived before him. So Solomon made gold and silver as plenty as stones and trees are, and stones are all-fired thick around Jerusalem. About this time Solomon concluded to try his luck in matrimony. I find in 1 Kings xi, that Solomon had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines. A very careful chronologer of events has made the statement that at this time Solomon was only nineteen years of age. Like a tom-cat in a pea-patch diving around after ground-moles, so was Solomon in and around Jerusalem diving about after wives and concubines. Solomon must hav been a very spry and activ man, and, above all, a quick workman, to hav required so many wives, to say nothing of the concubines. Perhaps Solomon did not commence courting until he was ten years old. It would rather militate somewhat against his moral character, his prudence, and his discretion in a physiological sense of the word to suppose that he commenced at an earlier age. This would allow him nine years in which to court and marry seven hundred women. Dividing seven hundred, the number of wives, by nine, the number of years, we find that he must hav married about seventy-eight wives each year, consequently he could not hav sparked each of his sweethearts quite five days on the average, provided he married all of them and spent no time whatever in obtaining his concubines. This again brings to my mind the fact that he must hav been a very spry and activ man. Even in this age of the world, when people do not liv to such an old age as they used to, a person would be considered rather fast who commenced courtship at eleven or twelve years of age. Five days seems quite a short courtship. Very few people hav such an eye to business in this respect as Solomon had. Many people will fool away six or eight months, and even then they find by bitter experience that they hav been too hasty, and hav made a bad choice. If Solomon's wives were as extravagant as they are nowadays, I should think they would hav ruined him.

It is also recorded that Solomon built a temple, or a house for the Lord, that was threescore cubits long, and twenty cubits wide, and thirty cubits high. See 1 Kings, vi. Transferring cubits into English measure, we find that Solomon's temple was about one hundred and ten feet long, nearly thirty-seven feet wide, and about fifty-five feet high. It was larger than an ordinary church. In order to build such an immense, ponderous, and gigantic structure, it was necessary to hav 180,000 skilled workmen during a period of seven and one-half years, also 3,300 overseers, as will be found by reading 1 Kings v, vi. It is reasonable to suppose that skilled workmen, such as were capable of working on such a structure, would earn at least one dollar and fifty cents a day; and the bosses who were capable of overseeing such a job would earn as much each. This would make the pay-roll amount to $274,950 per day, $1,649,700 a week, $42,892,200 per month, $514,706,400 a year, or $3,860,298,000 for the labor alone during the seven and one-half years that it was in course of erection. The gold which overlaid the whole house, including the floor, must hav been worth at least ten times as much more. This would bring the total cost or value of the temple up to $38,602,980,000. Only think of it once. All the specie lying in the banks of Edinburgh, in the banks of London, in the banks of Paris, in the banks of Philadelphia and New York, would go but a short distance toward finishing such a great and wonderful edifice.

After King Solomon had finished this temple, which required 183,300 workmen, including the overseers, during a period of seven and one-half years, it was decided that the proper time had arrived to dedicate the great temple. The altar of gold, the table of gold, the candlesticks, the lamps, the tongs, the bowls, the snuffers, the basins, the spoons, the censors, and the hinges had all been taken into the temple and placed in their proper positions. At the time of this dedication it was thought proper to bring the ark of the Lord into the house. After this was done, King Solomon and all the congregation that were assembled about the temple commenced sacrificing sheep and oxen. They sacrificed so many they could not be numbered for multitude. That was a good many to sacrifice. Very few people hav any definit idea of this vast number. Giv the subject serious thought; hundreds, thousands, millions, billions, trillions, quadrillions, quintillions, sextillions, octillions, nonillions, decillions, duodecillions, yea, more than that, were sacrificed, for they could not be numbered.

When we take into consideration the fact that Solomon was the wisest man that ever lived; that he was king over all Israel; that he reigned forty years in Jerusalem; that he made gold and silver as plenty as stones and trees; that he built a temple nearly as large as a cathedral; that he employed 180,000 workmen, and 3,300 overseers during a period of seven and one-half years, to construct the vast edifice; that he placed the ark of the Lord in this temple; that he sacrificed so many sheep and oxen that they could not be numbered; and last, but not least, that he had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines, we can form but a very faint idea of how great a man he was. He was certainly the ne plus ultra of all living things—the great desideratum of his day. No words of beauty can bring to the mind a vivid realization of this great man. All that the imagination can picture he, in reality, accomplished. And still, amidst all this overwhelming evidence, his existence is still unfixed. J. S. Davis.

Could They Afford It?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I trust that the noble principle that incites you to giv to the world so valuable a paper as The Truth Seeker will not allow you to withhold my letter from publication. In the first place, it is a mistake to say that Justice Clute requested me not to sell any more papers, and a greater one to say I promised not to do so, for that would be a surrender of a principle which I would not make.

And now, because I hav a purpose in life—something to liv for—I ask the gentlemen, Messrs. Wakeman, Palmer, Putnam, & Co., who controled the Albany Freethinkers' Convention, Could you afford to be silent when the rights of a brother-man were struck down? Could you afford to silently stand by and utter no protest against it?

Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, was it necessary for you to "throw a tub to the Comstock whale" by rushing into print to deny and "utterly disavow" my ideas? It is true you did not directly join hands with the three ruffians who outraged my rights by taking me to their unjust court, but did you promptly rise in your Freethinkers' Convention and earnestly protest against it? How would you, Mr. Palmer, hav felt had you been in my place?

What necessity was there for you to appear in two papers to deny any connection with Seward Mitchell, or The World's Reformer? You read a paper in the Convention in which you preached Anarchism and freelove. What more does my paper advocate, only that I use more forcible language than you did? Were your two letters to the Albany papers written to assure the public that you are "respectable?" If you hav, heretofore, been charged with surrendering to Comstock, it is more than true now. In my humble opinion, the very first work of your Convention should hav been a resolution for an unconditional repeal of the infamous Comstock laws. But, instead of that, you long ago surrendered to a Christian tyrant, and now lie supinely at his feet.

If you really and truly hav a principle to liv for, if you honestly wish to hav noble men and women in society, why did you not take pains to giv conspicuous seats to E. H. Heywood and Josephine S. Tilton, two noble, unselfish, and self-sacrificing reformers? Why did you plan beforehand who should speak in a public meeting? How could you tell who had important truths to utter, and wanted to stand up and declare them?

How can you cry out against popery, and then lay out a program declaring who is to speak and who not? Are you not following in the wake of those you condemn? You cannot affiliate with Spiritualists, but where has there been a Spiritual convention held that there has not been a "free conference meeting?"

Men and women who hav a noble purpose in life—something to liv for—would throw open a meeting to untrammeled free speech. A mighty contrast between your Free-thinkers Convention and the old Garrisonian Abolition meetings, where any and every one, however unpopular, had a hearing!

And to Mr. T. B. Wakeman, Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, and Mr. S. P. Putnam let me kindly say, you may, or did, feel you could afford to "pass by on the other side" of your brother, Seward Mitchell—but I tell you could not. I noticed that you could not see an unpopular man; but let me tell you that neither of you, with all your wealth, hav done the work that my humble self has done, for while you hav sat in soft-cushioned chairs, and sent out what you hav through the mails, Seward Mitchell, whom you could not see as you passed by in going in and out of your meetings, has gone on foot hundreds of miles, and, in six months, circulated six thousand books, tracts, and papers, every line of which was full of grand truths. Can you gentlemen say as much?

And yet you cannot deign to notice such a man, but coldly pass by on the other side. Let me tell you, gentlemen, you may think you could afford to see a brother-man outraged in his rights, and take no notice of it, but I tell you, you could not. You wish your Convention to be popular and respectable, but let me tell you, when any body of men become respectable in the estimation of a corrupt and insane world, they are doomed and damned, and they only wait the fiery incineration of truth to scatter their ashes to the four winds of heaven.

When we know that hundreds of thousands of poor men's homes are mortgaged to shylocks, hav Freethinkers no warning voice against it?

September 20, 285. Seward Mitchell.

Keep the Public Schools Free.

Free public schools, from the primary to those of a higher order, are the base on which a free democratic and republican form of government, in order to be permanent, must rest. And in view of the troubles and human slaughter that the European Christian nations hav had among themselvs from this source of mixing up their religion with governmental affairs, the fathers were careful to keep all of this discordant element out of the Constitution of this new republic, and to hav it a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, without any kingcraft or priestcraft about it; and yet every shade of religious and political notions was to be tolerated so long as it did not interfere with the rights of others, or of the general government under which we all liv.

But fifty years had not passed when it was found that this old destructiv element was trying to creep into the general government. The old states had been organized under the old king and priestcraft rule, and they never had fetched their organic laws into harmony with this new order of things; and so the wise ones, seeing the need of a general system of free education on a purely secular basis, so as to be in harmony with this secular government, brought forward the subject of public free schools, that were to be supported by a general taxation in the older states, while the new states that came into the union after this had a portion of the public lands set aside to help them along with their public schools.

But right in the face of this philanthropic and governmental arrangement for the general education of the rising generation, and in harmony with our general government, we see another class of educators of different functions, of that old popish church which has been at the foundation of so much human slaughter on the other side of the big water, busily engaged in establishing their sectarian schools and colleges all over our country; and in some places they are even clamoring for a portion of this public money that has been raised for the public schools to educate their children in their way, and I hav been told in some places the public money has been thus divided with these sectarian schools. And here we can see these old conflicting sectarian interests growing up in our political institutions, ready to ripen for our grandchildren to settle at the sword's point, as has been so often done among the Christian nations of Europe.

Now, as we hav seen that the permanency of our government rests on a correct system of free education, open alike to all under the rules of the school, and entirely secular in its character, in accordance with the Constitution of the nation, science, and common sense, let us then at once drop all this old superstition out of our public free schools. Then we shall be on a sure and solid foundation. Then the Catholics that are flooding our country cannot hav the shadow of a plea that our public schools are sectarian. As for the charge that our schools are godless, we can put up with that, for they prefer the same charge against our government. And yet they seem willing and glad to leave their old European theocracies with a God or gods at the head and flock to this godless country; and I hav been told that even their pope is looking toward New York for his home.

Yes, friends and fellow-citizens, while we hav the government in our hands let us be on the safe side; let us be consistent and keep our public schools free in fact as well as in name. Then we can stand up with a bold front, having truth and consistency on our side, and say to them: "Gentlemen, take your children, if you will, and educate them under ecclesiastical rule. We regret it deeply, but we cannot prevent it. We regret it because a heterogeneous population can never become homogeneous as long as children are thus parted in different sectarian schools. But you must do as you will, only let this be understood, that you shall be taxed just as you hav always been taxed, and you shall not receive one single cent for the support of your sectarian ecclesiastical schools. The public schools are free from all sectarianism. Enter them, if you will, in common with other citizens. If you will not, then educate your children your own way, and pay for it as best you can." Samuel D. Moore.

How the Brethren Love One Another!

From the New York Christian Advocate (Methodist).

Question 1840. As a Methodist preacher, what attitude would you assume toward the Universalist church in your community?

Answer. We would not assume any attitude toward it whatever.

Q. 1841. Would you invite a Universalist minister, if he were present in your congregation, to participate in the services?

A. Certainly not.

Q. 1842. Would you invite members of the said church to your prayer-meeting, and then call upon them to lead in prayer?

A. We would not invite them to the prayer-meeting, but if they were moral and devout men, and were in the prayer-meeting, and we invited all who felt in sympathy with us to pray or speak, and they spoke in harmony with our views, as far as they went, we should not object.

Q. 1843. Would you or your family attend the Universalist church, if there happened to be no service in your own church?

A No.

Q. 1844. In a community where there was no church but a Universalist church, and you were unable to preach yourself by reason of sickness, but were able to go to church, would you go to the Universalist church?

A. No.

Q. 1845. Would you participate in funeral service with a Universalist minister?

A. We would conduct our services, if desired, and finish them. If the people wanted to hav any other services, whether Masonic, Odd Fellows, Universalist, or anything else, when we got through, they could do so.

Q. 1846. On what ground would you justify answering the foregoing questions in the negativ, provided you do so?

A. We should not justify such answers on the ground that it is impossible for a Universalist to be a Christian, for we hav known some persons who believed in the final restoration of all to holiness and happiness whom we believe to be devout believers in Jesus Christ, but we justify it, first, on the ground that the difference between the Universalist and the orthodox system is too great to admit of any accommodation. The orthodox system teaches that life is a probation, and our only probation. It teaches the depravity of the human heart. It makes everything depend on conversion in this life. It holds and teaches a different view of the atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ in its relation to the forgivness of sin, and it teaches the deity of our Lord Jesus Christ and his absolute equality with the father, which most Universalist preachers do not accept, and which many dogmatically antagonize. The second ground is that Universalism is a constant protest against the principles upon which the progress of evangelical Christianity depends, and wherever it exists and prevails the preaching of the gospel in orthodox churches is neutralized. Considered as individuals, we respect and love various Universalists. Considered as a whole, we believe their system evil and most misleading. Our authority for this attitude may be found in the epistle of Paul to the Galatians, i, 8, 9; "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we hav preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before, so say I now again, if any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye hav received, let him be accursed." And also 2 John, 9, 10, 11: "Whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrin of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrin of Christ, he hath both the father and the son. If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrin, receive him not into your house, neither bid him Godspeed; for he that biddeth him Godspeed is partaker of his evil deeds." We understand these passages to teach, not that we should not love those who hold, in our opinion, fundamental errors; not that we should not associate with them as individuals; but that as representativs of Christianity, where the difference is radical we cannot indorse, approve, or associate with them.

No man is born into the world whose work is not born with him.—Lowell.

The Petition.

We print on the last page of this issue the petition asking for the repeal by the New York Legislature of the following laws: 1. The law exempting church property from taxation. 2. The laws appropriating money from the public treasury for the support of institutions founded and managed chiefly by sectarian denominations. 3. The law compelling the observance of Sunday as a religious holy day.

We ask every person in this state who sympathizes with the object of the petition to cut it out, append it to paper, and get as many signatures as possible. If preferred, friends can send to us and get a copy already printed on writing paper.

This winter will be the most auspicious time for introducing this measure to the Legislature that can occur. The Catholics, with all their vast resources, influence, and power, will push the miscalled Freedom of Worship bill. A hot and acrimonious discussion between them and the Protestants is inevitable, and on the principle that when rogues fall out honest men get their due, the true Secular theory of government will stand a chance of being brought forward.

The preliminary work of a vigorous campaign against the Catholics is now being done by the "Central Committee for Protecting and Perpetuating the Separation of Church and State." The main work of this committee is being done ostensibly against the Freedom of Worship bill, but the committee also declares its intention of introducing in a subsequent Legislature an amendment to our state constitution which shall forever disable sectarians, but which shall leave the question of religion in our laws just where it is. This means the recognition of Christianity as a part of our organic law, depriving the state only of the power to favor the particular sects, as is now done. The organizing secretary of this committee has but recently returned from a canvassing tour of the state, and he reports the Protestants as strongly in favor of this scheme.

Last July, when this committee was formed, Mr. Plumb, in response to a letter sent him by the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, called at this office. His talk was of the usual Protestant kind. He is in favor of separating church and state—oh, yes, certainly—except that the state should exempt churches from taxation, and he could not see the harm of the state aiding unsectarian Protestant institutions. It was not nearly so bad, he thought, for the Protestants to be helped from the public treasury as it is for the Catholics to draw money from the same source. It is seen, therefore, that we hav as much to fear from the Protestants and from this committee as from the Catholics. The men who form the committee are the leading Protestant laymen of the city—Wm. E. Dodge, Morris K. Jessup, Edward Schell, and some two dozen others of the same stripe.

A part of the organizing secretary's plan of action may well be adopted by Freethinkers. He has put himself in communication with influential persons—in his case, probably with the ministers—in most of the towns, who are, when the nominations for the Assembly are made, to ascertain from the candidates their position toward his movement, and then he proposes to send strong appeals to the people of the several districts with reference to these candidates' opinions upon the movement. If Freethinkers will adopt the same tactics—ascertain how each candidate for the Assembly feels toward our petition, and then act accordingly, much good can be accomplished in that way. Let every assemblyman know that in his district there is a strong party in favor of taxing the churches, and it will not be long ere he will hav the backbone to support the measure when he gets to Albany. From policy, and from fear of losing votes, a good deal may be gained from the average "statesman."

Circulate the petitions now, and interview the candidates before election.

The Bible in Sharpsville.

The Bible-in-the-schools case at Sharpsville, Pa., has been referred to in these columns. The facts are, briefly, that the school-board ordered the reading of the King James version of the Bible in the public schools, to which the Catholics took exception, and brought suit to prevent it. The Catholics wished to throw the Bible and religion out of school unless they could hav their own Bible read and their own religion taught. They averred, too, that the reading of King James's version is a sectarian act, in contravention of the section of the Constitution prohibiting any public moneys to be used for sectarian schools.

The Protestants retorted that, as the reading of the King James version was done without note or comment, it was not a sectarian exercise; that the use of gospel hymns was more a vocal exercise than a matter of praise; and thirdly, they informed the court they had set apart a convenient, comfortable, and commodious room, in the school building, for the exclusiv use of children of the Roman Catholic faith during the opening exercises, and that said children are not "compelled to participate in said opening exercises, unless by their own voluntary choice."

The case was argued before Judge Mehart, who has now rendered his decision. His conclusions are:

"(a) That public acts of religious worship in administering affairs of the state are not per se inconsistent with any provisions of the Constitution; (b) that public schools are established as conservators of public morals; and that it is within the duty of their managers to teach virtue and morals by all appropriate means, 'including,' to use the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, 'the best, the surest, and the most impressiv.'

"It does not appear that the defendants hav used this power so as to violate the plaintiff's rights of conscience, or so as to infringe the provisions of the constitution forbidding preference to be given, by law, to any religious establishment as modes of worship, and the appropriation or use of the school funds, for the support of any sectarian schools. It follows, therefore, that the defendants, in authorizing and permitting the acts complained of, are acting within the scope of their authority; and that the relief prayed for must be refused."

Their ox having been gored by this judicial bull, the Catholics are very indignant, and propose to carry the case up to the higher courts. It sounds funny, though, to hear the Catholics talk like this:

"Public acts of religious worship are clearly per se inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution as it now stands. The Constitution disclaims all right to impose a religion, by allowing every man to follow what he thinks best, proscribing merely that which is subversiv to the natural principles of right and justice or morality. Moreover, as the state has no right to impose an inward belief because it has no right to teach authoritativly or infallibly, it has no right to impose the outward manifestation of any inward belief. Hence we maintain that public acts of religious worship are clearly inconsistent with the explicit and implicit provisions of the Constitution."

The above, from the Catholic Union and Times, reminds us of that ancient couplet,

"When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
When the devil was well, the devil a monk was he."

The position of the Catholic church regarding the public schools is that the school money raised by taxation should be divided between the sects. In a controversy just closed, between a citizen of Hornellsville, N. Y., and the Catholic priest of that place, J. M. Early, the priest, unwittingly, perhaps, disclosed the animus of his opposition to the schools. After railing at the people of Hornellsville because they would not elect a Catholic to the school-board, he said:

"How different in other places! Catholic schools are affiliated with the public schools and placed under the management and control of the board of education, and giv satisfaction. Rev. Father McNab, formerly of this village, was elected school trustee of the village of Medina. He was on both tickets, Republican and Democratic, and his candidacy was presented by the most eminent statesman of western New York, the Hon. Mr. Pitts, an unprejudiced Republican. Father McNab was elected, and last week the board rented his school-house at $150, and employed teachers Father McNab presented."

There we hav it! Elect priests to the school-boards, hire their school-houses, and employ their teachers, and the Catholics are satisfied. In another letter, Priest Early further elaborated his plan:

"Catholic citizens desire to hav their schools placed under the school-board control and management; to hav the same text-books, same hours for study, under the same rules and disciplin as the other schools of the district, with sisters qualified to teach and to be paid from the school fund as the other public school teachers are paid. In fine, as they hav in Corning, Poughkeepsie, Lima, and in Livingstone county, and other places in the state, and in some Catholic schools in Connecticut. I want the tax-money we pay for school purposes to be spent on our own school-children and not spent on Protestant children."

We certainly hope the Catholics of Sharpsville may win in their fight, for they hav the right on their side. King James's version and every other version of every religious book should be excluded from the public schools. Judge Mehart's decision that the directors of Sharpsville school had not violated the Pennsylvania constitution is so plainly wrong that it must be reversed, unless the other judges are as prejudiced or bigoted as he. But when the Catholics attempt to put Priest Early's plan into force they must be defeated, or the future citizens of the country would be divided into two classes—Protestant and Catholic. The Freethinkers would hav no rights whatever; and wherever the Catholics had the majority, Protestants would exist only by the sufferance of the Roman church. Such a state of affairs could not be tolerated; it cannot be contemplated even without a shudder at the thought of the religious strife it would inevitably engender. We should hav the battles of the Reformation to fight over again, with Catholics murdering Protestants and Protestants killing Catholics. The civil strife which Grant predicted would be upon us.

The safety of the Republic is committed to the care of the Secular party.

Mr. Beecher's Two Deities.

"God's Personality" was the subject of last Sunday's sermon in Plymouth church. It was the first of the continuation of Mr. Beecher's philosophical discourses on the evolution of religion, begun last spring and interrupted by the usual summer vacation.

"From the beginning God had forbade the setting up of anything representing him," Mr. Beecher said. "The idea of God's personality was unthinkable, yet men believed in his personality, and that in his own way in the spiritual kingdom he would be discerned as God. He was without physical attributes, and had no relation to time. God was everywhere, and his whole being pervaded space. The Hebrew theology taught God everywhere, and the Greeks later adopted this view. The Roman mind was hard, but legal, and attempted to reduce everything to law. The Roman idea of God was as an engineer who stood afar and watched the mechanism he had made. Once postulate energy, the scientist said, and all can be explained. Energy was the great underlying force of this world. But," said Mr. Beecher, "that great underlying energy is God. We are floating in the being of God as ships floating in the immensity of a sea. God's personality was separated from all others. Human nature longed for a defined God. Now, Jesus satisfied this longing. He was the son of God, and took upon himself dimension and put himself under the limitation of time. He became like men, and was imprisoned in matter, yet living in the qualities of the Godhead. Everyone could fasten form upon Jesus, though it was evanescent. Pictures of Christ were poor things, and most of them simply reproductions of the Greek idea of manly beauty. Nowhere was a description of Christ given. To the sick he took the form of the heavenly physician. To the well man he represented the glory of God's workmanship."

Mr. Beecher has evidently borrowed Herbert Spencer's God. His Jesus he gets from his own luxuriant imagination. Neither of these two creations is Christian, and if the church adopts them it abandons Christianity.

Our Ex-Presidential Cat's-paw.

The North American Review will please forgiv us for transferring to our columns Mr. Astor's version of the interference by the United States in the affairs of Italy. It is a topic in which Freethinkers are particularly interested, and the American minister's account of what he did naturally may be looked upon as semi-official.

The first point of interest is the grounds upon which President Arthur and Secretary of State Fre-linghuysen based their Paul Pry efforts. These grounds were that some American Catholics had sent some money to the Propaganda to repair the American college and establish a library. Minister Astor admits that these claims to a right to a hearing in the matter were unsubstantial. We should say so! They are no claims at all, and no lawyer versed in international law would consider them for a moment. The United States interference was, therefore, entirely unjustifiable, and would hav been righteously rewarded by a snub from the Italian government.

But so long as the United States had gone on its knees at the behest of a lot of priests in the interest of the pope, the conduct of the Italian government was most courteous. To oblige the United States the Italian ministry would stretch a point to "find a way." The way was found, and the college exempted from the action of the law. This was simply a generous concession to a friendly government. To the Catholic church Italy would concede nothing.

We do not think that when these facts are known, the church will hav the effrontery to again claim that Italy fears the Old Man of the Sea in the Vatican. The words of Signor Mancini must ring in their ears yet: "I tell you that if ever it comes to more than words for the possession of Rome, which is the keystone of Italian unity, I, who am an old man, and thousands like me, will go out with a rifle with the young volunteers, and fight to maintain what has been achieved."

Signor Mancini's was the only noble part in the whole transaction. The begging thief of Rome induced Arthur and Frelinghuysen to prostitute the American government to the purposes of the Catholic hierarchy. They pulled the pope's chestnuts from the fire, and all they got for it was scorched fingers. It served them right.

Editorial Notes.

AFTER January 1st, Mr. Green informs us, the Freethinkers' Magazine will be published monthly.

WE are indebted to the London Republican, George Standring, editor, for a beautiful advertisment, in the form of a page and more sketch of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a portrait of the editor. If Mr. Standring had to put on a cast-iron blush at a small compliment we paid him, behind what screen of egotistical imperviousness shall we hide? We can only say, Thank you, Mr. Standring, on behalf of THE TRUTH SEEKER. May you liv to see the throne of the Guelphs an empty relic.

A GENTLEMAN traveling in Rhode Island met his old acquaintance Deacon Taylor, of the Episcopal church at Narragansett Pier, and during the conversation which ensued presented him with a copy of O. B. Whitford's "Bible Fabrications." The effect upon the deacon was startling. He took it home and read it, then burnt it. The next time he saw the giver he asked him if he had any more with him, as he wanted to buy them to burn, and would like to burn the author, too, as the book was decidedly wicked. The pastor of the church, Mr. Carver, also had a copy of the book given him, and the deacon says he intends to get hold of it and cremate that also. The deacon's brother, however, boldly proclaims his intention of reading the pamphlet, and defies the deacon to burn his copy.

A REPORTER of the Catholic Columbian has interviewed Governor Hoadly to learn his views upon the question of church exemption from taxation. The reporter laid before him a newspaper item which stated that he was in favor of taxing churches. Governor Hoadly said the item correctly expressed his sentiments. "Then you do favor the taxation of churches and asylums?" asked the reporter. "I certainly do." "And you did endeavor to incorporate an article to that effect in the state constitution?" "I undoubtedly did. I do not disguise my position on that subject. I am a thorough believer in the separation of church and state." The reporter left very much disgusted, and the next issue of the Columbian had an article against Governor Hoadly's position, and a paragraph asking, "Is it true that Governor Hoadly does not believe in the existence of a God?"

JAMES A. BLISS'S Spirit Voices for September says: "We most heartily indorse THE TRUTH SEEKER in its valuable work for humanity, in all its various departments. We know it has done more than any other paper we hav ever read to break down superstition in everything, and we heartily join them in every crusade against mental bondage. The greatest foe liberty has to contend against is that slimy snake we call Jesuitism. Its influence is felt in every direction. In politics it finds its way even to the highest offices in our land, and the Catholic vote is carefully considered and counted before each and every election. Burchard, the honest and fearless man, was railed at by Republicans because he 'told the truth.' Lay on, Brother TRUTH SEEKER; your circulation is much larger than ours, but even if we are little we are spunky, and second your every move against everything that does not giv to mortals absolute liberty and the use of a free conscience. We do not stand opposed to Romanism simply because it is Romanism. We oppose it because all Roman Catholics, from the lowest, ignorant layman up to its most learned cardinal or pope, surrender their reason and conscience to the church and are thus slaves ruling slaves. We in our work demand absolute liberty to reason and think for ourselvs. We also demand the right to act as we see fit, so long as we respect the rights of others around us. In this course we will not be hindered by the flattery of friends or the threats of foes, and, by the eternal, we will be heard."

THE Rationalist is the name of a new Freethought weekly journal published at Auckland, New Zealand. We are extremely pleased to note this evidence of the growth of Freethought principles in New Zealand, for unless there were Liberals to support it the paper would not hav been started by such level-headed men as the managers appear to be. The editor hides behind the name of "Ivo," under which nom de plume he has won renown in the lecture field. The editorials in the numbers at hand are vigorous, the correspondence interesting, and a vein of humor runs through the paper which makes it pleasant reading. We regret to see, however, that it is already quarreling with its older contemporary, the Wanganui Freethought Review. Freethought papers cannot afford to be jealous, or to fight their friends, either in New Zealand, Australia, England, or America.

OF the new work, "Rational Communism," just printed by the Truth Seeker Company, William E. Scott, one of the activ labor reformers of this city, writes: "It surpasses all I ever read in the line of reform, and, as a Socialist and Trade Unionist, I can recommend it to wage-workers and reformers as the best book for the solution of all their problems. The book is well worth the price when we take into consideration the amount of information it contains for those bent on reform, such as Socialists, Trade Unionists, Greenbackers, free soilers, free traders, etc., and a valuable book it is to show others the necessity of a reformation. The longer the reformation is delayed, the harder it will be to accomplish it, and I will guarantee that if all the societies that are organized for that purpose would act in one body, with the above book for a guide, it would not take long for them all to gain what they hav undertaken to accomplish separately."

ANOTHER, and until now unthought-of, steal from governmental revenues by the Christians came to light week before last through a decision of the Treasury Department:

"A pocket communion-service, imported by the order and for the use of Grace church, New York, as its permanent property, is entitled to free entry under the provisions in the free list (T. I., new, 771) for 'regalia . . . where specially imported in good faith for the use of any society incorporated or established for . . . religious purposes.' (Letter to Collector of Customs at New York.)"

Recording this miserable little theft of public money, the Advocate says that "if the Freethinkers had their way, this would pay double duty." To which we may answer for the Freethinkers that the Advocate errs. If the Freethinkers had their way this pocket communion-service would pay just whatever duty is assessed upon that class of articles, and no more. To pay less is to commit a fraud upon the people. If Christian honesty were not all pretense, a church would decline to benefit by such a petty swindle.

JUNE 13th THE TRUTH SEEKER contained an item based upon reports in the daily papers that the Rev. Dr. Sunderland, of Washington, refused to preach because Frederick Douglas was one of the congregation. By way of a Montana paper we learn at this late day that the reverend gentleman is very wroth with us for having given currency to the story. His explanation—and we giv it in full that we may undo whatever injustice has been done him—is this:

"The simple facts are that Mr. Douglas, with his family, came to our church on Sabbath morning, May 17th, simply out of curiosity, as I suppose, like a great many others who come to church for the same reasons nowadays, because President Cleveland had taken a pew in the church and they expected to get a sight of him on the Sabbath in this way. Mr. Douglas and his friends were shown to a seat and treated precisely as other strangers are; but it so happened that on that morning President Cleveland was absent. The next Sabbath, May 24th, I exchanged pulpits with the Rev. Dr. Storrs, of Orange, N. J., by an arrangement which had been made some months before. Mr. Douglas with his friends appeared in the church on that morning, also, no doubt supposing they would be sure to see the president in his pew. They were, as I am informed, treated in the same manner as before, but of course I was absent in New Jersey preaching for my friend. Out of these simple facts some newspaper reporters, bent on mischief, fabricated the whole story and hav sent it broadcast over the whole country."

Mr. Sunderland specifically denies that he refused to preach to Mr. Douglas's family, recounts what he did for Douglas at the close of the war, and adds:

"I hav suffered more for the attitude I took in relation to the colored people, and to Mr. Douglas especially, in those exciting times, I will venture to say, than all the men who edit THE TRUTH SEEKER and all their readers put together hav ever suffered from the same cause."

There is only one man who edits THE TRUTH SEEKER, and on account of his youth in those exciting times he could personally take no part in affairs. He did, however, suffer the loss of a father and several relativs in the war, while Mr. Sunderland was laboring principally with his organs of speech. But when Mr. Sunderland considers who the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are, he will acknowledge his error. To our certain knowledge there are scores of readers of the paper who suffered persecution at the hands of Christian mobs, or ostracism because of their Abolition principles. Nearly all of the old leaders of antislavery times are now Freethinkers, and nearly all, we are proud to say, read THE TRUTH SEEKER. We cheerfully acquit Dr. Sunderland of the newspaper charge of fleeing from his pulpit at the approach of a black man, but when he by implication puts the Freethinkers down among the pro-slavery people we must remind him that he speaks of that of which he knows nothing.

Lectures and Meetings.

F. M. HOLLAND, secretary of the Free Religious Association, sends us the following notice: A reception will be given to Moncure D. Conway in Chapel Hall, Tremont Temple, Boston, by the Free Religious Association, on Friday, Oct. 9th, commencing at 6:30 with a supper, at which Col. T. W. Higginson will preside. Mr. Conway will speak at 8 P.M. on "Our Armageddon." Reserved seats, fifty cents, at the Index office, 44 Boylston street, and of D. G. Crandon, 11 Hanover street. All friends of Freethought are invited cordially.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club opens Friday evening, October 2d, at the old place, German Masonic Temple, 220 East 15th street. T. B. Wakeman, the newly-elected president, will deliver his inaugural address. All are invited. THE TRUTH SEEKER reporter will be there.

THE Cedar Rapids, Iowa, debate between Jamieson and Williams has been postponed. The understanding was that it should take place beginning the 12th of October, but the elder wanted it to begin the 1st. Jamieson consented, but the Opera House had been engaged for the 12th. Mr. Jamieson will now remain in Missouri one month longer. Address him at Burlington Junction, Mo.

The Tent.

ALLIANCE, O.—We arrived here on the 18th instant, and found the Tent handsomely pitched, and our coming very thoroughly advertised by our faithful tent-master Tilney.

The tent is pitched in the lot adjacent to the Liberal Church, a very handsome brick structure, built for and dedicated to the advancement of universal mental liberty. The main room is 65x40, with seats for five hundred. This beautiful building was erected in 1879 by Liberals of Alliance. Mr. Caleb Steel gave $4,000, George Thornbury, Jesse and Samuel Erwin, A. W. Coates, and others contributing the balance. The interior is elegantly frescoed, and all the appointments are first-class. Regular meetings are held every Sunday morning, and there is a large attendance of ladies and children, all of whom evince earnest interest. The order of exercises is excellent. We will endeavor next week to giv full description; we can only state now that it reaches our ideal of a science school on Sunday.

We commenced lectures in the Tent on Saturday evening, the 19th instant, with a very large audience. Sunday afternoon every seat was filled. Our tent-master counted twenty-four teams hitched in the vicinity of the Tent. Many came long distances, from ten to twenty-eight miles.

Sunday evening, long before the appointed time, every foot of space on the free seats was occupied. At 7:20 P.M. standing room only, and crowds all around outside, who in more senses than one were out in the cold.

It has never been our happy fortune to address a more intelligent or interested audience. Despite the discomfort of the vast crowd, all under the canvas remained to the end, and gave undivided attention, many noting proof texts used in our lecture.

We distributed a large number of TRUTH SEEKERS and Liberal publications, and our book sales were quite large.

As the New York Freethinkers' Convention at Albany, N. Y., was in all respects the most brilliant, successful, and influential for good—exceeding all preceding conventions—so the Congress of the National Liberal League, to be held at Cleveland, Ohio, Oct. 9th to 11th, in numbers of representativ Liberals, in interest and importance of its action, will beyond doubt vastly exceed all other gatherings ever held in the interests of universal mental liberty.

None can afford to be absent. It will be a memorable event of a lifetime to hav been present at the great Cleveland Congress of the American Secular Union in '85. The mere intimation that Col. R. G. Ingersoll will preside at the Congress awakes a furor of enthusiasm that insures most glorious results.

We shall continue lectures here in the Tent until Oct. 1st. The evenings are very cold. We shall be compelled to close our Tenting season at this place.

Special Notice.—We return our most grateful thanks to the dear friends who so generously responded to the appeal in our behalf on account of Tent labor, made by Brother T. B. Wakeman at Albany, N. Y.

The prompt alacrity with which the amount was given made it doubly acceptable. To one and all who hav contributed to the Tent fund, we can only say "Thank you;" but our unceasing efforts to become worthy of their confidence and kindness shall best prove our gratitude.

We hope at least one more Tent—if not two—will be in the field next summer. C. B. REYNOLDS.

Mr. Putnam in Ohio.

I arrived here Saturday afternoon and found Reynolds and Tilney in good working order and doing splendid service for Liberalism. I immediately went to the Tent, and was quite delighted with its perfect arrangements and beautiful appearance. In the evening there was a large number present; every seat was occupied, and it has been so every night since Mr. Reynolds has been in the place. Large quantities of Liberal literature are distributed, with judicious care, and in addition many of the best books and pamphlets find a constant sale. The audiences are intelligent, appreciativ, and evidently enjoy the novel and instructiv lectures that are given. Besides the old standbys of Liberalism, there are many new elements gathered together, especially of the young. A great labor is being done indeed for pioneer enterprise, and the Tent is a success. Long life to its white radiance, which shall symbolize the glory that is to be—the bloom of nature's life itself.

All are excited in the neighborhood about the Cleveland Congress. Fifty or sixty will come from this place, and all along the route there will be a large attendance. Excursion rates will be made and published at the earliest possible moment, and handbills will be struck and circulated through all the neighboring towns. The Congress will begin on Friday afternoon at 2:30 in order to allow all friends coming by railroad to be present at the introductory address by the president, Robert G. Ingersoll. The secretary lectured last evening, and will join work to-day, Sunday, with Reynolds, and then proceed to Cleveland Monday for local business arrangements for Congress. J. D. Mallonee, chairman of Cleveland committee, will co-operate with him and Arthur Tilney. All goes well. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.

Alliance, O., Sept. 27, 1885.

Letters from Friends.

FRESNO, CAL., Aug. 30, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Please giv me a small place in your paper to answer some remarks that were published in the Republican, Aug. 22d, by some person signing himself "X." "X" makes an excuse for the clergy, saying I taunt the believers in God. I do not taunt them; I think that there are good, moral, and honest believers, but I do think that they are deceived and deluded by erroneous preaching. "X" says that I must think that God takes delight in making his creatures miserable. Yes, "X," that is what I think. The Bible says he will blind his creatures' eyes and send them strong delusions that they may believe a lie, that he may damn them; then he will laugh at them and mock them in their alarm.

"X" speaks of the God that I worship. I do not worship the Bible God, and if any clergyman, any Sunday, in his own church, will giv his reasons why he worships God in thirty minutes, and giv me the same time to giv my reasons why I do not worship the Bible God, I will accept the debate. Then let him giv me thirty minutes to object to his reasons, and he can hav all the time he wants to object to my reasons.

"X" says, "What a pity it is that some of the wise ones do not rule!" If that is the best answer to my questions that he has, I am sorry for him and forgiv him.

"X" says he is sure that if human affairs were left to men they would be no better than now. I am sure that they would be one hundred per cent better. I will state the question plainly. Is God to blame for all the evils caused by floods, drouth, and untimely rains? God made and keeps in existence all the flies, worms, bugs, insects, vermin, and wild animals, for the purpose of doing what they hav done and are doing, and they are blameless and innocent. If God is not to blame, who is? If "X" ruled over Fresno county rain and pest would be one hundred per cent less harmful then now. "X" denies it. I will ask "X" to prove that. (1) Would you be in favor of a flood in Fresno city and county with all their evils? (2) Would you cause a drouth next summer with all its evils? (3) If you owned a ranch of one thousand acres, well seeded, would you hav rain and good crops, or no rain and nothing? (4) If you owned a vineyard of one thousand acers, would you hav it destroyed by worms, bugs, and insects, or would you prevent it? (5) If you owned an orchard of one hundred acres, would you hav it destroyed by vermin and wild animals or save it?

"X" says, in a dry time a preacher prayed for rain and it came, and too much for one old farmer, who said, "That old fool-preacher always overdoes it." I think if he would come to Fresno and hear the preaching about an unknown and unthinkable God, and other very unknown, unthinkable, and unreasonable things, claimed to be divine facts which must be believed and obeyed, that old farmer would say the fool preachers are overdoing it at Fresno City.

GEORGE PADDINGTON.

BRATTLEBORO, VT., Sept. 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In to-day's TRUTH SEEKER I observe that Mr. C. B. Thompson is seriously inclined to doubt that such a desire or feeling as a wish for total annihilation can be really indulged in by me. Allow me, please, to disabuse this gentleman's mind, in regard to the question involved, by repeating that such is my sincere wish, and I desire no other heaven than that—a dreamless sleep. Yes, I reiterate, and most emphatically, that were I aware at the moment of falling asleep that I should never wake to consciousness again, I should feel just as heavenly, and if Mr. Thompson will take pains to make a few inquiries, he will find that I am not alone in this matter concerning eternal unconsciousness.

I am getting along in years, somewhat, having reached the age of nearly sixty, and my mind is the same new, relativ to death, that it was forty years ago.

I hav thoroughly investigated the Spiritualistic theory of a future life for twenty-five or thirty years, and I am heartily disgusted with the whole business, for there is neither sense nor reason in its methods, and of all isms in existence, Spiritualism is the most irrational and inconsistent. Take, for instance, the fact that the majority of Spiritualists believe in God and prayer, although not a particle of evidence can be produced of the existence of one or the efficacy of the other, yet that belief is adhered to by them with a dogged pertinacity which is only equaled by their faith in the "unknowable," and anyone who is presumptuous enough to question the genuinness of God almighty, or the beneficial results in answer to their long-winded and senseless jargon, called prayer to the "Great I Am," is considered by them but a little better than a beast, and especially so should he believe in common with thousands of others that "death ends all." Brother Thompson, I am with you heart, hand, and pocketbook, in the great, grand, and noble cause for liberty and Freethought, and the emancipation of benighted minds from ignorance and superstition. Further than that I hav no sympathy whatever with any form of priesthood, priestcraft, heavens, hells, prayers, devils, gods, or God, as I do not care a fig for any of them, for the former I detest, and the latter I defy.

Yours for reason, first and always, A. L. FRISBIE.

NEW YORK, Sept. 16, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In haste I send you this. It is an extract from a letter just received. You will here see that the work of THE TRUTH SEEKER and all Liberals is no holiday pastime. Mind, this is a visit to the father and mother. "I am come to set a man at variance with his father," etc.

"I hav a sister about eighteen. On my arrival here, they sent her immediately to New York, for fear she would be imbued with my spirit. Both of my sisters were commanded to shun me as they would a viper, and even if they should so far forget themselvs as to notice me, they forfeit their rights to their parents' home, also their home in New York, and their situation at Madame ——' (a Roman Catholic devotee, acting under the influence of her priest—for they consult their priest even as to their relations with their wives or husbands; he comes between, interferes with the most sacred, the most private relation of life). "I hav discovered it is the priest here that suggested I should be hardly dealt with. I hav given the idea here, not the particulars, because it would be betraying confidence, and wrong in me to do so.

"I see plainly that these Christian fanatics would grind all the Liberals in the mill of their God if they only could. The only thing that I regret is that I went back to them the second time. Like a fool, I was moved by my sister's tears and the sad tale of her loneliness, but time has proved it was but a bait to catch their fish. I often look back to the days of my childhood when I thought the ground I stood upon to be as solid as the pillars that prop the universe, but now I see the chasm widening each day. If I would dare look down into its yawning depths, I would become dizzy and fall. Almost on every side you hear the approval of the Christian doctrins, but grim experience has taught me to curse them, for, instead of making noble souls, they make beastly ones."

I consider, MR. TRUTH SEEKER, the testimony valuable, for it is a faithful record of what is going on to-day; and if there is anything in God's world to waken the flagging zeal of any Liberal, it is the fact of a young, refined, struggling girl being thus crushed by her own flesh and blood, and by devilish priests. "I tell thee, churlish priest, a ministering angel shall my sister be, when thou liest howling."

Yours in love, faith, and fidelity, AMICUS.

WOOLSONS, PASSAIC, N. J., Sept. 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of Sept. 12th, Mr. Harrison Hays says Leptandra Virginica is a capital snake remedy. I am very much obliged to him, for I walk about every day in danger of being bitten, and I am sure if I had been in the past I would not hav known what to do. It is a plant I know well, and hav known long as a border plant of elegant habit and pretty spikes of white flowers—neat, but not gaudy. I never before was induced to inquire as to medicinal qualities. I find from my "Notes on Lectures on Economic Botany" that it is official in the United States Pharmocopœia, used internally only. The fresh roots are used in the form of a decoction as a violent purgativ in extreme cases of constipation, and an impure resin (a specific) from the dried roots is largely used in place of mercurials, as a cholagog in evacuating or nullifying bile in very bad cases.

I do not ask for a free advertisment, although I will mail a plant to anyone for thirty-five cents. I can't giv it away, or I gladly would. I am in the trade. Yours truly,

T. D. HATFIELD.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Sept. 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In your last number, B. F. Robbins wants to know if things "would be better if all the good elements were extracted from government, and it were left without any redeeming features." In the opinion of all Anarchists it would, for in that case government could not last a day. It is the attempts of good people (with more zeal than knowledge) to reform government first and then everything else by means of government—or, still more illogically, to reform all their neighbors by means of an unreformed government—which still prevent so many from seeing that government is only one of the devices by which knaves rob—let's see, what kind of people is it that they rob?

Brother Robbins says he "cannot see the propriety of withdrawing from all participation in government, and giving up to the worst portion of the people the management of the same." But I say the worst portion of the people hav always had, and always will hav, the management of it so long as it exists, whereas they would not be allowed to manage it, nor it to exist, a month, but for the aid and comfort given them by mistaken persons who do not belong to the worst portion of the people. Once get enough people to resist the payment of taxes, and government must go, for the reason that its expenses would continually exceed its income. This is what would be done if the enemies of official rascality were wise in their generation. And if it did not prove sufficient to finish up the job, then, but for the aforesaid mistaken good people, dynamite would forthwith be called in for that laudable purpose.

LIBERAL, Mo., Sept. 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: At last I am compelled to join the epidemic that seems to be raging, viz., writing at Aunt Elmina. I hav desired to remain quiet on this subject, but forbearance ceases to be a virtue. In Aunt Elmina's letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER last week, she refers to a clairvoyant reading given one of her letters by a "noted clairvoyant and editor of a paper." So far, so good. Had she stopped there, all would hav been well; but she says that the reading was "gleaned" from her letter. Now, in justice to myself, as the noted clairvoyant and one of the editors of the Liberal (Liberal, Mo.), I must set Aunt Elmina straight in regard to my private opinion of her letters and articles on Spiritualism.
